

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

✂ The present sheet contains Mr. Webster's brief speech, made on the 31st of January, against the sub-treasury bill.

✂ Adjutant general Jones, who recently suffered a severe injury by the falling of his horse, has so far recovered as to be able to attend to his duties.

✂ Mr. Preston resumed his seat in the house on Thursday last, as did Mr. Clay, who had been absent for several days in consequence of indisposition. Mr. Vail, of New York, who had also been confined to his room for several days by illness, appeared in his seat in the house on the same day.

✂ The "Globe" states that the president's drawing room will be opened for the reception of company on Thursday evening next, at eight o'clock.

✂ A duel was fought with rifles, near this city, on Saturday last, between the hon. Jonathan Cilley, a member of the house of representatives from the state of Maine, and the hon. William J. Graves, a member of the same body from the state of Kentucky, which resulted in the death of the former on the third fire. The particulars of this most melancholy occurrence will be found in a subsequent page.

On Tuesday last the remains of the deceased were attended to the grave by the president of the United States, the heads of departments, the members of both houses of congress and a vast assembly of citizens.

It is stated that the judges of the supreme court, now in session, were invited to attend the funeral, but resolved not to do so, as an evidence of their reprobation of a practice more characteristic of a barbaric age, than one in which all profess regard for humanity and the laws.

CONGRESSIONAL. The proceedings of the senate and house of representatives on Thursday, are inserted in the last page. In the senate yesterday, after some unimportant business, Mr. Prentiss, agreeably to notice, introduced a bill to prohibit the giving or receiving a challenge within this District to fight a duel, and for the presentment thereof, which was read twice by general consent, and referred to the committee on the judiciary.

[This bill inflicts the punishment of death on all concerned in a duel which results in death; from five to ten years' confinement in the penitentiary on all concerned in giving or receiving a challenge; and from three to seven years for assault, defamation, or abuse, for refusing a challenge.]

In the house, yesterday, Mr. Greanel and Mr. Grantland were announced to have been appointed members of the select committee to examine and report the cause of Mr. Cilley's death, &c. in the place of Mr. Briggs and Mr. Harrison, excused.

After a number of committees had made reports, The bill reported by the committee on foreign affairs, for the preservation of our neutral relations, came up in order, and was discussed by Messrs. Howard, Underwood, McKay, Fillmore, Holsey, Everett, Robertson, Patton, Menefee, Ligare, and Maxwell.

Several amendments were offered, and rejected. Pending the question upon an amendment offered by Mr. Robertson, of Virginia.

Mr. Cushman moved the previous question, which was seconded, 83 to 41, and ordered.

Mr. Petricin demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered; and the bill was passed to a third reading this day by a vote of 130 yeas to 45 nays. The bill was then read a third time, passed, and returned to the senate for its concurrence in the amendments. Particulars in our next.

FROM CANADA. In addition to the intelligence from Canada inserted in page 7, we have seen it stated that the patriot forces were concentrated at French creek, on the St. Lawrence, about twenty miles from Watertown, N. Y. with the view of attacking Kingston. But we learn by the mail of yesterday, that they went from French creek to Hickory island with the view of making further preparations for the attack; but owing to the small force, and some difficulty with gen. Van Rensselaer, they returned to the Creek and disbanded. The whole force did not exceed 200 or 250 men.

VOL. LIY.—SIC. 1.

It is also rumored that there had been a battle at Malden, and that that town and all the military stores of the British had fallen into the hands of the patriots.

The Cleveland Herald of the 23d February says—From Detroit we have papers of the 19th. Not a word touching any movement of the patriots in that quarter. The story of crossing and fighting is therefore a hoax.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, March 1st, 1838.

The treasury notes issued up to this date, under the provisions of the act of congress of the 12th of October, 1837, amount to $6,518,964 65.

It appears, by the returns made up to the same period, that there has been received for duties and lands, and in payment of debts, about $2,430,250.

LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the treasury.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT, March 1, 1838.

From the mail registers received at the post office department, from the postmaster at Hawkinsville, Ga. on the Florida line, it appears that no mails from the south were received at that office between the 8th and 17th February, at which latter date two mails were received. The reason assigned is "high creeks."

FLORIDA INDIANS. It is stated in the Charles-Courier that the Indian prisoners who have for some time past been in confinement at fort Moultrie, were to have left Charleston on Friday the 22d for New Orleans, on their way to the far west, in the brig Homer. The chiefs were embarked on Thursday morning. Lieutenant Reynolds, of the U. S. marines, had them in charge.

FROM FLORIDA. The "Globe" of Thursday night contains the following extract of a letter from a highly respectable officer of the army to a member of the senate, dated

"Fort Bassinger, Feb. 8. 1838.

"So much for myself. Now, sir, I will give you a few lines relative to Florida and the Indians.

"We (col. Taylor's army) have just returned from the everglades. They may be said to commence about 40 or 50 miles southeast of this place, and are on the south side of lake Oak-o-chobee.

"The everglades are what we, at the northwest, term a wet prairie. It is a large wet prairie, or grassy lake, of which the Indians and negroes know but little, and where they cannot live a month without great suffering.

"We saw but few Indians, and they fled rapidly. We took about sixty horses, and ascertained that their cattle were exhausted. Col. Taylor has taken from them, since his fight, about six hundred head. We found, on our last excursion, but few cattle tracks, and only two cows were taken. The Indians are suffering for food; in all their camps we found they had subsisted on palmetto roots and the cabbage-tree, which is never eaten by them except when hard run.

"One hundred and thirty Indians and negroes have come in since the fight, and they say many more will come in soon; that they are tired of the war and hungry.

"Florida is, generally, a poor, sandy country. The southern portion is nearly all prairie, wet and dry alternately, healthy in winter, sickly in summer. Not more than one-tenth, at the utmost, of Florida, is fit for cultivation, and I would not give one good township of land, in Illinois or Michigan, for every foot of land in east Florida.

"The Indian prisoners now admit that they lost twenty killed on the ground, and a great many wounded, in the fight with col. Taylor. They had a strong position, and fought well, but were terribly whipped, and have never returned near the ground since."

BANKS OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK. We publish the monthly return of the banks of this state to the 1st of Feb. inst. It has been delayed, unavoidably, for a few days. A comparison with preceding reports, presents the following results. We extend the comparison to December, because the return to the 1st January, being the annual report, was not the usual form of the monthly returns, and not convenient for this purpose.

The above statements show a diminution of loans and discounts, since the 1st of December (two months) of $1,425,651; an increase of specie of $466,712; a diminished circulation of $2,363,043; an increase of the canal fund deposits of $356,266; a decrease of the state treasurer's deposit of $66,819; an increase of the U. S. deposit of $3,299; and a decrease of individual deposits of $1,150,767.

COMMONWEALTH BANK, BOSTON. The investigating committee of the Massachusetts legislature have at length reported on the condition of the Commonwealth bank. They disclose a state of things disgraceful and corrupt almost beyond belief, and fully establish the heaviest charges that have ever been made against the persons implicated in the transactions of the bank. The loans to four or five individuals only, exceed the whole capital stock of the bank.

The manner in which the poor pensioners and fishermen were defrauded of their dues is now fully explained. The report shows that the bank received in January last $14,022 in treasury notes, part of which were sold for account of the bank. Another batch of treasury notes amounting to $85,200 was received soon after, and these too were sold. Treasury notes at that time were at a premium in Boston—these notes were sold—the premium pocketed by the bank or somebody else, and the fishermen and pensioners paid in the worthless rags of the bank. Only two or three days before the bank failed, these claimants on the government were refused specie or treasury notes, and forced to take the bank bills, when the collector, who paid them out must have known that the bank must fail. The affairs of the bank appear to have been managed by three of the directors, who managed to use up all the funds and defraud the public of an immense sum of money.

The amount due to the government from the bank is $337,625 29, as security for parts of which the district attorney, who was also a director, holds the notes of several of the other directors to the amount of $42,420. The total liabilities of the bank are $1,149,200. The circulation in post notes and bank bills is $370,462. The assets are, specie, $29,684. Stocks—most of which are valueless—$23,456. Balance due from city and Middlesex banks, the last broken, $145,256,—from other banks, $30,000. Due from directors $630,283,—and from various individuals and companies, most of whom have failed about $350,000. It should be borne in mind that the individuals, who have so grossly defrauded the community and the government, and squandered the money of innocent stockholders, and wronged the needy pensioners and fishermen of the bounty of the government are the particular friends of the administration in Massachusetts.

The Boston papers state that Joshua Dunham and five others, directors of the Franklin bank, have been indicted by the grand jury for official misdemeanor and criminal neglect of duty. They were arrested and held to bail in the sum of $2,000 each. These banks found their ruin in becoming the dupes of the government in receiving the deposits that were unjustly wrested from the United States bank. [N. Y. Express.]

WONDERFUL EFFECTS OF THE WESTERN RAIL ROAD IN CASE OF WAR. This great state rail road with its numerous branches, will, in case of war, enable us to concentrate, as if by enchantment, the whole force of the state, and of the neighboring states, and even the force of distant states, upon any part of the territory of Massachusetts. In connection with a steam-battery, playing inside of cape Cod, and another steam-battery in Narragansett bay, the waters of Massachusetts and the lands of Massachusetts will then present the defeat of an enemy as the inevitable result of any attack. This will be so clear to the eye of any military or naval commander, as to amount to an absolute order by such commander, to himself, not to attack a people, thus made impregnable, by the mighty power of steam, to the mighty power of the mind.

In time of profound peace, it is the part of wisdom to place the state in readiness to disarm war of its power of mischief. It is never worth while to lull ourselves into a false security—more especially while the sceptre of the most formidable naval power is held by a woman, who, in the freaks of love, may, perchance, bestow her affections upon some ambitious Caesar, or on some mischievous man and irresponsible favorite. History is full of warnings, to this purpose. And we have, moreover, on our very frontiers, both in Texas and in the Canadas, a magazine of powder, to which the indiscretion of our own or their citizens may yet apply the match at any moment.

During the war of 1812, cotton was 6 cents per pound in New Orleans, and 40 cents in Massachusetts. Louisiana sugar was worth 3 cents in New Orleans, and 30 cents in Boston. Flour, then worth $2 a barrel in the western country, did sell for $16 in Massachusetts. Make the western rail road, and 1 a 2 cents per pound, for the expense of transportation, will give you the command of all the products of the west and of the south west, and the enjoyment of them just as much in time of war, as if it were a time of profound peace—and these seventy millions annual amount of the manufactures of this state will find in the great west even a better market, than in time of uninterrupted peace. And our bay fisheries will still enable us (although we be at war) to supply upwards of six millions of people with fresh and salted and pickled fish, to the amount of many millions of dollars.

During the war of 1812, our whole sea coast was held in continual terror. Adopt the present plan and the security of Massachusetts will be complete, with out any cost of blood or treasury.

THE SUPPLY OF FLOUR. The following article, from the Louisville advertiser of the 13th inst. is not without interest.

The supply of flour. A business man of this city makes the following remarks in reply to a very lengthy article that recently appeared in the Baltimore American; purporting to be an estimate of the quantity of flour on hand in the United States on the 1st of January last:

"By whatever motive the writer of that statement may have been influenced, I care not; but I will venture to express the opinion that his estimate is exceedingly incorrect. Even were it otherwise, it furnishes no reasonable or secure data, on which intelligent dealers would think of basing operations. Those who wish to act on a satisfactory view of the market for bread stuffs will not confine their inquiries to the real or supposed stock of flour on hand. They will go farther back and endeavor to ascertain the number of bushels of wheat withheld from market by the farmers in the regions of country that supply the principle depots.

"In the statement alluded to, the stock of flour in Louisville, on the 1st. ult., was put down at 4,000 barrels. On that day the writer of this knows there were not 1,000 barrels in the place. There was scarcely a sufficient quantity to supply the immediate local demand, much less a stock for exportation. Farmers are as watchful of their interests as any other class of men; and, when they find the products of their labor depressed in price, they hold them back in order to produce a demand for them and thereby obtain enhanced prices. Hence, since the fall in the price of flour, our mills have not been loaded with grain—the supply has been limited, though the crop was ample, and the stock in the country is known to be abundant.

"It is more than probable the recent importations of foreign grain into N. York were ordered in consequence of such fallacious statements as that I have just noticed, which are evidently calculated to produce erroneous apprehensions of a scarcity of flour, and prompt men to engage in ruinous speculations."

The foregoing remarks are, we believe, worthy of grave consideration. We are very confident the writer is correct in supposing that the stock of wheat and flour together is abundant.

CONNECTICUT. The number of banks in this state, is thirty-one—besides three branches. Litchfield county has only a branch of the Phoenix of Hartford—that county never having obtained a charter for banking. The banks are divided in the different counties as follows:

Hartford county, five—capitals paid in $3,417,
680. New Haven county, five—capitals, 1,998,
920. New London county, ten—capitals, 1,628,
531 50. Fairfield county, four—capitals, 658,
940. Windham county, three—capitals, 241,
990. Middlesex county, three—capitals, 705,
680. Tolland county, one—capital 60,000

Total of banking capitals in the state $6,744,697 50—nearly one half of which is located in the city of Hartford.

In March, 1837, the circulation of all these banks was $2,996,325—and if the process of curtailment of their circulation has been going on in other parts of the state, as it has here, which we suppose is the case, the amount of circulation of the Connecticut banks will but little, if any, exceed $1,000,000. Their specie in March, was over $400,000, and the amount when they suspended specie payments must have been greater—probably half a million. So that they now present, taken as a body, the highly favorable situation of having about one dollar in specie, to every two dollars of bills in circulation. Several of them have, it is believed, more specie in their vaults than they have bills in circulation. Some of the banks in this state are issuing small bills, under the law passed at the last session of the legislature. They are, of course, payable on demand in specie.

[Middletown Sentinel.]

An official document recently transmitted to congress from the treasury department, contains the following list of present deposit banks, and the amounts on deposit to the credits of the treasurer, in cash, by the last returns:

People's bank, Nov. 35, 1837,	$8,526 76
Brooklyn bank, Nov. 25, 1837,	$4,154 52
Planter's bank of Georgia, November 22, 1837,	$9,375 00
Insurance bank of Columbus, Louisville savings institution, Nov. 25, 1837,	20,495 48
Bank of the state of Missouri, Nov. 18, 1837,	167,382 79

INDIAN POPULATION. It appears from a communication of quarter master general Cross, made to the war department, and now recently published, that the number of Indians east of the Mississippi, is 47,365

Number of Indians who have emigrated from east to west side,	51,327
Number of indigenous tribes,	231,806

Aggregate, 332,498
It is estimated by Mr Harris, the Indian commissioner, that these Indians can bring into the field rising sixty-six thousand warriors, that is, when emigration is completed, and they choose to coalesce.

To resist such a coalition, general Cross thinks a force of 7,000 men would be necessary on the western frontier, distributed thus:

Fort Snelling,	300 men.
Fort Crawford,	300 do.
Upper forks of the Des Moines,	400 do.
Fort Leavenworth,	1200 do.
Fort Gibson,	1500 do.
Fort Towson,	800 do.
The 8 posts of refuge proposed,	800 do.
The protection of the 4 depots,	200 do.
Jef. barracks as a corps of reserve,	1000 do.
Total,	7,000 men.

THE VIRGINIA BANKS. The Richmond Whig says that the committee of the legislature of Virginia, appointed to investigate the affairs of the banks of that state, have reported that the banks are undoubtedly solvent, and accompanied their report with a bill for the relief of those institutions. The following is the substance of the bill.

The bill provides for repealing so much of the existing laws as operate a forfeiture of the charters of the banks for failing to redeem their notes in specie; and so much of the same law as requires said banks to pay higher damages or rate of interest than six per cent. for such failure.

It also remits any forfeiture which may have been already incurred, and renews the charters of the banks in all respects—reserving to the general assembly the right to re-enact the suspended provisions.

The notes of the banks to be continued to be received in payment of public dues; and the deposits of the revenue to be made as heretofore, in the bank of Virginia, and the Farmers' bank of Virginia. The prohibition of the issue of notes under $10 is suspended; but no notes to be issued under the denomination of $5.

The banks to make no dividend after a fixed day, unless specie payment be resumed by them; and if they fail to pay specie thereafter, then ten per cent. damages to be imposed and recovered.

It is further provided, that if the banks do resume specie payment after the day fixed, they shall forfeit and pay to the literary fund, the whole amount of profits over and above five per cent. per annum, accruing from and after that day, during the period of such suspension: Provided, however, that if the principal banks in New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore shall not have resumed specie payments before the date aforesaid, the legislature pledges itself to remit the forfeiture aforesaid.

MAIL ROBBERIES—Arrests. We learn from the Cincinnati Republican that the great northern mail, from Columbus to Toledo, was robbed, it is supposed, near Lyme, Huron county, Ohio. Both the mail-bags were cut open. The amount of loss sustained has not yet been ascertained. Upon the arrival of the mail at Lyme on the 1st inst., the postmaster of that office, (Mr. Lyman Strong,) with great promptitude, instituted an investigation, and strong suspicions resting upon a man named Houck, who was a passenger in the stage, he forthwith went in pursuit of him. He overtook and arrested him at Granville, and brought him to Columbus on the morning of the 4th inst., where he was fully committed for trial.

On the 26th ult., the postmaster of Kingsville, Ashtabula county, Ohio (Stephen Munger,) and his son, Harrison Munger, were arrested by Mr. James Brown, one of the agents of the post office department, on suspicion of robbing from the mail. They were committed, and will receive their trial at the next session of the U. S. Court to be held in Columbus, in May next.

It is stated that ten persons including those mentioned above have been arrested in Ohio alone, within the last two months, for depredations on the mails.—Alexandria Gazette..

FROM PERU. The following is an extract from a letter received by a gentleman in Salem, (Mass.) dated "Lima, Oct. 5, 1837: We have just received information that the long talked of expedition from Chili is on our coast. It sailed from Valparaiso on the 16th ultimo—3400 men, 700 horses, and 24 transports. A more foolish and hopeless expedition was never fitted out. It must end in ruin to Chili, and cause great distress to Peru. On the 24th ult. 18 of the vessels were seen in front of Arica. No attempt was made to land. Peru has from 10 to 12,000 troops, and so stationed that 5000 men can be united at any point on the coast in ten days. We have within ten leagues of Lima, 4000 good troops, and they could at any time be brought to the city in six hours. I have no fears for the capital."

FROM PORT-AU-PRINCE. Capt. St. John, of the brig Panope, at New York in 10 days from Port-au-Prince, informs the editors of the Journal of Commerce that the French fleet had not yet arrived, but was momentarily expected. A French brig of war entered the port the same morning that the Panope came out. Also, the United States corvette Boston. The object of the French fleet is to enforce the fulfilment of the treaty of indemnity, which the Haytiens, after paying one or two instalments, have found too onerous for their comfort.

LIBERATION OF MR. GREELEY. We stated in the last "REGISTER" that Mr. Greeley had been liberated. Gov. Kent, of Maine, has communicated to the legislature, the following, as the official account of his (Greeley's) liberation, which was brought about by the intercession or remonstrance of Mr. Stephenson, at the court of St. James.

To Edward W. Miller, esq. high sheriff of the county of York, and keeper of the jail of the said county.

Whereas, Ebenezer S. Greeley, a foreigner and citizen of the United States of America, stands committed to your custody by my warrant, bearing date the sixth day of September, 1837, as the agent of a foreign state, in committing an act of aggression on a part of the territory in the possession and under the jurisdiction and government of this province, and the said Greeley by my said warrant was so committed until the further order of the lieutenant governor or commander-in-chief of this province for the time being, should be given according to her majesty's pleasure; and whereas it having been made to appear to me that the offence for which the said Greeley was so committed will no longer be persisted in: these are to charge, authorise, and command you, the said Miller, as such high sheriff and keeper of the gaol of the said county of York, forthwith to discharge him, the said Greeley, out of your custody.

WM. F. ODELL.

I herewith communicate for your consideration, a letter received from E. S. Greeley, and also a copy of the order of his discharge, as certified by him. This language of the lieutenant governor in relation to the possession, jurisdiction, and government of the disputed territory by New Brunswick, is not perhaps otherwise important than as additional evidence that absolute and exclusive jurisdiction is claimed and insisted on. I will only add, that no communication from me, or any action of the executive department authorized the expression, "that the offence for which the said Greeley was so committed, will no longer be persisted in." E. KENT.

SURRENDER OF THE BARRERS. We regret to hear that governor Marcy has concluded to surrender to the British government the two men, father and son, charged with having fired a gun in the posse in Ireland on a collection for rent, in which a sergeant of police was killed. We are quite sure that this result creates regret even among the British agents in this city, whose duty it was to claim the surrender, but who never believed that it would or could be done. We ask for the law, for the treaty, for the power which induced governor Marcy to give up to the British authorities two persons who had resided here nearly ten years! We know that there is an understanding between the authorities of Canada and this state to deliver fugitives from justice reciprocally; this is proper, because a mere boundary line divides us, but are we bound by any consideration of duty, by our laws, by the spirit of the government, to surrender Irishmen who, from the unhappy disputes in that oppressed country, have committed crimes and have taken refuge here?

It will be recollected that the old man and his sons were defending their house which was assailed by an armed posse, and that he did not fire the gun which killed the police man, if he fired it at all, until one of his sons was killed at his side from a shot without. Since their arrival in this city, their conduct has been that of quiet industrious men. Nothing appears against them here, and they are transported from this free country to be tried and probably suffer death for this unfortunate act of self defence.

At all events we hope a petition will be got up addressed to the British government and signed by the citizens of this city, recommending them to mercy, which, we are sure, the American minister in London will take pleasure to present to the queen; and we further trust that no American ship will consent to take out these unfortunate prisoners. These are not the days of prison ships in our borders.—N. Y. Star.

AMERICAN GIPSIES. Gipsies are known in all countries in Europe—an idle vagabond race, without settled homes, living by theft, beggary, and fortune telling, and the mending of pots and kettles. They are of uncertain origin, but show the same characteristic marks, wherever they are found. No attempts have hitherto succeeded in reducing the gipsies of Europe to the habits of civilized life. It has been supposed that none of this singular race exist in America, where, in our woods and wilderness, their wandering propensities might have had double space for exercise. Yet, in fact, there is a colony of gipsies, who were brought to America by the French, in early times, and whose posterity now live and flourish on the shores of Biloxibay, in Louisiana. A philosopher, contemplating the points of similarity between the European gipsy and the American Indian, both untamable—one the wild man of civilized countries, and the other of the forest—might have imagined that the two races would at once have mingled, and the gipsy have found a home in the Indian wigwam. On the contrary, ever since their settlement on this side of the Atlantic, gipsies appear to have thrown off their hereditary characteristics. No difference can be perceived between them and other descendants of French colonists, except in personal appearance; their complexion is much darker, and their hair is coarse and straight. They still call themselves gipsies or Egyptians, but are industrious, orderly in their habits, and retain nothing of their ancestry, except the name.

AN UNENVIABLE SITUATION. On Thursday morning last, soon after two masons had gained the top of the chimney, (upwards of 80 yards high,) now being finished at the new saw-mill, by some misfortune the ropes connected with the blocks by which the materials were raised to the workmen, broke; and as it was only by the same rope that the workmen could be enabled to descend from this perilous eminence, it will be easily conceived that their situation was by no means an enviable one. Various means were attempted to get a line within their reach, by the help of a kite, and by other plans. At length 8 o'clock in the afternoon had arrived, and the three poor fellows were still roosting at their lawful elevation, when a distressed woman, wife to one of the unfortunates, had the joyful felicity to remember that her husband had on a new pair of knit stockings. "Use your knife," she cried out, "and cut off the toe of your stocking, continue the ravelling until you get a length sufficient to reach the earth, then attach a stone to it to sink it here." The man obeyed the oracle, as many have done, and in a short time he had a length of worsted long enough to reach the ground, which he let down. Well, the next business was to tie the worsted to a thin cord, which the men drew up, and the original rope for the block having been fastened to the cord, it was also drawn up, and by the men so adjusted as to enable them with safety to descend to terra firma. We are sure that great credit is due to the woman for the way in which she improved a lucky thought, and those persons who may perchance be subjected to a similar disaster to the one which befell these three men, should take care above all things never to forget the value of knit stockings in such an emergency.

OHIO COMMON SCHOOLS. We have been favored with a copy of the first annual report of the superintendent of these schools, which we find upon examination, to be a very able and satisfactory document. The legal foundation of common schools in this state is laid in the ordinance of congress providing for the government of the northwestern territory, of which Ohio formed a part, in the third article of which are these words: "Religion, morality, and knowledge, being necessary to good government and the happiness of mankind, schools, and the means of education shall forever be encouraged." The bill of rights, in the constitution of the state, carries out the same sentiment. But congress laid the foundation of these schools in the soil itself, by consecrating one-thirty-sixth part of it forever, to their support. The first law of the state, assessing a school-tax in 1825, is generally considered as the commencement of the system. The tax, which was at first but half a million the dollar, has gradually risen to a mill and a half, and power is given to increase it by townships, and some have done so. Common schools have by these means been extensively established.

No correct idea can be given of the system of instruction adopted, every variety, from the best to the worst, being found in them. Complaints are every where made that good teachers cannot be obtained. The truth is, that teachers, as well as others, will generally be governed by self-interest, and, unless their emoluments bear some proportion to the talents and labor required, suitable, qualified teachers need not be expected. The schools (says the superintendent) must furnish permanent employment to their teachers, and proper salaries be provided for them, and then there will be no difficulty in obtaining suitable characters to fill these trusts. Convenient school-houses and both male and female teachers must be every where provided, so that every child, whether rich or poor, shall be freely educated on equal terms, and neither expense nor labor be spared to effect the object. That the system will be costly, there is no doubt; but ought it not to be effected at any cost? No half-way measures will do; the effort must be powerful, simultaneous, and worthy of a great state.

A tabular statement appended to the superintendent's report, shows that, for the year ending Oct. 25, 1837, Ohio had in operation 4,336 public common schools, and 2,175 private, and that the former were attended by 107,845 scholars, and the latter by 42,557. That the number of their school houses is 4,378, and their value is estimated at $513,973.

MAINE STATE PRISON. The whole number of convicts in the state prison at Thomaston is 77—of whom, 17 are employed in the lime quarry, and 44 in shoemaking. The granite business has been discontinued, and the lime making substituted, by a new method introduced by the warden. In consequence of the small demand for lime, and its low price at the present time, the kiln was not put into operation until late in August. The business was then continued for about four months, by the process called the perpetual kiln, and in that period 4800 casks of lime were made. Hard coal is used in the process. All the labor, including the manufacture of the casks, is performed by the convicts, assisted only by an overseer in each department. The warden, Mr. O'Brien, in this respect, suggests the following improvements in the method of carrying on the business:

One method for obtaining an additional advantage might be to erect kilns on the side of the quarry near the prison buildings, and to secure the heat which passes off from the kilns, and conduct it by means of pipes to warm the cells and work shops; it might also be applied to the purposes of cooking. Such an arrangement would affect the saving of fuel. Another plan would be to erect kilns, at the prison wharf. Then by removing the surplus earth which covers an inexhaustible quantity of lime rock, within a few rods of the wharf, a gentle slope would be formed, on which the gravity of a loaded car, moving from the quarry to the kilns, would return the light one back from the kilns to the quarry. The coal for burning could be landed from the vessel on the wharf, and the lime would be already on the wharf as it came out of the kiln. This business, when under way, and properly managed, would save all the expense of team labor.

JAMES GARNETT, esq. of Essex county, Virginia, a gentleman who has been for many years president of the agricultural society of Fredericksburg, thus speaks of the passion for digging gold:

"This disemboweling passion has produced results, at least in regard to the precious metals, which, I venture to say, will greatly astonish all who are not apprised of the facts which I am now about to disclose to you. I give the statement from the sessions acts since 1832, having procured it from our first auditor's office. It is a most curious but painful disclosure, and one which I would willingly avoid, were it not for my thorough conviction that it may not only prove a very instructive lesson to all who will read it right, but will convince our agricultural brethren, to a man, that our legislature, for the last five years, not content utterly to neglect agriculture, have actually (I will not say intentionally) been busily engaged during a part of each session in passing laws highly injurious to her best interests. The effect has been produced by their holding out the strongest, most alluring temptations to draw from her much of the capital she so greatly needs, and to divert it to the most wild and hazardous speculations, thereby powerfully exciting that passion for inordinate gain, which is always sufficiently rash and pernicious of itself, without legislative encouragement to stimulate its mischievous action. This our law-makers have done to a fatal extent, by chartering, since 1832, no less than seventy mining companies, thirty-seven of which were incorporated from the 13th of last January to the 30th of March!! In several of those charters the object of pursuit is designated to be gold, in others copper; while in many of them the metallic character is not mentioned at all. Their aggregate capital is 5,795,043 dollars, with a right to increase it to 30,000,000 dollars and to hold land amounting in the whole to 197,000 acres—a territory larger than either of several of our smallest counties."

THE NEW RECORDER. It was announced in the court of sessions on Saturday, that Robert H. Morris, esq. has been appointed successor to the present recorder of this city, the hon. Richard Riker, whose term of office is on the eve of expiring. Mr. Riker has held the station for nearly twenty-three years.—N. Y. Jour. Com.

LATEST FROM FLORIDA.

We have been favored with the perusal of letters from Florida of the eighth and ninth of the present month, from an officer engaged in the arduous service of that region.

This gentleman writes at a spot about twenty miles south of Fort Jupiter. He describes a difficult march through briars, thick bearded saw grass, (which is strong, and from its name, cuts badly), in black mud up to the waist, and crossed where ten Indians might defy a hundred of the best troops in the world, from the peculiar situation of the country. He states that, at the solicitation of a negro prisoner, a talk was had with the Indians. "When the advanced guard had marched very near the Indians, we found them as they always are, with their rifles cocked, to fire upon us. When this negro found them, by a very different trail, the Indians told him (whom at first they were for killing) that if he was going to do good, he must stop the army, and they would then believe him. On his making his appearance the advanced guard, as also the balance of the army, halted, and general Jesup, with several officers, visited, or rather met the Indians. They being young warriors commanded by Hadjo, and merely a scouting party, stated that they were tired of the war, but could not make any terms, as the chiefs were not there. They requested until 12 o'clock today, (the 8th), when they would again see the general and have a talk; and, while I am writing general Jesup, with several officers, and a force at hand sufficient to guard against stratagem and surprise are now, in council about half a mile off and I hope something may be done to put an end to this almost interminable war—interminable, I say, because, the Almighty has placed these savages in a country inhabitable only by themselves, and where Xenophon's army could not displace them, so long as they choose to remain. They have fastnesses and hiding places, where they lie in ambush, wait until we come up fire upon the advance, kill and wound and then run off."

The writer says there is but one opinion as to the policy of permitting the Indians to remain. He passes a high compliment upon general Jesup, who, he says, has done every thing that man could have done. He adds, "it would have filled your bosom with pleasure to have seen on the day of the battle, (at Lochs Hatchee), these men charge the hammock and swim the creek, in the face of the enemy hid behind their trees, and amidst their fires and savage yells. Col. Z. Taylor penetrated to the west as far as possible but on account of the country has been compelled to fall back, and is now, I believe, at Fort Brooke or Bassinger. An express received last night informs us that one hundred and thirty, including negroes, men, women and children, have gone into him. Among them were forty-six men who bore arms."

"The clouds are gathering and indicate rain, which, should it come will put an end to this campaign; for the ground where I am now sitting would, with six hours rain, be overflowed some inches deep."

"7 o'clock P. M. The general and other officers have returned from the council, accompanied by Hadjo (a considerable character) and eight other Seminoles. They beg to be permitted to regain a small portion of the country. They say it is their home—the home of their fathers; that they were born here, and love the country, and would not leave it. The general has consented that they shall remain until they hear from Washington. They say they are tired of fighting; they don't wish to hurt the white man, nor trouble any thing belonging to him. In my opinion, they can be made useful allies, instead of a daring foe, and would occupy a portion of country uninhabitable by white men, unless possibly some more degenerate than the untutored savage. These Indians are very timid and suspicious for they have been told so many falsehoods, by mischievous persons, that they are very distrustful. They are not restrained, but permitted to go out again. Two of them stay in our camp to night from choice. They did not bring in their arms. To-morrow they will have another talk, when something more will be ascertained. Tustogee, who commanded on the 24th ult, was here at the talk, and will probably come in to-morrow."

A letter of the 9th says: "The general has just returned from the council, and the Indians have agreed to come in and go to the west, but they hope the president will permit them to remain in the country. They will come to the Lochs Hatchee and I still express my opinion that the policy of the government ought to be to permit them to remain. Our portion of the army will go westward and co-operate with some other division; though the probability, is that the rest of the Indians will come in."

DUEL BETWEEN MESSRS. GRAVES AND CILLEY.

From the Globe of Monday evening, the 26th ult.
STATEMENT.

February 26th, 1838.

The following is a statement of the facts of the duel between the honorable Wm. J. Graves, of Kentucky, and the honorable Jonathan Cilley, of Maine, as agreed upon by George W. Jones, and Henry A. Wise, the seconds of the parties, committed to writing between the hours of 10½ o'clock, a. m. February 25th, and 12 o'clock, m. this day. The seconds propose, first, to state the correspondence which occurred before the challenge, and which was communicated through others than themselves; neither second having borne any paper or message, verbal or written, to or from either of the principals, until Mr. Wise bore the challenge and Mr. Jones bore the acceptance. This correspondence, as it has been placed in the hands of the seconds, is as follows, to wit:

Mr. Graves to Mr. Cilley.

House of representatives,
February 20, 1838.

In the interview which I had with you this morning, when you declined receiving from me the note of col. J. W. Webb, asking whether you were correctly reported in the Globe in what you are there represented to have said of him in this house upon the 12th inst, you will please say whether you did not remark, in substance, that in declining to receive the note, you hoped I would not consider it in any respect disrespectful to me, and that the ground on which you rested your declining to receive the note was distinctly this: that you could not consent to get yourself into personal difficulties, with conductors of public journals, for what you might think proper to say in debate upon this floor in discharge of your duties as a representative of the people; and that you did not rest your objection, in our interview, upon any personal objections to col. Webb as a gentleman.

Very respectfully,
Your obedient servant,
W. J. GRAVES.

Hon. Jonathan Cilley.

Mr. Cilley to Mr. Graves.

House of representatives,
February 21, 1838.

The note which you just placed in my hands has been received. In reply, I have to state that in your interview with me this morning, when you proposed to deliver a communication from col. Webb, of the New York Courier and Enquirer, I declined to receive it, because I chose to be drawn into no controversy with him. I neither affirmed or denied any thing in regard to his character; but when you remarked that this course on my part might place you in an unpleasant situation, I stated to you, and now repeat, that I intended by the refusal no disrespect to you.

Very respectfully,
Your obedient servant,
JONA. CILLEY.

Hon. W. J. Graves.

Mr. Graves to Mr. Cilley,

House of representatives,
February 22, 1838.

Sir: Your note of yesterday in reply to mine of that date is inexplicit, unsatisfactory and insufficient; among other things in this: that, in your declining to receive col. Webb's communication, it does not disclaim any exception to him personally as a gentleman. I have, therefore, to inquire whether you declined to receive his communication, on the ground of any personal exception to him as a gentleman or man of honor? A categorical answer is expected.

Very respectfully,
W. J. GRAVES.

Hon. J. Cilley.

Mr. Cilley to Mr. Graves.

House of Representatives,
February 22, 1838.

Sir: Your note of this date has just been placed in my hands. I regret that mine of yesterday was not satisfactory to you, but I cannot admit the right on your part to propound the question to which you ask a categorical answer, and therefore decline any further response to it.

Very respectfully,
JONA. CILLEY.

Hon. W. J. Graves.

Here follows the first paper borne by Mr. Wise.
Washington city, Feb. 23, 1838.

As you have declined accepting a communication which I bore to you from col. Webb, and as by your note of yesterday you have refused to decline on grounds which would exonerate me from all responsibility growing out of the affair, I am left no other alternative but to ask that satisfaction which is recognised among gentlemen. My friend, hon. Henry A. Wise, is authorised by me to make the arrangements suitable to the occasion.

Your obedient servant,
W. J. GRAVES.

Hon. J. Cilley.

Mr. Wise states that he presented the foregoing challenge to Mr. Cilley, in the parlor at Mr. Birth's boarding house a few minutes before 12 o'clock, m. on Friday, the 23d instant.

In addition to the foregoing correspondence, the seconds propose to relate only such facts and circumstances as occurred within their joint knowledge, after their own participation in the melancholy affair.

On the evening of the 23d instant, about the hour of 5 o'clock, p. m. Mr. Jones, the second of Mr. Cilley, delivered to Mr. Graves, in the room of Mr. Wise, and in his presence, the following note, which was the first paper borne by Mr. Jones, to wit:

Washington city, 23d Feb. 1838.

Hon. W. J. Graves:

Your note of this morning has been received. My friend, gen. Jones, will "make the arrangements suitable to the occasion."

Your ob't serv't,
JONA. CILLEY.

Immediately upon the presentation of the acceptance of the challenge, Mr. Graves retired, leaving Mr. Jones with Mr. Wise, who submitted to Mr. Wise the following propositions for the arrangement of the meeting, to wit:

Washington, Feb. 23, 1838.

Sir: Mr. Cilley proposes to meet Mr. Graves, at such place as may be agreed upon between us, to-morrow, at 12 o'clock, m. The weapons to be used on the occasion shall be rifles; the parties placed side to side at eighty yards distance from each other; to hold the rifles horizontally at arm's length, downwards; the rifles to be cocked, and triggers set; the words to be, "Gentlemen are you ready?" After which, neither answering "No" the words shall be, in regular succession, "Fire—one, two, three, four." Neither party shall fire before the word "fire" nor after the word "four." The positions of the parties at the ends of the line to be determined by lot. The second of the party losing the position shall have the giving of the word. The dress to be ordinary winter clothing, and subject to the examination of both parties. Each party may have on the ground, besides his second, a surgeon and two other friends. The seconds, for the execution of their respective trusts, are allowed to have a pair of pistols each on the ground, but no other person shall have any weapon. The rifles to be loaded in the presence of the seconds. Should Mr. Graves not be able to procure a rifle by the time prescribed, time shall be allowed for that purpose.

Your very obedient servant,
GEO. W. JONES.

Hon. Henry A. Wise.

About 9 o'clock, p. m. at Mr. Jones' room, at Dowson's Mr. Wise returned to him the following answer, to wit:

Washington, Feb. 23d, 1838.

Sir: The terms arranging the meeting between Mr. Graves and Mr. Cilley, which you presented to me this evening though unusual and objectionable, are accepted; with the understanding that the rifles are to be loaded with a single ball, and that neither party is to raise his weapon from the downward horizontal position until the word "fire."

I will inform you, sir, by the hour of 11 o'clock, a. m. to-morrow, whether Mr. Graves has been able to procure a rifle, and consequently whether he will require a postponement of the time of meeting.

Your very obedient servant,
HENRY A. WISE.

Hon. Geo. W. Jones,

About 8 o'clock, a. m. on the 24th inst. Mr. Jones left at Mr. Wise's room the following note, to wit:

Washington city, D. C.
February 24, 1838.

Sir: I will receive, at doct. Reilly's on F street, any communication you may see proper to make me, until 11 o'clock, a. m. to-day.

Respectfully,
Your obedient servant,
GEO. W. JONES.

Hon. H. A. Wise.

10 o'clock, a. m.

Sir: I have called at this place, in conformity with your note of this morning, to inform you that Mr. Graves has not as yet been able to procure a rifle and put it in order, and cannot be ready by 12 o'clock, m. to-day. He is desirous, however, to have the meeting to-day, if possible, and I will inform you by half past 12 o'clock, m. to-day what time to procure and prepare a weapon he will require.

Very respectfully, &c.
HENRY A. WISE.

Hon. George W. Jones

Washington, 10½ a. m.
February 24th, 1838

Sir: Your note dated at 10 o'clock to-day is received,

In reply, I have the pleasure to inform you that I have in my possession an excellent rifle, in good order, which is at the service of Mr. Graves.

Very respectfully, &c.
GEO. W. JONES.

Hon. Henry A. Wise.

Afterwards Mr. Jones sent to Mr. Wise's room the following note, to wit:

Washington,
Feb. 24, 1838, 11 a. m.

Sir: Through the politeness of my friend, doct. Duncan, I now tender to you, for the use of Mr. Graves, the rifle referred to in my note of 10½, a. m. this morning.

Respectfully,
Your ob't servant,
GEO. W. JONES.

Hon. H. A. Wise.

And with this note a rifle and powder flask, and balls were left at Mr. Wise's room.

After the reception of this note from Mr. Jones, Mr. Wise called on him, at Dr. Reilly's, and informed Mr. Jones that Mr. Graves had procured a rifle other than that left at his room by Dr. Duncan, and would be ready for the meeting at 3 o'clock, p. m. It was then agreed that the parties should meet at the Anacosta bridge, on the road to Marlborough, in Maryland, between the hours of 1½ and 2½ o'clock, p. m. and if either got there first he should wait for the other, and that they would thence proceed out of the district. Accordingly, the parties met at the bridge, Mr. Cilley and his party arriving there first, and all proceeded, about 2 o'clock, p. m. to the place of meeting. On arriving at the place, Mr. Jones and Mr. Wise immediately proceeded to mark off the ground. They then decided the choice of positions. Mr. Wise won the position, and consequently Mr. Jones had the giving of the word. At this time Mr. Jones was informed by Mr. Wise that two gentlemen (Mr. Calhoun of Kentucky and Mr. Hawes of Kentucky) were at some distance off, spectators, but they should not approach upon the ground. Mr. Jones replied that he objected to their coming on the ground, as it was against the articles of the meeting, but he entertained for them the highest respect. Mr. Wise also informed Mr. Jones that, contrary to the terms, he had brought on the ground two rifles; that if he (Mr. Jones) required him to do so, he would immediately send one of them away. Upon Mr. Jones finding that the rifle was unloaded, he consented that it should remain in one of the carriages. There were, it is proper to remark, several persons on the ground, (besides the hack-drivers and the two gentlemen before mentioned at a distance,) who were there without the authority or consent of either party or their friends, as far as is known either to Mr. Jones or Mr. Wise, and one of these persons was supposed to be the owner of the field. Shortly after the hour of 3 o'clock, p. m. the rifles were loaded in the presence of the seconds; the parties were called together; they were fully instructed by Mr. Jones as to their position, and the words twice repeated to them, as they would be, and as they were, delivered to them, in the exchange of shots. After this they were ordered to their respective positions, the seconds assumed their places, and the friends accompanying the seconds were disposed along the line of fire to observe that each obeyed the terms of meeting. Mr. Jones gave the words distinctly, audibly, and in regular succession, and the parties exchanged shots without violating in the least a single instruction. They both missed. After which, Mr. Wise called upon the friends generally to assemble and to hear what was to be said. Upon the assembling of the friends, Mr. Jones inquired of Mr. Wise whether his friend (Mr. Graves) was satisfied? Mr. Wise immediately said, in substance: "Mr. Jones, these gentlemen have come here without animosity towards each other; they are fighting merely upon a point of honor; cannot Mr. Cilley assign some reason for not receiving at Mr. Graves's hands col. Webb's communication, or make some disclaimer which will relieve Mr. Graves from his position?" Mr. Jones replied, in substance: "Whilst the challenge is impending, Mr. Cilley can make no explanations." Mr. Wise said, in substance: "The exchange of shots suspends the challenge, and the challenge is suspended for the purpose of explanation." Mr. Jones thereupon said he would see Mr. Cilley, and did go to him. He returned, and asked Mr. Wise again: "Mr. Wise, do I understand aright that the challenge is suspended?" Mr. Wise answered: "It is." Mr. Jones was then about to proceed, when Mr. Wise suggested that it was best, perhaps, to give the explanation or reason in writing. Mr. Jones then said, in substance: "Mr. Wise, if you require me to put what I have to say in writing, I shall require you to put what you have said, or may say, in writing." Mr. Wise replied: "Well, let us hear the explanation beforehand, as it may not be necessary to put it in writing." Mr. Jones then proceeded, as he now thinks, substantially to say: "I am authorized by my friend, Mr. Cilley, to say, that in declining to receive the note from Mr. Graves, purporting to be from col. Webb, he meant no disrespect to Mr. Graves, because he entertained for him then, as he now does, the highest respect and most kind feelings; but that he declined to receive the note, because he chose not to be drawn into any controversy with col. Webb." Mr. Wise thinks this answer to Mr. Jones was, in substance, as follows: "I am authorized by my friend Mr. Cilley, to say, that in declining to receive the note from Mr. Graves, purporting to be from col. Webb, he meant no disrespect to Mr. Graves, because he entertained for him then, as he does now, the highest respect and the most kind feelings; but my friend refuses to disclaim disrespect for col. Webb, because he does not choose to be drawn into an expression of opinion as to him." Such is the substantial difference now between the two seconds, as to this answer of Mr. Jones. The friends on each side, with the seconds, then retired from each other to consult upon this explanation. After consultation, Mr. Wise returned to Mr. Jones, and said: "Mr. Jones, this answer leaves Mr. Graves precisely in the position in which he stood when the challenge was sent." Much conversation then ensued between the seconds and their friends, but no nearer approach to reconciliation being made, the challenge was renewed, and another shot was exchanged in a manner perfectly fair and honorable to all parties. After this, the seconds and the friends again assembled, and the challenge was again withdrawn, and a very similar conversation to that after the first exchange of shots again ensued. Mr. Jones then remarked: "Mr. Wise, my friend, in coming to the ground, and exchanging shots with Mr. Graves, has shown to the world, that in declining to receive the note of col. Webb, he did not do so because he dreaded a controversy. He has shown himself a brave man, and disposed to render satisfaction to Mr. Graves. I do think that he has done so, and that the matter should end here." To this, Mr. Wise replied in substance: "Mr. Jones, Mr. Cilley has already expressed his respect for Mr. Graves in the written correspondence and Mr. Graves does not require of Mr. Cilley a certificate of character for col. Webb; he considers himself bound not only to preserve the respect due to himself, but to defend the honor of his friend, col. Webb." These words of Mr. Wise, Mr. Jones recollects, and Mr. Wise thinks he added the words: "Mr. Graves only insists that he has not borne the note of a man who is not a man of honor, and not a gentleman." After much more conversation, and ineffectual attempts to adjust the matter, the challenge was again renewed; and whilst the friends were again loading the rifles for the third exchange of shots, Mr. Jones and Mr. Wise walked apart, and each proposed to the other anxiously to settle the affair. Mr. Wise asked Mr. Jones "If Mr. Cilley could not assign the reason for declining to receive the note of col. Webb, that he (Mr. Cilley) did not hold himself accountable to col. Webb for words spoken in debate?" Mr. Jones replied that "Mr. Cilley would not assign that reason, because he did not wish to be understood as expressing the opinion whether he was or was not accountable for words spoken in debate." Mr. Wise then, according to his recollection, asked Mr. Jones whether "Mr. Cilley would not say, that in declining to receive the note of col. Webb, he meant no disrespect to Mr. Graves, either directly or indirectly?" To which Mr. Jones replied in the affirmative, adding, "Mr. Cilley entertains the highest respect for Mr. Graves, but declined to receive the note, because he chose to be drawn into no controversy with col. Webb. After further explanatory conversation, the parties then exchanged the third shot, fairly and honorably, as in every instance. Immediately previous to the last exchange of shots, Mr. Wise said to Mr. Jones, "If this matter is not terminated this shot, and is not settled; I will propose to shorten the distance." To which Mr. Jones replied, "After this shot, without effect, I will entertain the proposition."

After Mr. Cilley fell, Mr. Wise, for Mr. Graves, expressed a desire to Mr. Jones to see Mr. Cilley. Mr. Jones replied to Mr. Wise, "My friend is dead;" and went on to Mr. Graves, and told him that there was no objection to his request to see Mr. Cilley. When Mr. Jones approached Mr. Graves, and informed him that his request should be granted, Mr. Graves inquired, "How is he?" The reply was, "My friend is dead, sir." Mr. Graves then went to his carriage. Mr. Wise inquired of Mr. Jones, before leaving the ground, whether he could render any service, and tendered all the aid in his power. Mr. Wise and Mr. Jones concur that there were three shots exchanged.

Such is the naked statement of all the material facts and circumstances attending this unfortunate affair of honor, which we make in justice to our friends, to ourselves, to all concerned, to the living and to the dead; and it is made for the only purpose of allaying excitement in the public mind, and to prevent any and all further controversy upon a subject, which already is full enough of woe. We have fully and substantially stated wherein we agree and disagree. We cordially agree, at all events, in bearing unqualified testimony to the fair and honorable manner in which this duel was conducted. We endeavored to discharge our duties according to that code under which the parties met, regulated by magnanimous principles, and the laws of humanity. Neither of us has taken the least exception to the course of the other; and we sincerely hope that here all controversy whatever may cease. We especially desire our respective friends to make no publication on the subject. None can regret the termination of the affair more than ourselves, and we hope again that the last of it will be the signatures of our names to this paper, which we now affix.

THE ALTON AFFAIR.

A brief notice that the Alton trials had resulted in the acquittal of all the parties, has been for some time travelling the rounds of our newspaper press. These trials involved the riots, arson, and murder of last November, at Alton, and such reports as we have seen are very perplexed and unsatisfactory.

In the first case that attracted my attention, it appeared that the court disclaimed jurisdiction. From what I could collect, the court was a newly organized city tribunal, which, with its entire jurisdiction, had been created subsequent to the transactions drawn into question before it. Hence its disclaimer of jurisdiction. In that case, the jury found the defendants guilty of the facts charged, and not guilty for defect of jurisdiction of the court. To the profession, generally, this would appear a most anomalous proceeding, indicating a mere mockery of justice. Whether the other cases were brought on before the same unauthorized court, or whether it was rendered competent to try and punish, we are not advised. The parties implicated have been subjected to the form of trial, and have got the benefits of an acquittal. It is due to the country that these trials should be better understood.

The Alton Telegraph, edited by J. Baillhache, gives us a sketch of the trials which last look place. They appear to have been had in the municipal court. The parties who defended the house were charged with a riot in one indictment; the assailants were charged with the same offence, in another indictment. We subjoin the Telegraph sketch of this latter trial.

"On the part of the people, it was proved that the press had arrived by steamboat a day or two previous to the 7th of November, consigned to Mr. A. B. Rolf, but was landed at Messrs. Godfrey & Gilman's warehouse, where it was stored; that said warehouse was built by those gentlemen in 1832, and has been since that time owned and occupied by them, as forwarding and commission merchants; that, on the afternoon of November 7, one of the defendants had told the witness (H. H. West, esq.) that the boys were going to attack the warehouse, and that it would either be blown up or burnt, unless the press was given up; and that some of the defendants were in a company of about twenty-five, that formed a line from a certain grocery, swearing that they would have the press at all hazards. It was also proved that two guns or pistols were fired from the outside of the warehouse at those within; that showers of stones were discharged against the front of the building, by which the windows were demolished; that, during the attack, a man named Bishop was shot from the inside of the warehouse; that some of the defendants were seen carrying away his body, observing that one of their men had been wounded; that Mr. Gillman addressed the crowd from the third story of the building, requesting them to desist, and stating that he was defending his property, which he felt it his duty to do at the risk of his life; that he was replied to by one of the defendants, as spokesman for the rest, who observed that they were determined to destroy the press, if it cost them their lives.

"It was also proved by the mayor and S. W. Robbins, a justice of the peace, that they identified several of the defendants, with arms in their hands, declaring that they would have the press; that a man was seen going towards the warehouse with fire in his hands, swearing that he would burn down the building; that a ladder was set up against the side, and the fire actually communicated to the roof; that at this time Mr. West went in with the mayor to propose a capitulation, by which it was stipulated that if those inside would leave the warehouse and give up the press, they should not be injured, and no other property except the press molested; that the building was accordingly abandoned by Mr. Gilman and its other defenders, as the only means left them to prevent its destruction, and that of their own lives; that they were fired upon by some of the crowd as they retreated; that, upon their leaving the warehouse, it was immediately entered by some of the defendants, and others; that the press was thrown out and demolished with a sledgehammer, &c.

"This constitutes the sum of the evidence on the part of the prosecution. On the part of the defendants it was proven by Mr. Gillman that he was not the owners of the press, and had no further interest in it than the liability of himself and partner for its safe-keeping. After argument by counsel, the case was submitted to the jury, who returned a verdict of not guilty.

THE HON. MR. RUGGLES.

The following is Mr. Jones's statement of the transaction with Mr. Ruggles in relation to his patent lock.

State of New Jersey, Essex county, to wit:—Be it remembered that on this tenth day of February, in the year of our Lord, 1838, before me, Jacob L. Douglass one of the justices of the peace in and for the county of Essex aforesaid duly commissioned and sworn and residing at the city of Newark, in said county, personally appeared Henry C. Jones, of the city of Newark aforesaid, of full age, who being by me duly sworn according to law, on his oath deposeth and saith: that in the month of January last, he, this deponent, went to the city of Washington, for the purpose of ascertaining the sufficiency of the specification, upon which a patent of a lock for trunks, bags &c. had been previously granted to this deponent, and of procuring a new patent, if the former should prove insufficient, and also with the view of introducing his said lock into more general notice, and of procuring its adoption by the post office department, if possible.

That on or about the 25th January last past, this deponent applied to the hon. Henry L. Ellsworth, commissioner of the patent office, at the patent office in the city of Washington, and requested his opinion as to the sufficiency of the specification on which his patent had been granted, and was by him referred to Dr. Jones and Mr. Keller, whom he found in a private apartment in the patent office, known as the secret archives, and also a third person, then unknown to this deponent.

That the deponent then submitted his patent and specification, to the three persons above mentioned, all of whom concurred in declaring them to be insufficient; this deponent thereupon inquired for a competent person whom he could procure to draw a new and correct specification, when the person above alluded to, and who was then unknown to this deponent, offered to draw a new specification for the deponent, and on this deponent's enquiring what would be his charge for so doing, answered that "he did not know, perhaps nothing; he would see when it was done." This deponent then enquired for his address, and on its being given, learned, to his surprise, that he was the hon. John Ruggles, U. S. senator from Maine. This deponent by the invitation of Mr. Ruggles, called upon him at his lodgings, on the evening of that day, and also on the evenings of the two succeeding days, and during those interviews had considerable conversation with Mr. Ruggles respecting the lock which this deponent had invented, and for which he was desirous to obtain a new patent. In the course of these conversations, Mr. Ruggles spoke repeatedly and strongly of the great difficulty of preparing specifications correctly, and of the large number of specifications that were incorrectly made, and also observed that he was the framer of the present patent law, and could therefore prepare specifications under it better than any other person.

During the conversation above named, this deponent also expressed his desire to procure the adoption of his lock for mail bags, by the post-office department, and Mr. Ruggles said he had considerable influence with the post office department, and proposed to this deponent, that if this deponent would give him an interest in the profits arising from the manufacture and sale of the locks, he (Mr. R.) would use his influence to procure its adoption by the department. Mr. Ruggles at the same time proposed that the assignment of interest in the lock should be made in the name of his (Mr. Ruggles') brother who lives at Worcester, Massachusetts, and requested this deponent not to let it be known, that he (Mr. R.) had any interest in the lock, as, if known, it might lessen his influence in procuring it to be adopted by the post office department. This deponent objected to making an assignment to Mr. Ruggles' brother, without having seen him, and Mr. Ruggles subsequently, in one of the committee rooms at the capitol, said that he would take the assignment in his own name.

Several days having elapsed after Mr. Ruggles had undertaken to prepare the specification, and this deponent being desirous to return home, and to avoid the expense of a protracted stay at Washington, he became urgent with Mr. Ruggles to complete the specification, and finally, on the first day of this present month, Mr. Ruggles informed this deponent that the specification was completed. They accordingly on the same day, went together to the patent office and after this deponent had made affidavit to the specification which Mr. Ruggles had prepared, and this deponent had also paid to the proper officer the fees required for securing a new patent, he, this deponent, requested Mr. Ruggles to deliver to him the specification to be deposited with the proper officer and also the old patent that he might give it up to be cancelled, which was necessary to be done before a new patent could be obtained. Mr. Ruggles declined giving them to the deponent alleging that he wished to make some alteration in the specification in order to render it more correct, to which the deponent objected inasmuch as it had been sworn to by him and therefore ought not to be altered. Mr. Ruggles then requested this deponent to retire with him into the apartment used as a depository of models, and there presented to this deponent a paper purporting to be a memorandum of covenants and agreements between the said John Ruggles and this deponent, which he requested this deponent to sign, and of which the following is a true copy from the original now in the possession of this deponent, omitting the erasures—

"Memorandum of covenants and agreements made and entered into by and between Henry C. Jones, of Newark, in the state of New Jersey on one part, and John Ruggles of Thomaston, in the state of Maine, on the other part, witnesseth, that whereas the said Jones has taken out a patent for an improved lock for mail pouches, bags, trunks, chests, &c., and the said Ruggles has become interested by assignment in the said patent—Now, therefore, in consideration thereof, the said Jones claiming the special right, during the term of the patent, of manufacturing all said locks, which the said Ruggles, his agents or assigns shall want, or for which he or they may find a sale, the said Jones for himself, his heirs and assigns, covenants and agrees to manufacture and deliver all said locks which said Ruggles, his heirs or assigns may apply for, with reasonable promptness and despatch: and the locks which said Ruggles shall so receive, he shall account for and pay to said Jones, his heirs or assigns, three fourths of the amount or price which he or they shall receive or realize from others generally. And the said Jones on his part, for himself, his heirs and assigns, covenants and agrees to render an account to the said Ruggles, his heirs and assigns, of all said locks he, his heirs or assigns shall dispose of, and pay to said Ruggles, his heirs or assigns, one fourth part of the sums or price received therefor, (not, however, being accountable for bad debts contracted in the state thereof,) first deducting the expense of manufacturing the same.

This deponent took the said paper, but declined signing it at the time, saying that he wished opportunity to examine it. Mr. Ruggles strongly urged deponent to sign said writing, saying, among other things, that he had discovered an improvement of the lock which he would communicate to this deponent, if he would sign the said paper, but this deponent persisted in declining to sign it. In the course of the conversation which then took place, this deponent remarked that he wished his lock to stand on its own merits; and to which Mr. Ruggles replied—"Things do not go down here on their own merit, but by pulling the right strings, and if you will make me interested, I will pull the right string, otherwise, I will have nothing to do about it, unless you will sign the paper before you go home." This deponent and Mr. Ruggles then parted. Mr. Ruggles taking with him the specification and the old patent; the latter, however, the deponent succeeded in obtaining from him on the evening of the same day, and having by the aid of real friends, procured a new specification to be prepared by a competent person, succeeded at last in procuring a new patent without the friendly offices and assistance of the hon. John Ruggles, of Thomaston in the state of Maine, and without sacrificing the quarter part of his earnings for fourteen years to come.

HENRY C. JONES,

Sworn to and subscribed the day and year first above written before me.

Justice of the peace.

OFFICIAL—FIRE.

West Point, Feb. 19, 1838.

Sir: It becomes my duty to inform you that the buildings occupied by the engineering, chemical, and philosophical departments, and the library, were consumed last night by fire. The fire originated in one of the engineering rooms, used on Sundays as a reading room, and was not discovered until it had so far spread as to render all efforts to extinguish it useless.

In communicating this unfortunate occurrence to you, it is gratifying to have it in my power to state that the books of the library, the philosophical instruments, and the chemical apparatus, were all saved, by the timely exertions of the officers and cadets. Of course, many articles have been more or less injured in the rapid manner in which they had to be removed, but the loss will be considerable, compared with the value of property exposed. The adjutant's office was immediately over the room where the fire originated, and I regret to inform you that all the records and papers were destroyed. I have been busy this forenoon in having the books and instruments secured, and have occupied rooms at the hotel for that purpose.

The misfortune will only cause a delay of two or three days in the academic exercises.

I have, sir, to request that a court of inquiry may be ordered for the purpose of investigating the cause of the accident.

No time will be lost in laying before you the extent of the damages sustained.

With the highest respect,

I have the honor to be, sir,

Your obedient servant,

R. E. DE RUSSEY,

Lieut. col. and superintendent M. A.

Brig. Gen. CHARLES GRATIOT,
Chief Engineer. U. S.

IMPORTANT FROM DETROIT.

From the Cleveland Advertiser.

The following letter was received by this morning's mail, from a gentleman, a resident of this city, now in Detroit, whose statements are made from personal observation, and may be relied upon as correct:

Detroit, Friday, Feb. 16.

As but little intelligence has recently been found in the Detroit journals as to the progress of the revolution in Canada, you may be desirous of being advised of passing events upon this portion of the frontier. I have just passed from Lower Sandusky to this city, and have collected all the information as to the plans, the strength of the patriots, and also the means of resistance with which they are to be opposed by the provincial government. A profound silence is attempted to be maintained here as to the offensive movements of the patriots; so much so, indeed, that by many, even here, the enterprise is supposed to be abandoned; and were I not satisfied that a decisive blow will be struck before you shall have received this letter, I should not feel at liberty to address you on the subject.

Gen. Van Rensselaer is here in person, though he appears only "incog.," and Southerland and Freeland are also here, and Duncombe and McKenzie are supposed to be here. The militia have been ordered out, under the command of gen. Brady, to maintain the stipulated neutrality between the United States government and that of the Canadas; but general B., finding their sympathies so strongly in favor of the patriot cause was obliged to discharge them. The only force, therefore, now engaged in this service is a company of the United States troops, sent from Buffalo by general Scott, which is stationed at Gibraltar. The patriot army which is scattered along this portion of the frontier, is from fifteen hundred to two thousand strong, and is well supplied by its officers, with all the necessary munitions of war. Few, however, of the soldiers are to be found in the principal towns, but are dispersed through the interior at some distance from the shore, who stand ready, at a moment's warning, to rush to the rallying points, and enter upon actual service. Despatches were yesterday sent to different quarters, the object of which, as is supposed, was to collect, and march to the point designated for the complete organization of the army. You will see, therefore, that, should nothing occur to arrest the present movements, a descent will be made upon Canada as early as Sunday or Monday next. The intention is to cross the ice a mile or more below Gibraltar, and enter the province at a sufficient distance from the fort at Malden to avoid being borne down upon by the ordinance stationed there for its defence.

In relation to the force at Malden, it is variously estimated at from five to eleven hundred regular troops; the latter of which must fall nearer the truth, provided the intelligence of last evening was correct, that a reinforcement of eight hundred men from Toronto had been received. Prior to this, however, the force at Malden must have been very inconsiderable.

You will see, from what I have written, that the spirit of revolution is not, as has been supposed, extinguished. It is true, indeed, that some of its leading enterprises have miscarried; but it is also true that, while the fortune of war seemed unpropitious, the brutality and oppression which have been executed upon those who, during the recent struggle, have fallen into the hands of tyrants, have fanned the fire of revolution into a fiercer flame.

I am, in haste, truly yours, &c.

Detroit, Saturday, Feb. 17.

"Intelligence reached here this morning that the patriots crossed over to the Canada shore last evening, with a strong force. They entered the province below Malden, according to previous arrangements."

Correspondence of the Albany Argus.

Adams, Jefferson, co. Feb. 19, 1838.

The state arsenal at Watertown was broken open last evening, and some 500 muskets was taken out. Fairbanks, who is the keeper, has offered a reward of $250 for the recovery of them.

There begins to be some excitement here upon the subject of Canada. Many loads of men and provisions have been and are now passing here for the north.

Some of them have called at the different stores for powder, and have bought all that was for sale by the keg. Whether it will amount to any thing or not, we cannot determine.

[The report is, that there is a considerable force on the frontier, in Jefferson county, and that a descent upon Canada, at some point, is contemplated. We doubt it, however.]

A letter from Hamilton, dated 12th February, in the Rochester Democrat, states that there was a riot at Toronto on the 9th, in which four were killed and several wounded.

SPEECH OF MR. WEBSTER,

OF MASSACHUSETTS,

Wednesday, January 31, 1838,

ON THE SUB-TREASURY BILL.

"Let the government attend to its own business, and let the people attend to theirs."

"Let the government take care that it secures a sound currency for its own use, and let it leave all the rest to the states and the people."

These ominous sentences, Mr. President, have been ringing in my ears ever since they were uttered yesterday by the member from New York. Let the government take care of itself, and the people take care of themselves. This is the whole principle and policy of the administration, at the present most critical moment, and on this great and all-absorbing question of the currency.

Sir, this is an ill-boding announcement. It has nothing of consolation, of solace, or of hope in it.

It will carry through all the classes of commerce and business nothing but more discouragement and deeper fears. And yet this is but repetition. It is only a renewed exhibition of the same spirit which was breathed by the message and the bill of the last session, of which this bill is also full, and which has pervaded all the recommendations and all the measures of government since May. Yet I confess that I am not, even yet, so familiar with it, so accustomed to hear such sentiments avowed, as that they cease to astonish me. I am either groping in thick and palpable darkness myself, in regard to the true objects of the constitution, and the duties of congress under it, or else these principles of public policy, thus declared, are at war with our most positive and urgent obligations.

The honorable member made other observations indicative of the same general tone of political feeling. Among his chosen topics of commendation of the bill before us, a prominent one was, to shelter the administration from that shower of imputations, as he expressed the idea, which would always beat upon it as it beats now, when disasters should happen to the currency. Indeed! And why should the administration, now or ever, be sheltered from that shower? Is not currency a subject over which the power and duty of government extend? Is not government justly responsible for its condition? It is not, of necessity, wholly and entirely under the control and regulation of political power? Is it not a matter, in regard to which, the people cannot, by any possibility, protect themselves, any more than they can, by their own individual efforts, supercede the necessity of the exercise by government of any other political power? What can the people do for themselves, to improve the currency? Sir, the government is justly answerable for the disasters of the currency, saving always those accidents which cannot at all times be foreseen or provided against. It is at least answerable for its own neglect, if it shall be guilty of it, in not exercising all its constitutional authority for the correction and restoration of the currency. Why does it, how can it, shrink from this responsibility? Why does it seek not the laurels of victory, not the reputation, even of manly contest, but the poor honors of studied and eager escape? Sir, it never can escape. The common sense of all men pronounces that the government is, and ought to be, and must be, answerable for the regulation of the currency of the country; that it ought to abide, and must abide, the peltings of the storm of imputation, so long as it turns its back upon this momentous question, and seeks to shelter itself in the safes and the vaults, the cells and the caverns of a sub-treasury system.

But of all governments that ever existed, the present administration has least excuse for withdrawing its care from the currency, or shrinking from its just responsibility in regard to it.

Its predecessor, to whose footsteps it professes to tread, has interfered, fatally interfered, with that subject. That interference was, and has been, the productive cause of our disasters. Did the administration disclaim power over the currency in 1833, when it removed the deposits? And what meant all its subsequent transactions, all its professions, and all its efforts, for that better currency which it promised, if, in truth, it did not hold itself responsible to the people of the United States for a good currency? From the very first year of the late administration to the last, there was hardly a session, if there was a single session, in which this duty of government was not acknowledged, promise of high improvement put forth, or loud claims of merit asserted, for benefits already conferred. It professed to erect the great temple of its glory on improvements of the currency.

And, sir, the better currency, which has been so long promised, was not a currency for the government, but a currency for the people. It was not for the use of revenue merely but for the use of the whole commerce, trade, and business of the nation. And now, when the whole industry, business, and labor of the country, is harassed and distressed by the evils brought upon us by its own interference, government talks with all possible coolness of the great advantage it will be to adopt a system which shall shield itself from a thick-falling shower of imputations. It disclaims, it renounces, it abandons its duties, and then seeks an inglorious shelter in its professed want of power to relieve the people.

We demand the better currency; we insist on the fulfilment of the high and flattering promises; and surely there never was a government on the face of the earth that could, with less propriety, resist the demand; yet, we see it seek refuge in a bold, cold, and heartless denial of the competency of its own constitutional powers. It falls back from its own undertakings, and flatly contradicts its own pretensions. In my opinion, it can find no refuge, where the public voice will not reach it. There can be no shelter, while these times last, into which government can retreat, wherein it can hide, and screen itself from the loud voice of the country, calling upon it to come forth to fulfil its promises, or at least, now that these promises are all broken, to perform its duties. The evils of a disordered currency are evils which do not naturally correct or cure themselves. Nor does chance, or good luck, often relieve that community which is suffering under them. They require political remedy; they require provisions to be made by government; they demand the skilful hand of experienced statesmen. Until some just remedy be applied, they are likely to continue, with more or less of aggravation, and no man can tell when or how they will end. It is vain, therefore, quite vain, for government to hope that it may retreat from this great duty, shield itself under a system, no way agreeing either with its powers or its obligations, and thus escape reproaches, by attempting to escape responsibility.

Mr. President, there is fault and failure somewhere. Either the constitution has failed, or its administration fails. The great end of a uniform and satisfactory regulation of commerce is not answered, because the national currency, an indispensable instrument of that commerce, is not preserved in a sound and uniform state.

Is the fault in the constitution itself? Those who affirm that it is, must show how it was, if that be so, that other administrations, in other times, have been able to give the people abundant satisfaction in relation to the currency. I suppose it will be said, in answer to this, that the constitution has been violated; that it was originally misconstrued; that those who made it did not understand it; and that the sage and more enlightened politicians of our times see deeper and judge more justly of the constitution than Washington and Madison. Certain it is, that they have more respect for their own sagacity than for all the wisdom of others, and all the experience of the country; or else they find themselves, by their party politics and party commitments, cut off from all ability of administering the constitution according to former successful practice.

Mr. President, when I contemplate the condition of the country; when I behold this utter breaking down of the currency, this wide spread evil among all the industrious classes, this acknowledged inability of government to pay its debts legally, this prostration of commerce and manufactures, this shocking derangement of internal exchange, and the general crash of credit and confidence; and when I see that three hundred representatives of the people are here assembled, to consult on the public exigency; and that, repudiating the wisdom of our predecessors, and rejecting all the lights of our own experience, nothing is proposed, for our adoption, to meet an emergency of this character, but the bill before us, I confess, sir, the whole seems to me some strange illusion. I can hardly persuade myself that we are all in our waking senses. It appears like a dream, like some phantasm, of the night, that the opening light of the morning usually dispels.

There is so little of apparent relation of means to ends; the measure before us has so little to promise for the relief of existing evils; it is so alien, so outlandish, so abstracted, so remote from the causes which press down all the great public interests, that I really find it difficult to regard as real what is thus around me.

Sir, some of us are strangely in error. The difference between us is so wide, the views which we take of public affairs so opposite, our opinions, both of the causes of present evils and their appropriate remedies, so totally unlike, that one side or the other must be under some strange delusion. Darkness, thick darkness, hangs either over the supporters of this measure or over its opponents. Time, and the public judgment, I trust, will sooner or later disperse these mists, and men and measures will be seen in their true character. I think, indeed, that I see already some lifting up of the fog.

The honorable member from New York has said that we have now already existing a mode of conducting the fiscal affairs of the country substantially such as that will be which this bill will establish. We may judge therefore, he says, of the future by the present. A sub-treasury system, in fact, he contends, is now in operation, and he hopes the country sees so much good in it as to be willing to make it permanent and perpetual.

The present system, he insists, must at least be admitted not to have obstructed or impeded the beneficial action of the immense resources of the country. Sir, this seems to me a most extraordinary declaration. The operation and energy of the resources of the country not obstructed? The business of the community not impeded? Why, sir, this can only be true upon the supposition that the present evils are no way attributable to the policy of government, that they all spring from some extraneous and independent cause. If the honorable member means that the disasters which have fallen upon us arise from causes which government can not control; such as overtrading or speculation, and that government is answerable for nothing, I can understand him, though I do not at all concur with him. But that the resources of the country are no now in a state of great depression and stagnation is what I had supposed none would assert. Sir, what are the resources of the country? The first of all, doubtless, is labor? Does this meet no impediment? Does labor find itself rewarded, as heretofore, by high prices, paid in good money? The whole mass of industry employed in commerce and manufactures, does it meet with no obstruction, or hindrance, or discouragement? And commerce and manufactures, in the aggregate, embracing capita as well as labor, are they too in a high career of success? Is nothing of impediment or obstruction found connected with their present condition?

Again, sir, among our American resources, from the very first origin of this government, credit and confidence have held a high and foremost rank. We owe more to credit, and to commercial confidence, than any nation which ever existed; and ten times more than any nation, except England. Credit and confidence have been the life of our system, and powerfully productive causes of our prosperity. They have covered the seas with our commerce, replenished the treasury; paid off the national debt, excited and stimulated the manufacturing industry, encouraged labor to put forth the whole strength of its sinews, felled the forests, and multiplied our numbers, and augmented the national wealth, so far beyond all example, as to leave us a phenomenon for older nations to look at with wonder. And this credit, and this confidence, are they now no way obstructed or impeded? Are they now acting with their usual efficiency, and their usual success, on the concerns of society?

The honorable member refers to the exchanges. No doubt, sir, the rate of foreign exchange has nothing in it alarming. Nor has it had, if our domestic concerns had been in a proper condition. But that the internal exchanges are in a healthful condition, as the honorable member alleges, is what I can by no means admit. I look upon the derangement of the internal exchanges as the precise form in which existing evils most manifestly exhibit themselves. Why, sir, look at the rates between large cities in the neighborhood of each other. Exchange between Boston and New York, and also between Philadelphia and New York, is 1½ to 2 per cent. This could never happen but from a deranged currency; and can this be called a healthful state of domestic exchange?

I understand that the cotton crop has done much towards equalizing exchange between New Orleans and New York; and yet I have seen, not many days since, that in other places of the south, I believe Mobile, exchange on New York was at a premium of 5 to 10 per cent.

The manufacturers of the north can say how they have found, and how they now find, the facilities of exchange. I do not mean exclusively, or principally, the large manufacturers of cotton and woollen fabrics; but the smaller manufacturers, men who, while they employ many others, still bestow their own labor on their own capital; the shop manufacturers, such manufacturers as abound in New Jersey, Connecticut, and other parts of the north. I would ask the gentlemen from these states how these neighbors of theirs find exchanges, and the means of remittance, between them and their correspondents and purchasers in the south. The carriage makers, the furniture makers, the hatters, the dealers in leather, in all its branches, the dealers in domestic hardware; I should like to hear the results of the experience of all these persons, on the state of the internal exchanges, as well as the general question whether the industry of the country has encountered any obstacle in the present state of the currency.

Mr. President, the honorable member from New York stated correctly, that this bill has two leading objects.

The first is, a separation of the revenue, and the funds of government, from all connexion with the concerns of individuals, and of corporations; and especially a separation of these funds from all connexion with any banks.

The second is, a gradual change, in our system of currency, to be carried on till we can accomplish the object of an exclusive specie or metallic circulation, at least in all payments to government, and all disbursements by government.

Now, sir, I am against both these propositions, ends as well as means.

I am against this separation of government and people, as unnatural, selfish, and an abandonment of the most important political duties.

I am for having but one currency, and that a good one, both for the people and the government.

I am opposed to the doctrines of the message of September, and to every thing which grows out of those doctrines. I feel as if I were on some other sphere, as if I were not at home, as if this could not be America, when I see schemes of public policy proposed, having for their object the convenience of government only, and leaving the people to shift for themselves, in a matter which naturally and necessarily belongs, and in every other country is admitted to belong, to the solemn obligations and the undoubted power of government. Is it America, where the government, and men in the government, are to be better off than the people? Is it America, where government is to shut its eyes and its ears to public complaint, and to take care only of itself? Is it America, Mr. President, is it your country, and my country, in which, at a time of great public distress, when all eyes are turned to congress, and when most men feel that substantial and practical relief can come only from congress, that congress, nevertheless, has nothing on earth to propose, but bolts and bars, safes and vaults, cells and hiding places, for the better security of its own money; and nothing on earth, not a beneficial law, not even a kind word, for the people themselves? Is it our country, in which the interest of government has reached such an ascendancy over the interest of the people, in the estimate of the representatives of the people? Has this, sir, come to be the state of things, in the old thirteen, with the new thirteen added to them? For one, I confess I know not what is American, in policy, in public interest, or in public feeling, if these measures be deemed American.

The first general aspect, or feature of the bill, the character written broadly on its front, is this abandonment of all concern for the general currency of the country. This is enough for me. It secures my opposition to the bill in all stages. Sir, this bill ought to have had a preamble. It ought to have been introduced by a recital, setting forth, that whereas the currency of the country has become totally deranged; and whereas, it has heretofore been thought the bounden duty of this government to take proper care of that great branch of the national interest; and whereas, that opinion is erroneous, obsolete, and heretical; and whereas, according to the true reading of the constitution, the great duty of this government, and its exclusive duty, so far as currency is concerned, is to take care of itself; and whereas, if government can but secure a sound currency for itself, the people may very well be left to such a currency as the states, or the banks, or their own good fortune, or bad fortune, may give them; therefore be it enacted, &c. &c. &c.

The very first provision of the bill is in keeping with its general objects and general character. It abandons all the sentiments of civilized mankind on the subject of credit and confidence, and carries us back to the dark ages. The first that we hear is of safes, and vaults, and cells, and cloisters. From an intellectual it goes back to a physical age. From commerce and credit, it returns to hoarding and hiding; from confidence and trust, it retreats to bolts and bars, to locks with double keys, and to pains and penalties for touching hidden treasure. It is a law for the times of the feudal system; or a law for the heads and governors of the piratical states of Barbary. It is a measure fit for times when there is no security in law, no value in commerce, no active industry among mankind. Here, it is altogether out of time and out of place. It has no sympathy with the general sentiments of this age, still less has it any congeniality with our American character, any relish of our hitherto approved and successful policy, or any agreement or conformity with the general feeling of the country.

The gentleman, in stating the provisions of the first section, proceeds to say, that it is strange that none of our laws heretofore has ever attempted to give to the treasury of the United States a "local habitation." Hence it is the object of this first section of the bill to provide and define such local habitation. A local habitation for the treasury of a great and growing commercial country, in the nineteenth century! Why, sir, what is the treasury? The existing laws call it a "department." They say, there shall be a department, with various officers, and a proper assignment of their duties and functions; and that this shall be the department of the treasury. It is thus an organized part of government; an important and indispensable branch of the general administration, conducting the fiscal affairs of the country, and controlling subordinate agents.

But this bill does away with all legal and political ideas, and brings this important department down to a thing of bricks and mortar. It enacts that certain rooms in the new building, with their safes and vaults, shall constitute the treasury of the United States! And this adoption of new and strange notions, and this abandonment of all old ideas, is all for the purpose of accomplishing the great object of separating the affairs of government from the affairs of the country. The nature of the means shows the nature of the object; both are novel, strange, untried, and unheard of. The scheme, sir, finds no precedent, either in our own history, or the history of any other respectable nation. It is admitted to be new, original, experimental; and yet its adoption is urged upon us as confidently as if it had come down from our ancestors, and had been the cherished policy of the country in all past times.

I am against it altogether. I look not to see whether the means be adapted to the end. That end itself is what I oppose, and I oppose all the means leading to it. I oppose all attempts to make a separate currency for the government, because I insist upon it, and shall insist upon it, until I see and feel the pillars of the constitution falling around me and upon my head, that it is the duty of this government to provide a good currency for the country and for the people, as well as for itself.

I put it to gentlemen to say, whether currency be not a part of commerce, or an indispensable agent of commerce; and something, therefore, which this government is bound to regulate, and to take care of? Gentlemen will not meet the argument. They shun the question. We demand that the just power of the constitution shall be administered. We assert, that congress has power to regulate commerce, and currency as a part of commerce; we insist that the public exigency, at the present moment, calls loudly for the exercise of this power,—and what do they do? They labor to convince us that the government itself can get on very well without providing a currency for the people, and they betake themselves, therefore, to the sub-treasury system, its unassailable walls, its iron chests, and doubly secured doors. And having satisfied themselves, that, in this way, government may be kept going, they are satisfied. A sound currency for government, a safe currency for revenue; these are the only things promised, the only things proposed. But these are not the old promises. The country, the country itself, and the whole people, were promised a better currency, for their own use; a better general currency; a better currency for all the purposes of trade and business. This was the promise, solemnly given by the government in 1833, and so often afterwards renewed, through all successive years, down to May last. We heard nothing, at that time, of a separation between government and people. No, sir, not a word. Both were to have an improved currency. Sir, I did not believe a word of all this; I thought it all mere pretence or empty boasting. I had no faith in these promises, not a particle. But the honorable member from New York was confident; confident, then, as he now is; confident of the success of the first scheme, which was plausible, as he is confident of this, which is strange, alien, and repulsive in its whole aspect. He was then as sure of being able to furnish a currency for the country, as he is now of furnishing a currency for government. He told us, at that time, that he believed the system, adopted by the late administration, was fully competent to its object. He felt no alarm for the result; he believed all the president had done, from the removal of the deposits downwards, was constitutional and legal, and he was determined to place himself by the side of the president, and desired only to stand or fall, in the estimation of his constituents, as they should determine in the result. And that result has now come.

As I have said, sir, I had no faith at all in all the promises of the administration, made before and at that time, and constantly repeated. I felt no confidence, whatever, in the whole project; I deemed it rash, headstrong, and presumptuous, to the last degree. And, at the risk of the charge of some offence against good taste, I will read a paragraph from some remarks of mine, in February, 1834, which sufficiently show what my opinion and my apprehensions then were:

"I have already endeavored to warn the country against irredeemable paper; against bank paper, when banks do not pay specie for their own notes; against that miserable, abominable, and fraudulent policy, which attempts to give value to any paper of any bank, one single moment longer than such paper is redeemable on demand in gold and silver. And I wish, most solemnly and earnestly, to repeat that warning. I see danger of that state of things ahead. I SEE IMMINENT DANGER THAT MORE OR FEWER OF THE STATE BANKS WILL STOP SPECIE PAYMENT. The late measure of the secretary, and the infatuation with which it seems to be supported, tend directly and strongly to that result. Under pretence, then, of a design to return to a currency which shall be all specie, we are likely to have a currency in which there shall be no specie at all. We are in danger of being overwhelmed with irredeemable paper; mere paper, representing not gold or silver; no, sir, representing nothing but BROKEN PROMISES, BAD FAITH, BANKRUPT CORPORATIONS, CHEATED CREDITORS, AND A RUINED PEOPLE!"

And now, sir, we see the upshot of the experiment. We see around us bankrupt corporations and broken promises, but we see no promises more really and emphatically broken than all those promises of the administration which gave us assurance of a better currency. These promises, now broken, notoriously and openly broken, if they cannot be performed, ought at least to be acknowledged. The government ought not, in common fairness, and common honesty, to deny its own responsibility, seek to escape from the demands of the people, and to hide itself, out of the way and beyond the reach of the process of public opinion, by retreating into this sub-treasury system. Let it, at least, come forth, let it bear a part of honesty and candor; let it confess its promises, if it cannot perform them; and, above all, now, even now, at this late hour, let it renounce schemes and projects, the inventions of presumption, and the resorts of desperation, and let it address itself, in all good faith, to the great work of restoring the currency by approved and constitutional means.

But, sir, so far is any such course from all probability of being adopted, so little ground of hope is there that this sub-treasury system will be abandoned, that the honorable member from New York has contended and argued, in his place, that the public opinion is more favorable to this measure now proposed, than to any other which has been suggested. He claims for it the character of a favorite with the people. He makes out this sub-treasury plan to be quite high in popular estimation. Certainly, sir, if the honorable member thinks so, he and I see with different eyes, hear with different ears, or gather the means of opinion from different sources. But what is the gentleman's argument? It is this: The two houses of congress, he says, reflect the wishes and opinions of the people; and with the two houses of congress this system, he supposes, is more acceptable than any other.

Now, sir, with the utmost respect for the two houses of congress, and all their members, I must be permitted to express a doubt, and, indeed, a good deal more than a doubt, whether, on this subject, and at the present moment, the two houses do exactly reflect the opinions and wishes of the people. I should not have adverted to the state of opinion here, compared with the state of public opinion in the country, if the gentleman had not founded an argument, on the supposed disposition of the two houses, and on the fact that they truly set forth the public opinion. But since he has brought such an argument, it is proper to examine its foundation.

In a general sense, undoubtedly, sir, the members of the two houses must be understood to represent the sentiments of their constituents, the people of the United States. Their acts bind them, as their representatives, and they must be considered, in a legal sense, as conforming to the will of their constituents. But, owing to the manner of our organization, and to the periods and times of election, it certainly may happen that, at a particular moment, and on a particular subject, opinion out of doors may be one way, while opinion here is another. And how is it now, if we may judge by the usual indications? Does the gentleman hope for no vote, in this body, for this bill, but such as shall be, in his opinion, in strict accordance with the wishes as generally understood, and most recently expressed in the state from which that vote shall come?

I shall be exceedingly sorry, sir, for instance, to see a vote from Maine given for this bill. I hope I may not. But if there should be such a vote, can the gentleman say that he believes, in his conscience, it will express the wishes of a majority of the people of that state? And so of New Jersey, and one, if not more states in the west. I am quite sure that gentlemen who may give their votes will discharge their duty, according to their own enlightened judgments, and they are in no way accountable to me for the manner in which they discharge it; but when the honorable member from New York contends that this body now accurately represents the public opinion on the sub-treasury system, we must look at the facts. And with all possible respect, for the honorable member, I must even take leave to ask him, whether, in his judgment, he, himself, is truly reflecting the opinions and wishes of a majority of the people of New York, while he is proposing and supporting this bill? Where does he find evidence of the favor of the people of that state towards this measure? Does he find it in the city? In the country? In the recently elected house of assembly? In the recently elected members of the senate? Can he name a place—can he lay a veue for the popularity of this measure in the whole state of New York? Between Montauk point and Cattaraugus, and between the mountains of Pennsylvania and the north end of lake Champlain, can he any where put his finger on the map and say, here is a spot where the sub-treasury is popular? He may find places, no doubt, though they are somewhat scarce, where his friends have been able to maintain their ascendancy, notwithstanding the unpopularity of the measure; but can he find one place, one spot, of any extent, in which this measure of relief is the choice, the favorite, of a majority of the people?

Mr. president, the honorable member has long been in public life, and has witnessed often the changes and the fluctuations of political parties and political opinions. And I will ask him what he thinks of the hurricane which swept over New York in the first week of last November? Did he ever know the like? Has he before ever been called on to withstand such a whirlwind? or had he previously any suspicion that such an outbreak in the political elements was at hand? I am persuaded, sir, that he feared such a thing much less than I hoped for it; and my own hopes, although I had hopes, and strong hopes, I must confess, fell far short of the actual result. And to me, Mr. president, it seems perfectly plain, that the cause of this astonishing change in public opinion is to be found, mainly, in the message of September, and the sub-treasury bill of the last session. The message, with its anti-social, anti-commercial, anti-popular doctrines and dogmas—the message which set at naught all our own manners and usages, rejected all the teachings of experience, threatened the state institutions, and, anxious only to take good care of the government, abandoned the people to their fate; the message—the message—it was, that did the great work in New York and elsewhere.

The message was that cave of Eolus, out of which the careering winds issued:

"Una Euræque notusque ruunt creberque procellis mingling seas and skies, dispersing the most powerful political combinations, and scattering their fragments on the rocks and shores. I might quote the poet further, sir,
"Africus"—

"et vos voluit ad litora fluctus."

The political deep seemed agitated to the very bottom, and its heaving bosom moved onward and forward the "vastos fluctus," in nautical phrase, the big rollers of public opinion.

The honorable member may say, or may think, that all this was but the result of a transient impulse, a feverish ebullition, a sudden surprise, or a change superficial, and apparent only, not deep and real. Sir, I cannot say, but I must confess that if the movement in New York last fall was not real, it looked more like reality than any fanciful exhibition which I ever saw. If the people were not in earnest, they certainly had a very sober and earnest way of being in jest.

And now, sir, can the honorable member, can any man say, that in regard to this measure, even the house of representatives is certain, at this moment, truly to reflect the public judgment? Though nearer to the people than ourselves, and more frequently chosen, yet it is known that the present members were elected, nearly all of them, before the appearance of the message of September. And will the honorable member allow me to ask, whether, if a new election of members of congress were to take place in his own state, to-morrow, and the newly elected members should take their seats immediately, he should entertain the slightest expectation of the passage of this bill through that house?

Mr. president, in 1834 the honorable member presented to the senate resolutions of the legislature of New York, approving the previous course of the administration in relation to the currency. He then urged strongly, but none too strongly, the weight due to those resolutions, because, he argued, they expressed the undoubted sense of the people, as well as that of the legislature. He said there was not, at that time, a single member in the popular branch of the legislature who was not in favor of those resolutions, either from the cities of Hudson, Albany, Troy, Schenectady, Utica, or an almost endless number of incorporated trading towns and villages, or the great city of New York itself, which he justly calls the commercial emporium of the country; all these cities and villages being surrounded, as he most justly said, by an intelligent population; and cities, villages, and country, altogether, comprising near two millions of souls. All this was very well. It was true. The facts were with the honorable member. And although I most exceedingly regretted and deplored that it was so, I could not deny it. And he was entitled to enjoy, and did enjoy, the whole benefit of this respectable support. But, sir, how stands the matter now? What say these two millions of souls to the sub-treasury? In the first place, what says the city of New York, that great commercial emporium, worthy of the gentleman's commendation in 1834, and worthy of his commendation, and my commendation, and all commendation, at all times? What sentiments, what opinions, what feelings are proclaimed by the thousands of her merchants, traders, manufacturers and laborers? What is the united shout of all the voices of all her classes? What is it, but that you will put down this new fangled sub-treasury system, alike alien to their interests and their feelings, at once, and forever? What is it, but that in mercy to the mercantile interest, the trading interest, the shipping interest, the manufacturing interest, the laboring class, and all classes, you will give up useless and pernicious political schemes and projects, and return to the plain, straight course of wise and wholesome legislation? The sentiments of the city cannot be misunderstood. A thousand pens and ten thousand tongues, and a spirited press, make them all known. If we have not already yet heard enough, we shall hear more. Embarrassed, vexed, pressed, and distressed, as are her citizens at this moment, yet their resolution is not shaken, their spirit is not broken; and, depend upon it, they will not see their commerce, their business, their prosperity and their happiness, all sacrificed to preposterous schemes and political empiricism, without another, and a yet more vigorous struggle. And Hudson, and Albany, and Troy, and Schenectady, and Utica—pray, why may not the citizens of these cities have as much weight with the honorable member now, as they justly had in 1834? And does he, can he, doubt of what they think of this bill? Ay, sir, and Rochester, and Batavia, and Buffalo, and the entire western district of the state, does the honorable member suppose that, in the whole of it, he should be able, by careful search, to do more than to find, now and then, so rare a bird, as a single approver of this system?

Mr. president, if this system must come, let it come. If we must bow to it, why, then, put it upon us. Do it by the power of congress, and the president. Congress and the president have the power. But spare us, I beseech you, spare the people from the imputation that it is done under clear proof and evidence of their own approbation. Let it not be said it is their choice. Save them, in all mercy, from that reproach.

Sir, I think there is a revolution in public opinion, now going on, whatever may be the opinion of the member from New York, and others. I think the fall elections prove this, and that other more recent events confirm it. I think it is a revolt against the absolute dictation of party, a revolt against coercion, on the public judgment; and, especially, a revolt against the adoption of new mischievous expedients on questions of deep public interest; a revolt against the rash and unbridled spirit of change; a revolution, in short, against further revolution. I hope, most sincerely, that this revolution may go on: not, sir, for the sake of men, but for the sake of measures, and for the sake of the country. I wish it to proceed, till the whole country, with an imperative unity of voice, shall call back congress to the true policy of the government.

The honorable member from New York is of opinion, sir, that there are only three courses open to us. We must, he urges, either adopt this measure, or return to a system of deposits with the state banks, or establish a national bank. Now, sir, suppose this to be as the gentleman states, then, I say, that either of the others is better than this. I would prefer doing almost any thing, and I would vastly prefer doing nothing, to taking this bill.

I need not conceal my own opinions. I am in favor of a national institution, with such provisions and securities as congress may think proper, to guard against danger and against abuse. But the honorable member disposes of this at once, by the declaration, that he himself can never consent to a bank, being utterly opposed to it, both on constitutional grounds, and grounds of expediency. The gentleman's opinions, always respected, is certainly of great weight and importance, from the public situation he occupies. But although these are his opinions, is it certain that a majority of the people of the country agree with him in this particular? I think not. I verily believe a majority of the people of the United States are now of the opinion that a national bank, properly constituted, limited, and guarded, is both constitutional and expedient, and ought now to be established. So far as I can learn, three-fourths of the western people are for it. Their representatives here can form a better judgment; but such is my opinion upon the best information which I can obtain. The south may be more divided, or may be against a national institution; but, looking again to the centre, the north, and the east, and comprehending the whole in one view, I believe the prevalent sentiment is such as I have stated.

At the last session great pains were taken to obtain a vote of this and the other house against a bank, for the obvious purpose of placing such an institution out of the list of remedies, and so reconciling the people to the sub-treasury scheme. Well, sir, and did those votes produce any effect? None at all. The people did not, and do not, care a rush for them. I never have seen, or heard, a single man, who paid the slightest respect to those votes of ours. The honorable member, to-day, opposed as he is to a bank, has not even alluded to them. So entirely vain is it, sir, in this country, to attempt to forestall, commit, or coerce the public judgment. All those resolutions fell perfectly dead on the tables of the two houses. We may resolve what we please, and resolve it when we please; but if the people do not like it, at their own good pleasure they will rescind it; and they are not likely to continue their approbation long, to any system of measures, however plausible, which terminates in deep disappointment of all their hopes, for their own prosperity?

I have said, sir, that, in preference to this bill, I would try some modification of the state bank system; and I will cheerfully do so, although every body knows that I always opposed that system. Still, I think it less objectionable than this. Mr. president, in my opinion, the real source of the evil lies in the tone, and spirit, and general feeling, which have pervaded the administration for some years past. I verily believe the origin is there. That spirit, I fully believe, has been deeply anti-commercial, and of late decidedly unfriendly to the state institutions. Do the leading presses in favor of the administration speak its own sentiments? If you think they do, then look at the language and spirit of those presses. Do they not manifest an unceasing and bitter hostility to the mercantile classes, and to the institutions of the states? I certainly never supposed the state banks fit agents for furnishing or regulating a national currency; but I have thought them useful in their proper places. At any rate, the states had power to establish them; and have established them, and we have no right to endeavor to destroy them. How is it, then, that generally, every leading press which supports the administration joins in the general cry against these institutions of the states? How is it, if it be not that a spirit, hostile to these institutions has come to pervade the administration itself?

In my opinion, the state banks, on every ground, demand other treatment; and the interest of the country requires that they should receive other treatment. The government has used them, and why should it now not only desert, but abuse them? That some of the selected banks have behaved very unworthy, is no doubt true. The best behavior is not always to be expected from pets. But that the banks, generally, deserved this unrestrained warfare upon them, at the hands of government, I cannot believe. It appears to me to be both ungrateful and unjust.

The banks, sir, are now making an effort, which I hope may be successful, to resume specie payments. The process of resumption works, and must work, with severity upon the country. Yet I most earnestly hope the banks may be able to accomplish the object. But, in all this effort, they got no aid from government, no succor from government, not even a kind word from government. They get nothing but denunciation and abuse. They work alone, and therefore the attainment of the end is the more difficult. They hope to reach that end only, or mainly, by reduction and curtailment. If, by these means, payment in specie can be resumed and maintained, the result will prove the existence of great solidity, both of the banks and of the mercantile classes. The bank of England did not accomplish resumption by curtailment alone. She had the direct aid of government. And the banks of the United States, in 1816, did not rely on curtailment alone. They had the aid of the then new created bank of the United States, and all the countenance, assistance, and friendly support, which the government could give them. Still, I would not discourage the efforts of the banks. I trust they will succeed, and that they will resume specie payments at the earliest practicable moment; but it is, at the same time, my full conviction, that, by another and a better course of public policy, the government might most materially assist the banks to bring about resumption; and that, by government aid, it might be brought about with infinitely less of public inconvenience and individual distress.

For an easy resumption of specie payments, there is mainly wanted a revival of trust, the restoration of confidence, and a harmonious action, between the government and the moneyed institutions of the country. But, instead of efforts to inspire trust and create confidence, we see and hear nothing but denunciation; instead of harmonious action, we find nothing but unrelenting hostility.

Mr. President, you and I were in congress, in 1816, during the time of the suspension of specie payments by the banks. What was the spirit of the government at that time, sir? Was it hostile, acrimonious, belligerent towards the state institutions? Did it look on them only to frown? Did it touch them only to distress? Did it put them all under the scourge? You know, sir, it was far otherwise. You know, that the secretary of that day entered into friendly correspondence with them, and assured them that he would second their efforts, for resumption, by all the means in his power. You know, sir, that, in fact, he did render most essential aid. And do you see, sir, any similar effort now? Do you behold, in the bill before us, any thing of the spirit, or the policy, of Mr. Madison, on an occasion very like the present. Mr. Madison was a man of such subdued self-respect, that he was willing to yield to experience and to the opinion of his country; a man, too, of so much wisdom and true patriotism, that nothing was allowed to stand between him, and his clear perception of the public good. Do you see, sir, any thing of this spirit,—of the wisdom, of the mild, and healing, restoring policy, of Mr. Madison, in this measure? Another illustrious man, now numbered with the dead, was then with us, and was acting an important part, in the councils of the country. I mean Mr. Lowndes; a man not deficient in force and genius, but still more distinguished for that large and comprehensive view of things, which is more necessary to make great men, and is also much rarer, than mere positive talent,—and for an impartial, well balanced judgment, which kept him free from prejudice and error, and which gave great and just influence to all his opinions. Do you see, sir, any thing of the spirit, the temper, the cool judgment, or the long-sighted policy of Mr. Lowndes, in all that is now before us? And Mr. Crawford, then at the head of the treasury, arduously striving to restore the finances, to re-establish both public and private credit, and to place the currency, once more, upon its safe and proper foundation; do you see, sir, the marks of Mr. Crawford's hands in the measure now presented for our approbation?

Mr. President, I have little to say of the subordinate provisions of this bill, of the receivers-general, or of the dangerous power, given to the secretary, of investing the public money in state stocks of his own selection. My opposition to the bill is to the whole of it. It is general, uncompromising, and decided. I oppose all its ends, objects, and purposes; I oppose all its means, its inventions, and its contrivances. I am opposed to the separation of government and the people; I am opposed, now and at all times, to an exclusive metallic currency; I am opposed to the spirit in which the measure originates, and to all and every emanation and ebullition of that spirit. I solemnly declare, that in thus studying our own safety, and renouncing all care over the general currency, we are, in my opinion, abandoning one of the plainest and most important of our constitutional duties. If, sir, we were, at this moment, at war with a powerful enemy, and if his fleets and armies were now ravaging our shores, and it were proposed in congress to take care of ourselves, to defend the capitol, and abandon the country to its fate, it would be, certainly, a more striking, a more flagrant and daring, but in my judgment not a more clear and manifest dereliction of duty, than we commit in this open and professed abandonment of our constitutional power and constitutional duty, over the great interest of the national currency. I mean to maintain that constitutional power, and that constitutional duty, to the last. It shall not be with my consent that our ancient policy shall be overturned. It shall not be with my consent that the country shall be plunged further and further into the unfathomed depths of new expedients.

It shall not be, without a voice of remonstrance from me, that one great and important purpose for which this government was framed, shall now be surrendered and abandoned forever.

TWENTY-FIFTH CONGRESS.

SECOND SESSION—SENATE.

February 23. After the presentation of petitions, memorials, &c.

Mr. Smith, of Indiana, submitted a resolution, which lies over one day, calling on the secretary of the treasury for statements of the whole number of acres of the public lands granted to each of the states of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Missouri, Michigan, and Arkansas, with the particulars; the number of acres sold in said states at public or private sale, the number remaining unsold, distinguishing between Indian and other lands, and the number of acres sold in Indiana, with the amount received from those sales.

The unfavorable reports on the claims of Andrew King, and the widow of Thomas Cogswell, were taken up and agreed to.

The bill to provide for issuing patents to certain lands at Green Bay, Wisconsin, and the bills for the relief of Robert Dickey, Joseph Hall, Albion T. Crow, the heirs of John Hawkins, the heirs of lieutenant William Russworm, the heirs of doctor William Rumsey, the heirs of Nathan Peter and William Adams, and the owners of the brig Despatch and cargo, were severally read a third time, and passed.

The bill to authorize the examination and test of Samuel Raub's double safe-acting safety valve, was taken up, and, on motion of Mr. Davis, again laid on the table, on the ground that a general bill authorizing experiments on steam boilers, &c. had already passed the senate.

The senate resumed the consideration of the sub-treasury bill, and Mr. Rives's substitute.

Mr. Brown spoke till half past four o'clock in favor of the bill.

After an executive session, (moved by Mr. Grundy,)

The senate adjourned till Monday.

February 26. The chair communicated a letter from the secretary of the treasury, in answer to a resolution of the senate of the 22d instant, directing him to communicate the report of E. and G. W. Blunt, of New York, relative to the construction and improvement of light-houses, stating that no such communication had been received at his office, nor at the office of the fifth auditor.

Also, a report from the same, transmitting, in compliance with the provisions of the acts for the establishment of the treasury, war, and navy departments, a list of contracts entered into for the year 1837: laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a report from the war department, transmitting, in compliance of a resolution of the senate, a map of the military road from Saginaw and Mackinaw; which, on motion of Mr. Lyon, was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Trotter presented the memorial of the legislature of Mississippi, praying congress to ratify and confirm certain pre-emption claims under the act of June, 1834: referred to the committee on public lands.

Mr. Smith, of Indiana, presented a memorial, signed by seventy-four of the members of the general assembly of the state of Ohio, praying congress to appropriate a portion of the public funds in a subscription for a part of the capital stock of the Jeffersonville and New Albany canal company, incorporated by the state of Indiana, to construct a canal around the falls of Ohio, on the Indiana side, of sufficient capacity to pass steamboats of the largest size.

Mr. S. said he had before had the honor to introduce, memorials, numerous signed by the business men of Wheeling and Cincinnati, on this subject. Those memorials had been printed, and referred to the committee on roads and canals. He (Mr. S.) would only say, on the present occasion, that the great importance of the measure was admitted and felt by the whole western country.

On motion of Mr. S. the memorial was referred to the committee on roads and canals.

Mr. Clay, of Alabama, presented the memorial of the inhabitants of township three, range nine west, of Huntsville, Alabama, representing that the 16th section, reserved for schools, in that township is sterile and unproductive, and praying a grant of other lands in lieu of the same; which was referred to the committee on public lands.

Mr. Benton presented the memorial of sundry inhabitants of Erie, Pennsylvania, praying congress to take measures to prevent the re-issue of the notes of the old bank of the United States: referred to the committee on finance.

Mr. Buchanan presented the memorial of a large number of citizens of Philadelphia, asking congress to establish a dry dock at that place, and setting forth strong reasons why such an establishment should exist there: referred to the committee on naval affairs.

On motion of Mr. Benton,

Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury be directed to cause to be prepared and communicated to the senate, tables of the rates of exchange, foreign and domestic, and of the price of bank notes at different periods, from such materials as are in the department, and such others as can be conveniently procured.

On motion of Mr. Wall, the senate took up and considered as in committee of the whole, the bill for the establishment of a port of entry at Jersey city; and, after brief explanations from Messrs. Wall and King, it was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

A message was received from the house of representatives by Mr. Franklin, the clerk, announcing the death of the honorable Jonathan Cilley, a member of the house from the state of Maine, and stating that the funeral would take place from the hall of the house to-morrow at 12 o'clock.

Mr. Williams rose and addressed the senate as follows:

Mr. President: I came into the senate this morning, exhausted and overwhelmed, to perform the melancholy duty of announcing to you and to the senate of the United States the sudden and lamented death of my friend and colleague the honorable Jonathan Cilley, a representative from Maine, in the congress of the United States.

At the last adjournment of the senate, Mr. Cilley was in perfect health, full of hope and expectation of making himself useful in asserting and vindicating the violated rights of his state, and of distinguishing himself in the great questions which now so deeply agitate the public mind; full of zeal and ardent patriotism; and of devotion to the great cause of human liberty and of human rights, he considered that a crisis had arisen when his country had a right to claim the services of her sons. He obeyed the call of his constituents, relinquishing the enjoyments of the domestic circle of a wife and three children. He is now a lifeless corpse; all his hopes are blasted and destroyed, and his constituents are deprived of the services of an able and faithful representative.

Mr. Cilley was a native of New Hampshire, and belonged to one of the most ancient and respectable families in that state. Patriotism and bravery were his inheritance. His grandfather was the distinguished patriot and brave officer of the revolution; general Cilley; and his brother, captain Joseph Cilley, was the gallant leader of the heroic charge under colonel Miller, at the battle of Bridgewater heights, in the last war.

The deceased was a graduate of Bowdoin college, in Maine, and by his superior talents and application attained a high standing at the bar in that state. He was a good lawyer, an able advocate, and a powerful debater.

From early life Mr. Cilley was ardently attached to the principles of free government; a zealous advocate of the rights of the whole people, and a determined opponent of the claim of the few to tyrannise over the many.

In 1832, Mr. Cilley was elected to the house of representatives in Maine, and in 1835 and 1836 was speaker of that body, where his talents and love of country became so conspicuous, that in 1837 he was elected to congress in a district in which the majority were his political opponents.

Of his conduct here I need not speak, for all who bear me, all who knew Mr. Cilley in the other end of the capitol, will bear testimony of his ability, to his open, frank, and determined course, to the high order of his talents and powers as a debater, and to the respect and deference he paid to the rights of others.

As a man, Mr. Cilley was warm, ardent, generous, noble; as a friend, true, faithful, abiding. He was in the meridian of his life, aged 35: the past was the earnest of the future.

In his death Maine has lost one of her brightest ornaments, and the nation is bereft of a devoted patriot, and an ardent, zealous supporter of its free institutions.

The sun which set upon the lifeless corpse of my late friend and colleague, rose bright and cheering upon his distant fireside circle, and the wife of his bosom blest its gladsome beams, and told her innocent children that it brought the return of their father one day nearer.

Alas! nor wife nor children shall see him more. Who shall now penetrate that bereaved mansion, and witness the tears, the agony, the distraction of the widow and the fatherless? Mr. president, I cannot. May the Father of all Mercies be their comforter and their support.

Of the cause and manner of the death of Mr. Cilley, I forbear to speak; but allow me to say, that it is my solemn conviction that he entertained no ill will, and intended no disrespect to Mr. Graves, in any thing that occurred; and that in accepting the call, he did nothing more than he believed in-dispendable to avoid disgrace to himself, to his family, and to his constituents.

Mr. Williams then submitted the following resolutions, which were unanimously adopted:

Resolved, unanimously, That the senate will attend the funeral of the honorable Jonathan Cilley, late a member of the house of representatives, from the state of Maine, at the hour of twelve o'clock to-morrow, and as a testimony of respect for the memory of the deceased, they will go into mourning by wearing crape round the left arm for thirty days.

And, as an additional mark of respect to the memory of the deceased.

Resolved, That the senate do now adjourn.

The senate then adjourned.

February 27. The senate assembled at 12 o'clock, pursuant to adjournment; and after the journal was read,

Mr. White rose and said, that in order that the senate might carry into effect the resolution adopted yesterday, in relation to attending the funeral of the deceased member from Maine, he would move that the senate adjourn; which motion being concurred in,

The senate adjourned until to-morrow, at twelve o'clock.

February 28.—The following petitions, &c. were presented:

By Mr. Webster: from a number of citizens of New York, praying congress to take into their serious consideration the condition of the currency, and establish a bank of the United States, for the purpose of restoring the currency to its former sound condition. Laid on the table.

Also, from Daniel A. Brown, in relation to the preservation, &c. of timber for the navy of the United States. Referred.

By Mr. Buchanan: the proceedings of a meeting of the "democratic" citizens of Philadelphia county, requesting him to disavow his legislative instructions in regard to the sub-treasury scheme.—Read, laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

[Mr. Buchanan, in presenting these proceedings, said he regretted he could not comply with the request of the democratic delegation of the county of Philadelphia, that he should pay no regard to the instructing resolution of the legislature of Pennsylvania. On this subject his determination was fixed, and could not be changed by any human power, except the legislature itself; and, much as he respected the source from which this request emanated—and it was worthy of all respect—he could only refer the delegates to the remarks which he had made in the senate, some days ago, on presenting the resolution of instruction, as a fair exposition of his views on the subject. Had he consulted his own feelings, he should have resigned rather than obeyed; but friends whose opinion he valued had convinced him it was a case for obedience, and not for resignation. He was sorry to be placed in this position, because there was no man in the country who, as an individual, was more decidedly and strongly in favor of a separation between the banks and the government than he was himself.]

By Mr. Allen: praying the repeal of postage on newspapers not sent beyond the limits of any one county. Referred.

By Mr. Wall: against the admission of Texas. Laid on the table.

Also, the proceedings of a public meeting of citizens of New Jersey, assembled at Newark, in which Mr. W. said they had expressed their opinions in relation to a variety of public matters, from which Mr. W. differed, though he considered the meeting highly respectable. Laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

By Mr. Young: numerous petitions from Illinois, in relation to mail routes. Referred.

Also, various petitions in regard to pre-emption rights. Laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a petition asking a grant of land for the improvement of Fox river. Referred.

By Mr. White: from citizens of Sevier county, Tennessee, asking for a new mail route from Sevier court house to South Carolina. Referred.

By Mr. Clay, of Alabama: resolutions of the legislature of Alabama in favor of the annexation of Texas to the union. Read, laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

By Messrs. Wall, Lyon, Moulton, and Niles: on individual claims.

Mr. Robbins, from the committee on the library, reported a joint resolution, authorizing the secretary of the senate and clerk of the house to subscribe for ten numbers of Niles' Register for each of the members of congress, (to be delivered every week,) provided that the editor would consent to publish the proceedings of congress, with the yeas and nays on each question so taken, and also a supplement at the end of the session, containing all public and private laws of congress, treaties, &c. and furnish to each member one copy of this supplement free of charge.

The resolution having been read once,

Mr. Benton said he hoped this business would stop at once. He called for the yeas and nays on the question of ordering it to a second reading.

Mr. Robbins moved that the resolution be laid on the table.

Mr. Benton: Never to be called up again?

Mr. Robbins: I shall consent to no such thing.

Mr. Benton: Then I move that it be indefinitely postponed.

The question on laying on the table having precedence, was put, and decided in the affirmative.

On motion of Mr. White, the special committee on the case of Mr. Ruggles, were authorized to employ a clerk.

On motion of Mr. Benton, the committee on the judiciary were instructed to inquire into the expediency of appointing a separate judge for the western district of Louisiana.

The following bills were read a third time, and passed:

For the relief of the heirs of Nathan Peter, and William Adams; for the relief of the owners of the brig Despatch and cargo; authorizing the issuing of patents to certain lands at Green Bay, Wisconsin; establishing a port of entry at Jersey city, New Jersey.

And the bill to establish two additional land districts in Wisconsin, west of the Mississippi.

[An amendment to this bill, formerly offered by Mr. Sevier, for making one land district instead of two, was discussed by Messrs. Sevier, Young, Walker, Lyon, Clay, of Alabama, and King, and rejected.]

Mr. Prentiss gave notice that he should, to-morrow, ask leave to bring in a bill to prohibit, under suitable penalties, the giving and receiving, within this district, of a challenge to fight a duel.

The senate then resumed the sub-treasury bill.

Mr. Davis rose and addressed the senate in opposition to this measure till near 4 o'clock, particularly aiming to show that the late and present administrations have had in view as the main and paramount object of all their financial measures, the establishment of a government bank, resting on the public revenue. Before he had concluded, he gave way to a motion to adjourn, and

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, February 23. In answer to a question, proposed to the chairman of the committee of ways and means, by Mr. Pickens,

Mr. Cambreleng said that that committee in the course of the ensuing week, would report a bill for the keeping and disbursing the public revenue.

Mr. Thomas, of Maryland, gave notice (as chairman of the committee on the judiciary) that, immediately after the neutrality bill should be disposed of, he should move to take up the bill to prevent the abatement of suits, &c. against the late Bank of the United States.

Mr. Howard, by leave, moved that the house, at one o'clock this day, do take up the bill for the preservation of neutral relations; which motion was agreed to.

A number of reports from committees were received, which will be duly noticed in their progress.

A few resolutions of minor importance having been offered,

Mr. Reed asked leave to offer a resolution granting the use of the hall to the congressional temperance society on Tuesday evening next; objection being made.

Mr. Reed moved a suspension of the rule, in order to enable him to offer the resolution; this motion prevailed by a vote of more than two-thirds—ayes 91, noes 88.

The question being upon the adoption of the resolution,

Mr. Boon demanded the yeas and nays; which were not ordered; and the resolution was adopted without a division.

The hour of one o'clock having arrived, the neutrality bill was again taken up and considered.

The pending question being on the motion of Mr. Bell, to commit the bill to the committee of the whole, with instructions to report a substitute, which he sent to the chair yesterday.

The debate was continued by Messrs. Patton, Taylor, Howard, Dunn, McKay, Haynes, Bell, Robertson, Wise, Mercer, and Adams; when, without coming to any decision upon either amendment proposed, the house, on motion, adjourned, at half past 4 o'clock.

Saturday, Feb. 24. On motion of Mr. Worthington.

Resolved, That the clerk of the house of representatives cause 2,000 copies of the survey and chart of the harbor of Havre de Grace and mouth of the Susquehanna and head waters of the Chesapeake bay, communicated to the house on the 2d of February, 1837, from the war department, to be lithographed on a reduced scale, for the use of the house.

Several committees having made reports, which will be duly noticed hereafter,

The speaker laid before the house a letter from the secretary of the treasury, transmitting information called for by the house on the 19th inst. in relation to the land ceded to the United States by the Shawnee Indians, under the treaty of Wapagonetta, and the amount due to said Indians on account of said cession.

The speaker laid before the house a letter from the secretary of the navy, transmitting the information called for on the 19th instant, in relation to the survey of the St. Helena bar, South Carolina.

The resolution offered on a former day by Mr. Wm. Cost Johnson, proposing the appointment of a committee to inquire into the expediency of making a further appropriation of public lands for the purposes of education, being taken up—

Mr. J. took the floor, and modified his motion so as to read as follows:

Resolved, That each of the United States has an equal right to participate in the benefit of the public lands, the common property of the union.

Resolved, That each of the states in whose favor congress have not made appropriations of land for the purposes of education are entitled to such appropriations as will correspond in a just proportion with those heretofore made in favor of other states.

Resolved, That the committee of ——— report a bill making an increased appropriation of the public lands, the property of the United States, yet unappropriated to all the states and territories of the union for the purposes of free schools, academies, and the promoting and diffusion of education in every part of the United States.

Mr. J. then commenced and made some progress in his remarks, in support of this resolution, when they were cut off by the arrival of the hour for the orders of the day.

The pending question was the same as on yesterday, and the debate was resumed and continued by Messrs. Crockett, Whittlesey, of Connecticut, Garland, of Virginia, Rencher, Holsted, Toucy, and Petrikin; which last named gentleman moved the previous question, upon engrossing the amendment, agreed to; (limiting the operation of the bill to January, 1840,) and another, inserting at the end of the second section the words "other than ports or places within such continuous state or territory," and to engross the bill for a third reading.

Upon the first count, for seconding the motion for the previous question, the yeas were 64, and the nays 43. No quorum.

The speaker then said that there was evidently a quorum present, and desired members to vote upon one side or the other.

Mr. Robertson moved (unsuccessfully) for a call of the house.

The house was then counted again (by tellers) and the call for the previous question was sustained. Ayes 83, noes 51. So the motion was seconded.

The previous question was then decided in the affirmative; and the bill, as amended, was read, at the request of Mr. Patton, who remarked that the bill as it stood amended, purposed to prohibit the trade with Canada.

The bill being read, as amended,

Mr. Fillmore asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered; and the question on ordering the bill, as amended, to a third reading was decided as follows.

YEAS—Messrs. J. W. Allen, Anderson, Atherton, Beatty, Beirne, Bicknell, Bruyn, Cambreleng, T. J. Carter, Chapman, Cleveland, Cules, Connor, Corwin, Craig, Crary, Cranston, Curtis, Cushman, Davies, De Graff, Evans, Farrington, Fairfield, Fry, Glascock, Grantland, Gray, Haley, Hammond, Haynes, Hoffman, Hopkins, Howard, Wm. Graham, William Graham, Grant, Hall, Halsted, Harlan, Harper, Henry, Herod, Holsey, R. M. T. Hunter, J. Jackson, Henry Johnson, Joseph Johnson, J. W. Jones, Kemble, Lawler, Loomis, Lyon, Mallory, Marvin, Samson Mason, Maury, Mercer, Mitchell, Montgomery, Calvary Morris, Naylor, Noyes, Ogle, Patterson, Patton, Peck, Petrikin, Phillips, Plumer, Pope, Potts, Randolph, Reed, Rives, Robertson, Sawyer, Shields, Sibley, Smith, Snyder, Southgate, Spencer, Stanly, Stone, Stratton, Taliaferro, Tillinghast, Underwood, Albert S. White, Sherrod Williams, Yell, Yorke—88.

So the bill was rejected.

When this decision was announced—

Mr. Patton rose, and intimating that the vote just taken could not be considered as expressing the sense of the house on the expediency of legislating in some way upon the subject to which the bill referred, but rather as proving the force of the objections taken to the form of the bill, moved a reconsideration of the vote just taken; in which motion he was supported by Mr. Tillinghast.

Mr. Howard then proposed an amendment, which he sent to the chair, and which was read.

Mr. Mason, of Ohio, moved to refer the bill and amendment to the committee on the judiciary.

Mr. Robertson, of Va. moved the reference to the committee on foreign affairs.

After a few remarks by Mr. Biddle on the merits of the question embraced in the bill,

The motion to refer to the committee on the judiciary was lost; 54 in the affirmative, nays not counted.

The motion to recommit the bill to the committee on foreign affairs was carried; 85 in the affirmative, nays not counted.

Mr. Cambreling gave notice that, on Monday next, he should ask the house to proceed (at one o'clock) to the consideration of the appropriation bills.

The speaker laid before the house a letter from the secretary of the treasury, transmitting a statement of contracts made in the treasury department during the year 1837; a statement of contracts relative to light-houses, beacon-lights, &c.; a statement of payments made according to law at the treasury of the United States during the year 1837, for the discharge of miscellaneous claims, and a statement of expenditures from the marine hospital fund for the relief of sick and disabled seamen.

Then the house, on motion, adjourned, at a quarter before 4 o'clock.

Monday, February 26. As soon as the journal was read,

Mr. Fairfield rose and addressed the house as follows:

Mr. Speaker: An event has occurred since our last adjournment, which has spread a deep gloom over this community, and deprived this body of one of its most valuable members. I allude, sir, to the death of my late colleague, the honorable Jonathan Cilley, which, it is my painful duty to announce, took place on Saturday last near this city. One hour we saw him in full life, standing in the midst of us in all the pride and vigor of manhood; the next, a helpless, inanimate corpse. It is a case, sir, most melancholy and heart-rending in all its circumstances, (of which, however, this is not the occasion to speak) and brings home to our minds, with peculiar emphasis, the trite but solemn truth, that "in the midst of life we are in death."

My deceased colleague was a man of uncommon talents. His mind was strong, vigorous, well stored, and well disciplined. He had, moreover, that indomitable spirit of perseverance in all the pursuits of an elevated and honorable ambition, which would not rest satisfied with low attainments. He partook largely, too, of that fearless patriotism of his ancestors, which made them "pour out their blood like water," in the war of the revolution, and which also displayed itself in the brave and chivalrous conduct of an only brother during the late war.

His fellow-citizens has often elected him to places of honor and trust in the state of his adoption, and had now given him a seat among the representatives of the nation; among us, who are now spared to deplore his abrupt and tragical removal. Though he had not long been a member of this body, he had established an enviable and an enduring reputation. His ready powers of debate, his warm and fervid eloquence, his manly bearing towards opponents, and courteous demeanor to all, will be readily acknowledged, and long remembered, by the members of this house.

That his sudden and melancholy death will produce a deep sensation in Maine, and indeed throughout the whole country, no one can doubt; but the announcement of the dreadful fact to the partner of his bosom, sitting in the midst of the young pledges of their mutual affection, little dreaming of the blow that awaits her, it is shocking to contemplate. No one can think of it but with feelings of the most poignant and heartfelt grief. May "He who tempers the wind to the shorn lamb," and who "will not break the bruised reed," give her that consolation and support which she needs, and which no earthly power can give.

With this brief and imperfect announcement, I beg leave to submit the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the members of this house will attend the funeral of Jonathan Cilley, deceased, late a member of the house from the state of Maine, at 12 o'clock to-morrow.

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to take order for superintending the funeral of Jonathan Cilley, deceased.

Resolved, That the members and officers of this house will testify their respect for the memory of Jonathan Cilley, by wearing crape on the left arm for thirty days.

The resolutions were unanimously adopted.

On motion of Mr. Fairfield, the house then adjourned till 12 o'clock to-morrow.

Tuesday, February 27. The house met, pursuant to adjournment, at 12 o'clock, for the purpose of attending the funeral obsequies of the honorable Jonathan Cilley, late a representative in congress from the state of Maine.

The committee of arrangements, pall-bearers, and mourners, attended at the late residence of the deceased, at Mr. Birth's, at 11 o'clock, a. m. at which time the remains were removed, in charge of the committee of arrangements, attended by the sergeant-at-arms of the house of representatives, to the hall, where the funeral service was performed by the reverend Mr. Slicer, and the discourse preached by the reverend Mr. Reese.

Wednesday, Feb. 28. Immediately after the reading of the journal,

Mr. Fairfield, of Maine, asked leave to offer a resolution, which was read for information, as follows:

Resolved, That a committee consisting of seven members be appointed to investigate the causes which led to the death of the honorable Jonathan Cilley, late a member of this house, and the circumstances connected therewith, and to report thereon to this house."

Resolved, That said committee have power to send for persons and papers, and have leave to sit during the sessions of the house."

Mr. Bell objecting to its reception at this time, Mr. Fairfield moved a suspension of the rules, to allow of his offering the resolution at this time.

Mr. Bell stated that he had objected only because he thought it better to postpone any action in relation to the subject referred to for a few days, until existing excitement should have had time to subside.

Mr. Parker, of New York, demanded the yeas and nays on the question of suspending the rule; they were ordered, and, being taken, resulted as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Alexander, Heman Allen, Anderson, Atherton, Ayer, Beatty, Beirne, Bicknell, Biddle, Birdsall, Bond, Boon, Borden, Bouldin, Briggs, Broadhead, Bruyn, W. B. Calhoun, Cambreling, Casey, Clark, Coles, Craig, Cray, Cushman, Davies, Deberry, DeGraff, Dunn, Ed-

M. Mason, S. Mason, McKennon, Mitchell, Robertson, Sergeant, Shields, Snyder, Southgate, Taliaferro, John White, Sherrod Williams, J. L. Williams, C. H. Williams—31.

There being more than two-thirds in the affirmative, the rules were suspended, and leave given to introduce the resolution, which was again read at the clerks table.

Mr. Fairfield then said that, entertaining the views and feelings which he did in reference to the awful tragedy to which the resolution referred, he could not refrain from offering it to the house. Had he refused to do so, the voice of his colleague's blood would call to him from the ground. His colleague and friend had been deprived of life in a manner and under circumstances which demanded investigation; it was due to the family of the deceased, it was due from members to themselves, to the country, to humanity, and to God. He trusted that no member on that floor would shrink from such a proposal. For, aside from the peculiar circumstances of the present case, an opportunity was presented which he should suppose every good man would promptly and gladly embrace, to put down the barbarous and disgraceful practice of duelling, a practice which wantonly violated the laws of God, which outraged the best feelings of our nature, which was unworthy of the age of civilization in which we live. He trusted that the efforts of every friend of his species would be united in an endeavor to suppress a practice like this.

Under the peculiar and distressing circumstances, however, of the present case, the deceased having been Mr. F.'s colleague and personal friend, should the house agree to pass the resolution, he hoped the speaker would waive the usual practice which, from courtesy, was supposed to require that the name of a mover for a select committee should be placed at the head of such committee, when appointed by the chair, and would not put him on the committee at all.

Mr. W. C. Johnson, of Md., said that he had voted against the motion to suspend the rules, because, on hearing the resolution read, he had been at once convinced that its adoption would effect no possible good, or lead to any satisfactory result. No one could grieve more over the calamity which had befallen the mover of the resolution, and all the other friends of him whose death they all mourned, than himself, but he had opposed the introduction of this resolution because he did not know what power congress possessed to suppress duelling. As a moralist, he lamented, as all must lament, that the state of society was supposed to be such as to sanction such a dreadful resort. None could be more sorry that appeals of that description were thought to be necessary. But still, he must ask, what good would be effected by the proposed inquiry? The morning papers contained a detailed statement of all the particulars of this melancholy affair; the house was already thus possessed of all the facts and circumstances of the case. And where was its power, under the constitution, to enact an anti-duelling law? To do that was the right of the states. Many of the states had enacted such laws; it was fully within the pale of their jurisdiction to do so; but any like attempt on the part of congress would be a usurpation of power. It was, by the constitution, left to the state to purify the morals of their own citizens, and protect their lives and character.

He had voted against the suspension, and should vote against the resolution, for another reason. By voting in favor of a measure like this, he should consider himself as reflecting on all the parties in any way concerned in this transaction; it implied a reflection on the prudence, judgment, and wisdom of both the parties. Had any fraud, any deception, any moral delinquency of any sort, any thing that would justify a vote of expulsion, been imputed to either of the parties or of their friends in this matter? If any gentleman would rise in his place, and state such an act; if he would show that any one of those concerned had violated the rules of honor, and those attributes which should ever distinguish the character of a gentleman on that floor, and would make his name known to that house, Mr. J. would promptly go for any measure which might be required to punish him. Not only would he vote for a committee of inquiry, but for the instant expulsion of such a person from that house; nay, were it in his power, he would expel such a being from off the face of the earth. Was there any gentleman who would rise in his place and assert this? If there was none; what right had the house to yield to its sympathies, contrary to the rules of the house and the provisions of the constitution? What right had they to pursue a man into the private relations of life, and erect a committee of their number into a court of honor, to ferret out the private doings of members, when not acting in their public and official character? Occurrences which took place in presence of the house, on its floor, they had a right to notice; though, even with respect to these, the line was delicate which marked their right of control. But to constitute such a committee of inquiry as was now proposed, instead of tending to quench the flames of discord, sooth irritation, and lead, from reflection on the past, to any improvement in the future, by rendering gentlemen more cautious and guarded in their language towards each other, would, on the contrary, prove the fruitful source of new strifes and collisions. The duty to be assigned to the committee was one of very delicate and difficult character; any committee who should attempt the discharge of it would soon find that they had need to prepare themselves with strong nerves and well braced. For his own part, he never would consent to serve on such a committee unless, at the very outset, he armed himself for encounters.

In taking this course, Mr. J. was actuated by no previous concert. He had not seen or conversed with a single one of those who had been on the field of the late melancholy contest. If the imprudence of the friend of the parties on either side, their indiscretion, or mistake, had led to the catastrophe which all now so deeply lamented, it was matter of deep regret; but it was out of the power of the house to cure the case; they could not resuscitate the dead, nor could they offer any effectual alleviation to the wounded feelings of his surviving friends. Every step the committee might take would only exasperate public feeling, and sow broadcast the seeds of future occurrences of an equally dreadful character. This was his candid belief. Though as anxious as any other gentleman could be that such rencontres should be prevented for all future time, he was well assured this was not the course to secure such a result.

Mr. Parker, of New York, said that he regretted to differ from the gentleman from Maryland. He had hoped that this resolution would have passed without a dissenting voice. While that gentleman had been addressing the house, Mr. P. had carefully listened for some good reason for rejecting the resolution, but he must say he had heard none. The gentleman said that congress had not the constitutional power to correct the evil of duelling. It certainly had within the limits of the District of Columbia; and it was not disputed that congress had the power to control the action of its own members. The gentleman had further declared that if any gentleman would rise in his place and affirm that either of the parties concerned had violated the laws of honor in this matter, he would vote for the resolution. Mr. P. presumed that no gentleman would do so; but the code of honor, as understood by many, was a very different code from that held as such by his constituents. It was enough for him, as their representative, to know that the whole transaction had been a gross and flagrant violation of the laws of God and man. It was the duty of the house to take steps which might lead to the correction of public opinion, if, indeed, it could be true that it upheld such doings. Did public opinion sanction such acts? Then it was high time that gentlemen should take some means to protect their own lives and those of their friends. He was one who believed the house to possess power to take some steps in this matter which would be attended with salutary effect in the community.

It had been further said by the gentleman from Maryland (towards whom Mr. P. cherished very high respect) that the adoption of the resolution proposed would only lead to further broils, and to a repetition of acts of the same dreadful character. Mr. P. confessed his regret at hearing such a remark. They had fallen on evil times, indeed, if a man might not advocate the cause of truth, of reason, and of eternal justice on that floor, without being threatened with a personal attack.

Mr. Johnson here explained. It had been far from his purpose, very far, to say that any gentleman on that floor would be threatened with a personal attack. But, should the committee be raised and constituted a board of honor to investigate the transaction which had occurred, they would very probably tread beyond their sphere, and might incense those whose conduct they should publicly censure; and these individuals might then consider themselves justified in yielding to personal resentment.

If any gentleman, however, would take the ground that congress had power to suppress duelling within the District of Columbia, (this affair had happened without the line,) and would move that the committee be instructed to report a bill for that purpose, Mr. J. would heartily vote for it. He was as ready as any gentleman could be to set his face against the whole system. But as to the present case, it had already happened; no power could undo it; and it would be useless to report any bill on the matter.

Mr. Parker resumed. He had not understood the gentleman as meaning to say that members acting on the proposed committee would have reason to fear an attack from him, nor did he expressly say it was to be feared from others; but Mr. P. had been going on to say that members of the committee might proceed in their duty without the fear of any such attacks. He was, indeed, ready to admit, that if the committee should proceed to discuss the code of honor, they might perhaps greatly differ as to what it required, and these differences might lead to collision; but he apprehended that the committee, if appointed, would go straight forward in the discharge of its duty, utterly regardless of all rules of that kind: that they would look only to the welfare of the country and the prosperity of the people, without troubling their heads about the fine cobweb distinctions of the code of honor. It had been said that the facts of this case were already before the house, inasmuch as full statements had appeared in the public papers. That was very true: but it formed no valid reason against the appointment of a committee of investigation. The facts were not known to the house officially, so that it could act upon them. The matters which had been mentioned in the case of The Spy in Washington, had all appeared in the papers; yet that did not prevent the house from ordering an official inquiry respecting them. It should have the facts of the existing case reported from a committee. Mr. P. was for the resolution.

Mr. Dawson, of Georgia, observed that there was no gentleman on that floor who more deeply regretted the event which had recently occurred than he. He entertained, in regard to it, what he believed to be correct sentiments; but he could not but think that to raise such a committee as was proposed, would only kindle up a flame both within and without that house. He asked gentlemen to pause before they proceeded to take such a step. When he heard the resolution, he had proposed to himself the questions, what will be the result of such a measure? and what will be the character of the action we can found upon it? What benefit will it confer on the public interest, or the public morals? and he could give no satisfactory answer. He admitted that congress might pass an anti-duelling law for this district; and such a law he would vote for with great pleasure. But why this committee? was it that the house might get arguments to justify itself in passing an anti-duelling law? did not all acknowledge the abstract proposition, that duelling was wrong? when the general principle was already admitted, why inquire into one particular case under it? why go beyond the limits of constitutional authority to get grounds on which to base congressional action? if gentlemen wanted a law against duelling in the district of Columbia, let them pass it; but not leap over the constitution, and invade the private rights of its members.

Mr. D. said he sympathized with the feeling which pervaded the house. He venerated and esteemed the sentiments which had been uttered by the gentleman from Maine, (Mr. Fairfield,) and responded to them as correct. But let him ask, would that gentleman seek to draw the attention of the whole American people, not to the subjects of public moment which were before congress, but to an investigation of the conduct of their representatives in their private and personal relations with each other? into their actions performed as private citizens, after they had thrown off and disconnected themselves from the place and duty of a representative? what must be the result? it would, it must, be to create a flame that would involve the community. This measure went to compel the people to take sides in a private quarrel, and thus get up an excitement leading to consequences which no man could calculate. It might lead to results which would, eventually, be thrown back upon the members of that house as their cause. This course would never check the evil which all deplored, but might lead to what all would have deep cause to regret. The abstract question with respect to duelling was settled: it need not now be discussed: all they did should be prospective, and preventive, in its character. He asked that the house would stop now, before it went a step farther. Why send a committee to sift and measure actions by the code of honor—a code which the house did not recognise or know, as prescribed either by the constitution or the law? a code which existed merely in the imaginations of a certain portion of the people? would gentlemen direct an investigation according to the requisitions of a code such as this? and to what end? to increase the public indignation against duelling? he feared that was not the object. The feelings of the house, and of the community, were quite sufficiently roused. Let what had passed rather be set down to the account of those calamities and disasters incident to human nature, and let the whole matter be buried as quick as possible. Mr. D. was actuated by motives the most upright and sincere in his course upon this occasion. He was opposed, on principle, to duelling, although it was very possible that circumstances might occur which would drive him to violate his own principles, yet he disapproved of it as much as any man, and was desirous as any to promote and preserve the peace of the house. After a few more remarks of similar tenor, Mr. Dawson resumed his seat. Whereupon,

Mr. Mathias Morris, of Pennsylvania, offered the following amendment:

"And that said committee be instructed to inquire into the means more effectually to suppress the practice of duelling, and report a bill for that purpose at as early a period as may be practicable."

Mr. W. C. Johnson immediately moved the following amendment to the amendment, to be appended to it as an addition:

"Resolved, also, that the committee inquire into the propriety of regulating the strong personalities which members resort to sometimes in debate."

Mr. Morris said he had no disposition to prolong the discussion, or to take any part in the debate on the original resolution. On hearing it read, it had struck him that the resolution did not reach the object, which ought to be the prevention of the recurrence of like outrages in future. All he had in view was to give to the resolution the character of prospective legislation, of which it seemed to be destitute.

Mr. Bell had been prepared for what he had heard, as he had anticipated the introduction of a resolution of some nature, in relation to the late unhappy affair. But he had hoped that this step would not have been taken until a few days should have elapsed, when members would have been better qualified than they could be now, to act deliberately and dispassionately. Least of all had he expected that such a resolution would be introduced to-day. He doubted not it had been done with the best and purest intentions, but he could not believe that its effects could be any thing but mischievous. Mr. B. did not mean to oppose the action of the house upon the subject, but the time proposed for that action; and he would appeal to the good sense of the house as to the propriety of postponing the consideration of the subject for a few days. He deprecated the passion, personality, exacerbation, and expressions of strong feeling, which he feared must arise out of the discussion of this subject. He doubted not that the excitement produced by this event was an honest and laudable one: and if the object were in reality, to benefit the country by the prevention of future mischief, he would beg the house to pause, and to look seriously at the probable result. No member on that floor more deeply lamented the late melancholy event than he did, and no member could be better pleased by the adoption of any practicable mode of preventing the recurrence of similar cases. But looking at the inevitable consequences, (as they presented themselves to his mind,) of present action upon this subject, he must entreat the house to consent to a postponement for one week. He made a motion to this effect.

Mr. Elmore, of South Carolina, said he was very unwilling to have participated in this discussion, but the remarks made by gentlemen who had preceded him rendered it necessary to say one word to explain his course, and put this matter on its right footing. If, as had been said by some of the gentlemen who had addressed the house, it was intended only to lay the ground-work for a law against duelling, he would vote against it as totally unnecessary, and, under present circumstances, very much to be avoided. But if, on the other hand, it was intended to assert the rights, privileges, and protect the persons of the members of this house, here in the discharge of their constitutional duties, it becomes a question too high and solemn to allow him to hesitate one moment in giving it his support. He required no information as to the circumstances of this unhappy affair to direct his vote for a law against duelling; and if the resolution of the gentleman from Maine shall go only to that end, he would vote against it, but if it be so modified as to present distinctly the question whether the privileges of this house have been violated, he should, under a solemn conviction of his judgment, feel it his imperative duty to vote for the inquiry, with the sole view to protect the members of this house from question, for what it may be their duty, as it unquestionably is their constitutional right, to say in debate.

But, sir, it is said this inquiry will produce ill feeling and excitement. He trusted not. Who, sir, when the high and solemn duty of guarding and protecting the rights guaranteed by the constitution to this body, and through it to our constituency, and the country, will dare to throw his private feelings into the proceeding, to swell excitement on so sad an occasion? No member surely will do such wrong to justice and to the honor and dignity of this house.

Entertaining the opinions he did upon this subject, under the convictions of his judgment, he should feel constrained to vote for the inquiry, if the resolution be so amended as to make it the means of asserting the privileges of the house and protecting the freedom of its debates and proceedings.

Mr. Bell hoped that the discussion would be confined to the precise question (of postponement) before the house.

The chair requested the house so to confine itself.

Mr. Turney entertained the opinion that all discussion of this subject, at this time, was highly improper. No member could possibly vote on it understandingly, until all the facts are investigated by the committee. He would, therefore, move the previous question.

The question upon seconding the previous question was taken by yeas and nays, and decided as follows: Yeas 84, nays 86.

So there was no second to the motion.

Mr. McKennan said that the peculiar position in which he stood towards his constituents demanded that he should say a word in explanation of the vote he had given against the suspension of the rule, and state the reasons why he should vote in favor of the motion to postpone the further consideration of the subject for one week. His constituents (he said) condemned the practice of duelling in the most unqualified terms, and in that condemnation he most heartily agreed with them. He abhorred the practice from the very bottom of his soul, and would go as far as the furthest on this floor to suppress it. He said, further, he would yield to no gentleman in deploring the tragical event which had cast a melancholy gloom over the city, and which we had all been called upon to mourn. He sympathized, deeply sympathized with the relatives of the deceased, and if he could pour the oil of consolation into the bosom of his surviving partner, nothing would afford him so much consolation. [Here the speaker interposed, and said the question was on the postponement.] Mr. McKennan said he would not transgress the rules. That he would heartily go for the amendment offered by his colleague, (Mr. Morris,) which looked to legislation, and which proposed to do something to put an end to the practice, which is fraught with such lamentable consequences, and in the condemnation of which, in principle, all seem willing to unite. That the resolution of the gentleman from Maine proposed to legislation, no suppression, by law, of the evil, but an examination merely into the facts of the late dreadful catastrophe; they were already before the public, and it could lead to no useful result to hasten the investigation. If, after paying the usual honors to the memory of the deceased, it was intended to cast an imputation upon the character or conduct of the survivor, the passions ought to have time to cool; the excitement, which all feel, should be allayed; and we should approach the subject with that coolness and deliberation which are so necessary to enable the house to come to a just and impartial conclusion. Justice to the characters of all concerned demanded that the investigation should be full and fair, without prejudice and without passion. He, therefore, hoped that the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee, to postpone for a few days, would prevail.

Mr. Boon said that he had voted for the suspension, and should now vote for the resolution, upon the ground of its being a matter of privilege, involving the right of debate in this house. Upon this ground, and this ground alone, would he vote for it.

The chair suggested that the question of postponement was before the house.

Mr. Boon said he should vote against the postponement and in favor of the resolution, as a question affecting the privileges of members of that body.

Mr. Potter, of Pa., next addressed the house. He said he understood the question before the house to be whether this resolution should be acted upon at this time, or a week hence. He could not, for a moment, permit himself to think that any honorable member upon that floor would let any personal or political considerations mingle with their action upon such a question as was then presented to them for consideration. If I could think, with my colleague, (Mr. McKennan), that the resolution could reflect on the memory of the dead, or upon the character of the living, (said Mr. P.) I would be in favor of taking time for coolness and reflection; for the subject is one of the deepest importance, and is to be acted on carefully and deliberately; while its high importance imperatively demands that that action should take place at the earliest possible time. Farther delay would, necessarily, produce farther excitement.

Mr. Fairfield, in order to meet the views of gentlemen, modified his resolution so as further to instruct the proposed committee to inquire and report whether a breach of the privileges of the house had been committed.

Mr. Loomis said that this appeared to him a very plain question, and he wondered that it did not strike every member in that light. The simple matter is, whether, when one of the members of this house, one of the associates of gentlemen there, is withdrawn suddenly from among them, and from the representation of the country—

Here the chair suggested that the gentleman's remarks were quite irrelevant to the question immediately before the house.

Mr. Loomis would connect them with the question. The house should act, under such circumstances, he thought, at once. It was demanded by the character of the house that this inquiry be made without delay. It was one which could involve no question of individual character, and which could result in the passage of no judgment by the house upon the character of any of the parties concerned. Upon that point, it called for no expression of opinion. He was opposed to the proposed postponement.

Mr. Grennell had listened to the debate thus far without having been able to here any good reasons for hasty action in relation to the matter before the house, or any against the delay which had been proposed by the gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. Bell.) Whether to inquire into the question of a breach of privilege, or into the expediency of legislation against the horrible custom of duelling, there certainly was no need of hasty action in relation to this resolution. Could the proposed inquiry be conducted with deliberation and impartiality, while every heart was swelling with emotion at what had just transpired? So soon after the performance of the funeral obsequies, the member from Maine, (Mr. Fairfield,) with the best motives—motives honorable to him alike as a man and as a member of that body—had offered a resolution proposing an investigation of the circumstances which had led to the lamentable occurrence. Should not time be given, before this shall be done, for feeling to be assuaged—not party feeling, (of which he could not believe there was any operating in relation to the subject in that body,) but honorable, sympathetic feeling, before this step be taken? It was not the force, but the misdirection of this laudable feeling, that was to be avoided; and there was nothing (as it seemed to him) in the case, to impel the house to act on the spur of the moment: nor had any reasons been given why such hasty action should be had. He was glad that the house had decided against compelling an immediate vote upon the question. Time was necessary, to enable the house to adopt a course which should operate against the custom of duelling, which had produced results so disastrous. In order to effect this object, Mr. Grennell would vote for the motion to postpone.

Mr. Bronson, when he had first heard the motion made, was favorably disposed towards it. He felt the full force of the suggestion that feeling, sympathy, and personal attachment, ought not to be allowed to mingle in the deliberations of the house upon this subject. But, upon reflection, he had come to view the question as being merely whether the house would proceed to investigate this subject, and, in order to do this, in order to take the inceptive step in the inquiry, that there was no good reason for delay. Were the question a final one as to the case proposed to be inquired into, that argument might apply; but it could not avail in the present position of the question.

He would venture to assert that the time the committee would take in order to investigate the causes of the late unhappy event, would be even longer than that named by the gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. Bell,) in his motion to postpone. In the mean time, he would suggest, there would be opportunity for reflection upon the part of the house, and the same effects as had been already pointed out, as arguments in favor of postponing, would ensue, in the assuaging of feeling, and enabling members to act upon the report of the proposed committee calmly, coolly, and dispassionately. He should, therefore, go for the postponement.

Mr. Reed rejoiced that, upon a late occasion, he had had an opportunity to express his opinion upon the subject-matter involved in this question. He rejoiced, moreover, that it had been brought before the house for its action thereon. Yet he could not agree that that was the proper time to set on foot the proposed investigation. It is admitted, he argued, on all hands, that a very strong feeling does exist upon the subject; and to such an extent that, even before the funeral of the deceased, there had been some doubts expressed as to the granting funeral honors in this instance; and, considering what had taken place in relation to the matter, he deeply regretted that the gentleman from Maine (Mr. Fairfield) should have introduced such a proposition as he had done. As to the question of postponement, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. Potter,) who had spoken against it, had said that further delay produced further excitement. Was that human nature? He believed not. On the contrary, he was of opinion that delay allayed excitement rather than produced it.

The yeas and nays having been demanded on the question of postponement, that question was decided in the affirmative by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Alexander, J. W. Allen, Ay-crigg, Beirne, Bell, Biddle, Bond, Bouldin, Calhoun, W. B. Campbell, John Campbell, W. B. The resolution was then debated at some length by Messrs. Garland, of Lou. Bouldin, Evans, and Fairfield, when

Mr. Calhoun, of Massachusetts, moved to reconsider the vote upon postponement.

Mr. Clowney moved the previous question.

Mr. Calhoun, of Massachusetts, then moved that the whole subject lie on the table.

The yeas and nays being ordered, this motion was lost, by the following vote: Yeas 74, nays 125.

Mr. Clowney's motion was next in order, and the previous question was seconded, (by tellers)—Ayes 109, noes not counted. And the question on reconsideration being taken by yeas and nays, was lost by the following vote: Yeas 75, nays 106.

Mr. Clawney then moved the previous question on the resolutions, which was seconded, yeas 105, noes not counted; and on the question whether the main question should be put, the yeas and nays were ordered, and the vote was as follows: Yeas 107, nays 86.

The question was then put on agreeing to the resolutions moved by Mr. Fairfield, as modified by him, and decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Alexander, H. Allen, J. W. So it was Resolved, That a committee consisting of seven members be appointed to investigate the causes which led to the death of the honorable Jonathan Cilley, late a member of this house, and the circumstances connected therewith; and further to inquire whether, in the case alluded to, there has not been a breach of the privileges of this house, and to report thereon to this house.

Resolved, That said committee have power to send for persons and papers, and have leave to sit during the sessions of the house.

The speaker laid before the house several communications from the executive department, among which was a translation of the Gorostiza pamphlet, called for on Mr. Adam's motion, and a list of banks and public officers having public money in their hands.

Mr. Morris, of Pennsylvania, by leave, moved the following resolution of instructions to the select committee just ordered, which was adopted:

Resolved, That the select committee this day ordered be instructed to inquire into the means more effectually to suppress the practice of duelling, and report a bill for this purpose as early as is practicable.

Mr. Evans, by leave, introduced a resolution for informing the governor of Maine of the decease of Mr. Cilley; which was agreed to.

Mr. Jennifer asked leave to introduce the following resolution, farther instructing the committee just ordered:

Resolved, That the committee ordered this day be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing that if any member of this house, in debate, should so far forget the character due to himself and the house as to use language which shall be considered so personal to any other member as to call for the censure of a majority of the body, the speaker first calling him to order, such offending member shall immediately be called on by the speaker to make an apology to the house and to the member so offended, and, upon refusal to make a sufficient apology, such offending member shall be expelled his seat in the house.

Before leave was granted as requested,

On motion of Mr. Patton,

The house adjourned.

THURSDAY'S PROCEEDINGS.

The senate, after some unimportant business, resumed the consideration of the sub-treasury bill, when

Mr. Davis concluded his remarks on this subject—examining further into the design, character, tendency, and effects of this measure, and closing with an examination of the bill itself.

Mr. Strange having signified his desire to speak to-morrow,

The senate adjourned, after an executive session.

In the house of representatives. The following named gentlemen were announced as being appointed to compose the select committee on Mr. Fairfield's motion for an inquiry, &c. concerning the death of Mr. Cilley, viz. Mr. Toucey, Mr. Potter, Mr. Briggs, Mr. Elmore, Mr. Bruyn, Mr. Harrison, Mr. Rariden. Mr. Briggs and Mr. Harrison were excused, on their request, on ground of being already on other onerous committees; and two other members were ordered to be appointed in their place.

After several petitions had been presented, on motion of Mr. Kemble, it was Resolved, That the secretary of war be directed to report to this house the state of the defences on the Atlantic seaboard and Gulf of Mexico, and on the northern and eastern frontiers.

Mr. Bouldin, from the committee for the District of Columbia, made a report upon so much of the message of the president of the United States as relates to the District of Columbia, concluding with the following resolutions:

Resolved, That this committee will, at this session, report no bill to the house in relation to the District, except those of immediate and pressing necessity; and that they will report all such to the house as speedily as possible.

Resolved, That the statute laws in force in the District of Columbia ought to be compiled and embodied in a code, and that some competent person should be employed by congress to do it immediately, with notes of such alterations as he may deem necessary.

Resolved, That a delegate ought to be immediately allowed the District, elected by the people of the District, and admitted on the floor of the house of representatives.

Mr. Bouldin moved to lay the report and resolutions on the table, and that they be printed.

This motion gave rise to a brief discussion between Messrs. Adams, Bouldin, Jenifer, and Grannell. Finally, a motion to recommit, made by Mr. Jenifer, prevailed.

Mr. Rencher, by leave, introduced the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the doorkeeper be required to execute strictly the thirteenth and fourteenth rules of the house relative to the privilege of the hall.

Resolved, That no person shall be allowed the privilege of the hall under the characters of stenographer, without a written permission from the speaker, specifying the part of the hall assigned to him.

[The following are the rules referred to:

"13. No person, except members of the senate, their secretary, heads of departments, treasurer, comptrollers, register, auditors, postmaster general, president's secretary, chaplains to congress, judges of the United States, foreign ministers and their secretaries, officers who, by name have received, or shall hereafter receive, the thanks of congress for their gallantry and good conduct displayed in the service of their country, the commissioners of the navy board, governor, for the time being, of any state or territory of the union, who may attend at the seat of the general government during the session of congress, and who may choose to avail himself of such privilege, such gentlemen as have been heads of departments, or members of either branch of the legislature, and, at the discretion of the speaker persons, who belong to such legislatures of foreign governments as are in amity with the United States, shall be admitted within the hall of the house of representatives."

"14. Stenographers, wishing to take down the debates, may be admitted by the speaker, who shall assign such places to them on the floor or elsewhere, to effect their object, as shall not interfere with the convenience of the house."

Mr. Elmore would ask if the duty proposed to be assigned to the speaker was not already assigned by the existing orders of the house? The speaker would say, in reply, that he should feel much relieved if the house would take some new order upon this subject. A practice had existed, under the incumbency of his predecessor, which he had felt the inconvenience of, in the too extended construction of the rules of the house in this respect. Mr. Rencher said that such had been his intention in introducing the resolutions. Mr. Hopkins asked for a division of the question. And the question being taken on the first resolution, was decided affirmatively. The question recurring on the second,

Mr. Thompson offered the following amendment, which prevailed: "And that no reporter or stenographer be admitted, under the rules of the house, unless such reporter or stenographer shall state, in writing, for what paper or papers he is employed to report," &c. And as thus amended, the resolutions were agreed to.

Mr. Patton thought the existing rules of the house in regard to this matter were abundantly sufficient, if properly enforced. The second resolution passed, and the speaker stated that he would with great pleasure carry the order of the house into execution.

Mr. Howard, on leave, reported a bill from the committee on foreign affairs for the preservation of the neutral relations of the United States, which was read a first and second time.

A discussion arose as to the time to which the consideration of this bill should be postponed. Mr. Howard moved to make it the special order of the day for to-morrow, during the morning hour. Mr. Johnson, of Maryland, moved to postpone it until to-morrow at 1 o'clock, and then to make it the special order until 2 o'clock on each succeeding day.

Mr. Bronson was in favor of the earliest hour.

Mr. Cambreleng hoped the motion of the chairman of the committee on foreign affairs would prevail, and that, in the mean time, the bill would be printed.

[Protests from citizens of Vermont against the provisions of the bill recently before the house upon this subject were, on leave, introduced, severally, by Messrs. Fletcher and Slade, and were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.]

The motion of Mr. Johnson, of Maryland, prevailed.

Mr. Thomas, on leave introduced the bill from the senate, providing against the abatement of suits against the United States Bank on the 4th of March, 1838.

The bill being read twice, and the question being upon ordering it to a third reading—

Mr. Thomas moved the previous question.

Mr. Adams said that this cuts off all the amendments, and all debate on the bill itself. He did hope that the house would be permitted to consider the constitutional question involved in this bill—whether congress could make a bank of the United States.

The motion for the previous question, having been seconded, prevailed, and the bill was ordered to a third reading, as follows:

An act to prevent the abatement of suits and actions now pending, to which the late Bank of the United States may be a party.

Be it enacted, &c. That no suit, action, judgment, or decree, now pending and unsatisfied, in which the late Bank of the United States is a party, plaintiff, or defendant, shall abate or be discontinued or dismissed by reason of the expiration of the two years after the expiration of the charter, limited by the 21st section of the act of incorporation of the said bank, for the use of the corporate name, style and capacity of said bank, for the purpose of suits for the final settlement and liquidation of the affairs and accounts of the corporation; but all such suits, actions, judgments, and decrees shall be allowed to proceed to final judgment, execution, satisfaction, and settlement, as if the said two years had not expired.

The bill was then read a third time, passed, and returned to the senate.

On motion of Mr. Cambreleng, the further consideration of the message of the president of the United States in relation to the northeastern boundary affairs was postponed till this day week.

The consideration of the bill making appropriation for the payment of pensions was resumed, on motion of Mr. Cambreleng, who addressing the house in reply to his colleague, (Mr. Curtis,) whose remarks had concluded the debate upon this bill when last under consideration.

Mr. Curtis followed at some length, and was succeeded by Messrs. Atherton, Sibley, Bell, McKim, and Phillips, when the house adjourned without taking any question, at half past 4 o'clock.

Clock work. Mr. Rodgers, No. 410 Broadway, New York, has invented an ingenious clock work apparatus, to strike the city hall bell on an alarm of fire. It is very simple and durable, and any one can set it so as to strike for any district, and continue an hour striking. It is also valuable for the preservation of the bells, as the hammer strikes on one spot, and equally so for all church bells, for instead of tugging at the rope the sexton has only to set the clock at work, and the bell will ring or toll the necessary time without labour. It is altogether a simple improvement, which should be adopted for the city hall and churches. [Fr. Star.

BRAZIL. Dionizio de Azevedo Pecanha has been officially recognised by the president of the United States as consul general of Brazil for the United States of America.

PENNSYLVANIA. A convention of the friends of the general administration met at Harrisburg on Monday last and nominated general David R. Porter, of Huntingdon county, as their candidate for governor. The anti-masonic convention assembled at the same place on the same day, and nominated Joseph Ritner as their candidate for the same office.

CONNECTICUT. The democratic state convention has nominated Seth P. Beers, of Litchfield county, for governor, and John Stewart, of Middlesex county, for lieutenant governor of the state of Connecticut.

FROM THE CANADA FRONTIER. The following from the Albany Argus of the 6th inst. confirms the account published in a subsequent page of the disbanding of the invading forces:

"Official despatches from gen. Wool and col. Worth, from the former of the 2d inst., and the latter of the 1st, show that both on the northern and western frontiers, the disturbing forces have been dispersed, and that tranquillity has been restored in every direction.

General Wool writes that the entire force under Drs. Nelson and Cote, about 600 strong, surrendered to him at 2 o'clock, P. M. on the 1st inst. near the Canada line, about one mile north of the village of Alburgh springs, Vermont, with all their cannon, small arms and ammunition. Previous to this, general Wool had taken one piece of artillery and nine loads of ammunition prepared for artillery and muskets. Drs. Nelson and Cote were in the custody of general Wool, by whom they would be surrendered to the civil authorities. The British troops were within six or eight miles of the invading camp at the time of the surrender.

The whole frontier, from St. Albans to Watertown, is entirely tranquillized—probably not to be again disturbed.

Gen. Wool left St. Albans for Plattsburgh and Champlain yesterday morning.

Col. Worth writes that he is just informed by express from major general Brady, at the mouth of the Detroit river, dated the 26th inst., that on the morning of the 24th, the individuals under the command of McLeod, made good their foothold on an uninhabited island on the British side, and appeared to threaten an attack upon Malden. When the troops at Malden moved towards the island, the invaders fled without making any resistance. On reaching the American shore, they were disarmed by the forces under general Brady and the civil authorities, and dispersed. McLeod, at the last date, was pursued by the marshals, and it was believed would be arrested. The re-action against these proceedings is general, and it is not a little accelerated by the want of courage exhibited on this and other occasions."

The Rochester Democrat contradicts, as a libel, the statement of the N. Y. Gazette, Courier and Enquirer, and Commercial Advertiser, that lady Head, whilst on her recent route to New York, was insulted in Rochester. It has the authority of gen. Whiting, a royalist, from Canada, that he had a few days since heard of gen. Head read a letter from his lady, dated at Utica or Albany, in which she states that, so far from being insulted, she had not met with a single mark of disrespect, but, on the contrary, had been uniformly treated with the utmost kindness and attention.

Lord Gosford, late governor general of the Canadas, has arrived at Boston with his suite. He came by way of Maine. He was to embark for England, on board the Pique frigate. His departure has given great joy to the friends of the queen in Montreal. The "Herald" states, that that city presented a magnificent spectacle on Tuesday evening, (Feb. 27th.) The illumination in honor of the installation of sir John Colborne as administrator of the government of this province, Vol. LIV.—Sta. 2.

and as a rejoicing that lord Gosford no longer insulted Britons as the representative of their sovereign, was as general as the most sanguine good subject could have possibly desired.

THE BAMBERS. We learn from the New York "Evening Post" that governor Marcy has suspended the order for delivering up the Bangers to the British authorities, and that without question they will be discharged. Mr. Morrell, their counsel, proceeded to Albany, and laid before the governor some important testimony, in contradiction to that on which the order for arresting and delivering them up was issued. The discharge of the prisoners will take place not on account of any change of opinion as to the effect of the evidence originally presented, but on account of its being invalidated by facts subsequently proved.

FOREIGN NEWS. London papers to the 15th and Liverpool to the 16th of January have been received at New York. They are filled with speculations upon the late movements in Canada, which have also been warmly discussed in parliament.

The London Courier of the 15th of January says: "As soon as parliament meets to-morrow the ministers will lay before it the additional documents which they possess concerning the revolt in Canada, and will be prepared to state their views on this important subject. We may expect a warm debate if the Tories and radicals are not so excessively disappointed at the speedy termination of the revolt as to be unable to make a show of fight."

The newspapers contain various accounts of arrangements for increasing the British forces, and for taking out troops to America. The bounty for the ordnance service has been raised to five guineas, and the standard of height reduced from five feet five inches for the royal artillery instead of five feet eight. This corps wants 490 men to complete it. The Royal Sovereign transport, commanded by lieut. Werter, was to take out immediately two companies of royal engineers to Canada. The Apollo, at Portsmouth, a large 46 gun frigate, is to be prepared for a troop ship and to sail for Canada about the end of March. The Hercules 74 will take out 500 men. The Inconstant has embarked a portion of the 93d Highlanders, and the Pique will take the remainder. The second companies of the 11th will be landed at Bermuda until they are wanted in America.

A large number of officers have arrived at New York and proceeded to Canada. The collector of that port directed all the baggage of the British officers, who arrived in the packet ship Cambridge, to be passed without examination. The officers and the British consul called on the collector to express their gratification at so unexpected a civility, which relieved them from being subjected to an ordeal which, though trivial in its nature, is justly deemed the most vexatious of annoyances that the stranger can possibly encounter.

Sir George Arthur, the new governor of Upper Canada, with his suite and several military gentlemen, took passage in the New York packet Samson, on Friday the 5th of January, for America.

A meeting of the friends of reform had been held at the borough of Beverly, at which Messrs. Renzie and Clay had spoken in favor of temperate and conciliatory measures towards the Canadians, and a petition to that effect is expected from the people of that place.

The winter palace of the Emperor Nicholas was destroyed by fire on the 29th of December, the London Royal Exchange on the 10th of January, and the Italian Opera house at Paris on the 15th of the same month. In all these cases the endeavors to extinguish the conflagration were obstructed by the intense frost which prevailed, and rendered it difficult at first to convey the water to the flames. The weather, during the season in which these fires occurred, appears to have presented a strong contrast to the mildness of the season here.

The chamber of deputies, on the 15th, agreed on an answer to the king's speech, which is but the repetition of the speech itself.

A Berlin letter of January 7th, states that three couriers from St. Petersburg had arrived within a few days of each other. It was reported that serious disturbances had broke out in the Russian capital, and that the Emperor Nicholas had been exposed to great personal danger.

THE LATE DUEL AT WASHINGTON.

From the New York American.

FROM THE EDITOR.

Washington, 26th February, 1838.

I send the following statement for publication, in justice to col. J. W. Webb. It is accurate, as I know, in its essential particulars, in that which relates to the impression under which col. W. rested on the evening of Friday, 23d, and up to 10 o'clock A. M. of Saturday, that no meeting could take place on that day between Mr. Graves and Mr. Cilley.

Col. W. had evinced the most resolute purpose to prevent, at any rate, and at any hazard, the substitution of Mr. Graves for himself, in the combat, and nothing but the unusual haste with which this matter seems to have been passed to an issue, could, it is believed, have defeated the success of his interposition, and that of other friends, as well as of the law, to prevent the duel.

It is not deemed necessary to give the signatures to this paper, as it might not be agreeable to the parties to see their names in print, on such an occasion. Any gentleman, however, desiring it may see the original statement at this office.

GADSBY'S HOTEL,
Washington, Feb. 25, 1838.

Early in the morning of yesterday, col. Webb, of New York, called at my lodgings while I was yet in bed, and stated that on the evening preceding, Mr. Cilley, of Maine, had accepted a challenge from Mr. Graves of Kentucky, and that they were to fight at eighty paces with rifles. Col. Webb said that the proposed meeting grew out of a correspondence between Mr. Graves and Mr. Cilley, founded upon a letter from col. Webb to Mr. Cilley, asking for an explanation of certain language used on the floor of the house of representatives, and of which letter Mr. Graves was the bearer. He said that it was utterly impossible that any meeting could be permitted to take place between Messrs. Graves and Cilley until Mr. Cilley had first met him; that he was determined to force such meeting upon Mr. Cilley, be the consequences what they might, and that in pursuance of that determination, he had secured the services of — the evening previous, shortly after the acceptance of Mr. Graves' challenge by Mr. Cilley, and now called to ask my co-operation in the following proceeding, viz: "That col. Webb, accompanied by Mr. — and myself, properly armed, should repair to Mr. Cilley's room, when Mr. Webb should offer Mr. Cilley the choice of his duelling pistols, with the following alternatives: either then and there to settle the question, or pledge his word of honor that he would give col. Webb a meeting before Mr. Graves, at such place and time, and with such weapons, as Mr. Cilley might appoint; and in the event of doing neither, then to expect the most serious consequences on the spot." Mr. Webb then added, "should he refuse to fight me at the time, or give the pledge required, I shall have no alternative left but to shatter his right arm, and thereby prevent his meeting my friend."

I considered col. Webb bound in honor to take the course he suggested, and promptly declared my willingness to accompany him. At 10 o'clock I was informed by col. Webb, that although he had been assured on the evening previous, that Mr. Graves and Mr. Cilley would not meet for some days, he had reason to believe that he had been intentionally deceived, and that the meeting would take place on that day at 12 o'clock. At his request, I immediately took measures to ascertain whether Mr. Cilley was at his lodgings, and finding that he was not, col. Webb, Mr. — and myself, all well armed, took a carriage and repaired to Bladensburg, where it was said the meeting was to take place. Before arriving at the ground, col. Webb designated the following as the order of proceeding—to which we assented, believing it to be the only course left him, and demanded by every consideration of duty towards his chivalric friend, Mr. Graves. "On reaching the parties," said col. W., "I'll approach Mr. Cilley and tell him that this is 'my quarrel, and he must fight me, and that if he aims his rifle at my friend, I'll shoot him on the spot.' We know that upon this, Messrs. Graves and Wise will interfere, and that we will be ordered off the ground,—but I shall tell them that we have come prepared to lose our lives or prevent the meeting, that it cannot proceed without first disposing of us. From our knowledge of the parties, it is probable that some of them will then raise his weapon at me, when I shall instantly shoot Cilley, and we must proceed to defend ourselves in the best way we can."

On arriving at the usual duelling ground, we discovered that the parties were not there, and after waiting half an hour, returned to the capital, when col. Webb had a conversation with, and we understood, requested general Mercer to go to the civil authorities, make a formal complaint in his (col. W.'s) name, and cause officers to be despatched in every direction to discover and apprehend the parties.

We learnt at the capitol, that the parties had only been absent about twenty minutes, and that the meeting was to take place at the old magazine. We instantly followed in pursuit; but on arriving at the place designated, understood that the parties had not been there. We were then induced to believe that the shore of the Potomac, near the arsenal at Greenleaf's point, was the place of meeting, and we followed in pursuit. But here again, we were foiled; and I have since understood that the place of meeting was changed to avoid interruption by col. W. It now being after three o'clock, P. M. we returned to Gadsby's hotel, and there awaited the result.

It is unnecessary to add what would have been the course of col. Webb, if Mr. Graves, instead of Mr. Cilley, had been injured. Suffice it to say, that his determination was sanctioned by us; and however much we deplored it, we could not doubt but the extraordinary position in which he would then have been placed, would have warranted the course determined upon.

(Signed)

The foregoing statement of Major — is correct in all that relates to myself, and to our joint proceedings—or in other words, in all its parts of which I could have any knowledge, not having been present at the time Major —'s services were sought for and secured.

(Signed)

The editors of the New York Journal of Commerce state that the names affixed to the above were Daniel Jackson, of New York, and Maj. W. H. Morrell.

The "Spy in Washington" has published the following as the letter from col. Webb to Mr. Cilley; which the latter declined receiving when presented by Mr. Graves, and we give it a place as a portion of the history of the duel.

GADSBY'S HOTEL,
Washington, Feb. 21st, 1838.

To the Hon. Jonathan Cilley:

Sir—In the Washington Globe of the 12th inst., you are reported to have said in the course of the debate which took place in the house of representatives on that day growing out of a publication made in the New York Courier and Enquirer,—"He (you) knew nothing of this editor, but if it was the same editor, who once made grave charges against an institution of this country, and afterwards was said to have received facilities to the amount of some $52,000 from the same institution, and gave it his hearty support, he did not think his charges were entitled to much credit in an American congress."

I deem it my duty to apprise you, sir, that I am the editor of the paper in which the letter from the "Spy in Washington" charging a member of congress with corruption, was first published; and the object of this communication is to enquire of you, whether I am the editor to whom you alluded, and if so, to ask the explanation which the character of your remarks renders necessary.

Very respectfully, your ob't serv't.

J. WATSON WEBB.

The annexed communication from col. Webb, written at Philadelphia, was published in the Courier and Enquirer:

Philadelphia, Feb. 28, 1838.

As it is my determination never to allude editorially, to the recent melancholy affair at Washington, except under circumstances which cannot now be foreseen, there may be a propriety in briefly referring to it at this time.

Some of my contemporaries have alluded to my apparent desire to get into difficulties of this nature, but in this they do me great injustice; and I may with safety appeal to those who are familiar with the circumstances under which I have actually gone into the field, and sought to take others there, that I have never acted under, or exhibited a spirit of revenge, or been actuated by any other feelings than those which should be the guide of every gentleman.

The true secret of my repeated difficulties is to be found in the fact, that I will not subscribe to the abominable doctrine, that in becoming an editor, I ceased to be a gentleman! This insult to the press of our country, had its origin in the cowardly feelings of certain senators from Mississippi; and in consequence of their example, every political demagogue, who succeeds in obtaining a seat in congress, lays it down as an axiom that editors are not gentlemen, and may be assailed without entitling them to any claim for redress.

The prominent position of the Courier and Enquirer, and the wide dissemination of the infamous slander that I had been bribed by the Bank of the United States—a slander which had its origin in the malevolence of Churchill C. Cambreleng—has unfortunately consigned Mr. Cilley to the tomb, and attached to me the imputation of seeking notoriety, by aiming to establish the reputation of a duelist. Those who know me, are well aware that neither vindictiveness nor malice constitute any portion of my character; and that where I have sought redress, I have been actuated by a deep sense of what was due to myself and family, and not by the desire of shedding human blood. Nearly six years have now elapsed since Mr. Cambreleng's false charge was first made against me. It is known to be false by every man of ordinary intelligence in the country, and yet it is annually repeated on the floor of congress! Now I appeal to any man of proper feeling, who is himself the father of a family, whether he could calmly submit to the reflection that this foul calumny must descend to his children as perhaps the only legacy of one whom, while living, they loved and honored? I think not; and without any disrespect to the feelings of the public, I may be permitted to say, that I have long since determined to put an end to this slander at all hazards.

In pursuance of this unaltered and unalterable determination, I have endeavored to hold members of congress responsible for the repetition of what they well knew to be a slander; and when I have been met by the plea that an editor of a paper is not a gentleman, I have had the additional mortification of knowing that a portion of the press, waiting in duty to itself, unfeelingly endeavors to prejudice the public mind, both as to the object I have in view and the character of the plea by which that object is sought to be avoided.

Every man is of right, the sole judge of what is due to his own honor; and while no one can entertain greater respect for public opinion than I do, I must be permitted to say, I can never be so far controlled by it as to suffer any respectable person to circulate the slander alluded to, without chastisement of some sort. Of course I can never again ask a friend to be the bearer of a message to any member of congress. The cowardly plea which members of that body have adopted to screen themselves from punishment, will thus far prove effectual; but they must not imagine that they are therefore beyond my reach. Time may demonstrate that such a conclusion would be erroneous; and if there are those connected with the press who are prepared to censure my conduct because they are willing to submit to the decision that their profession is not consistent with the character or the feelings of a gentleman, I can only enter my protest against their acquiescence in such deep disgrace being considered binding upon me.

One word in relation to the recent duel, and I have done. Mr. Cilley, in his last interview with Mr. Graves, said all, and even more than was required of him; and this, under the impulse of his own feelings, he was ready to commit to writing. But he unfortunately fell into the hands of Benton and Duncan—men as void of character as they are of political honesty—and these ruffians believing that the life of Mr. Graves was at stake, in consequence of Mr. Cilley's wonderful accuracy in rifle shooting, persuaded him to withhold his assent to what Mr. Graves had already reduced to writing, and thereby indirectly implicate his veracity. To Mr. Cilley's weakness in listening to such dishonorable advice, and the anxiety of Messrs. Benton and Duncan for the life of Mr. Graves, is the melancholy fate of Mr. Cilley solely to be attributed. His blood is on their heads; and sooner or later the public will properly appreciate their instrumentality in this melancholy tragedy. Of my efforts to prevent it, I need not speak—the facts are fairly before the public, and in the consciousness that I have only done what my duty to myself and my family rendered imperative, I rely upon my conduct being duly appreciated by all whose good opinion it is my desire to retain.

J. WATSON WEBB.

From the "Globe" of Wednesday night.

We have been furnished with the following for publication:

Washington City, March 6, 1838.

Sir: I enclose you three printed paragraphs, cut from newspapers, having relation to the inquiry with which the committee of which you are chairman has been charged by the house of representatives. The first is taken from a letter written from Philadelphia; the second from a letter written from this city; and the third is taken from the editorial head of the New York Courier and Enquirer; and all of them attributing the death of Mr. Cilley to my counsels and contrivances. The positiveness with which the writers of these paragraphs detail the circumstances which enable them to charge me with the death of Mr. Cilley, may present them as proper witnesses to be examined in relation to that event; and, if so, I have to request that I may be allowed to be present at their examination.

In the mean time, justice to the dead, who can no longer speak for himself, and a due regard to the object of these coincident movements from three cities, induce me to say that, so far as my name is concerned, there is not one particle of truth in the statements of these paragraphs. So far from counselling with Mr. Cilley, and preventing him from admitting the true report of his conversations with Mr. Graves, it happens to be the fact that I never saw Mr. Cilley, to know him, but once in his life, and that at the commencement of the session, when he did me the honor to call upon me in company with Mr. Pierce, of the senate; and that no communication of any kind, written or verbal, direct or indirect, personal or political, has ever taken place between us. Instead of contriving and creating this duel, it so happened that my first knowledge of it was received in my chair in the senate, on Friday, from Mr. Haight, the sergeant-at-arms, who mentioned it to me as a town talk; my next knowledge of it was from Mr. Pierce, of the senate, and at my place in the senate; so that I was in arrears of the town talk on the subject. With respect to this wonderful rifle firing, of which I am represented to have been the superintendent, and to have expressed such high admiration, it happens to be the fact that I have not seen a rifle fired in twenty years. With respect to Mr. Graves, whose death I am charged with so anxiously contriving, it so happens that I do not know the person of that gentleman; that not a word of any kind has ever passed between us; that I do not know that he has ever spent a thought upon me, and am certain that his existence even was unthought of by me at the time I am charged with planning his death. With respect to Dr. Duncan, with whom I am charged with being in consultation nearly all the week, I have no recollection of having seen him until after mid-day on Saturday, when he and others stopped at Mr. Jones's door, which is next door to mine, on their way out, and when my counsels can be stated by others more appropriately than by myself.

Reserving any further details for a more suitable occasion, I have to request you to lay this letter, with its enclosure, before the committee of which you are chairman, for such action upon it as they may think proper to have.

Respectfully, sir,

Your obedient servant,

THOMAS H. BENTON.

To the Hon. Mr. Toucey, chairman, &c.

[For the paragraph quoted here by Mr. Benton, see that portion of Mr. Webb's letter above, commencing, "One word," &c.]

Extract from a letter, dated Washington, Feb. 26, 1823, published in the New York Courier and Enquirer.

"Immediately after the conversation, Mr. Graves addressed a letter to Mr. Cilley, recapitulating the substance of the conversation, and requesting him to reduce it to writing. Hereupon a consultation took place between Mr. Cilley, Mr. Duncan of the house, Mr. Benton of the senate, and several others, the result of which was a reply late in the evening, wherein Mr. Cilley refused to recognise so much of Mr. Graves's report of their conversation as related to col. Webb, and said that he neither admitted nor denied his claims to be considered a gentleman. This was virtually questioning Mr. Graves' veracity, and he insisted upon an admission in writing of what had occurred in their personal interview. But under the advisement of Mr. Benton and others, it was refused, and we all know the melancholy termination of the affair."

Extract from the New York Courier and Enquirer.
"He [Mr. Cilley] is said to have practised on Thursday and Friday last under the superintendence of Mr. Benton, when that personage declared, either on hearing or seeing the result of his practice, that at eighty yards he could kill any man in the world. He is said to have hit eleven times—eight times within the circumference of a dollar—and the whole eleven times within the space which could be covered by a man's hand."

From the New York Evening Post of the 2nd inst.

Mr. James Watson Webb caps the climax of his most ruffian-like conduct by announcing, under his own signature, in his paper of this morning, that he is determined to inflict chastisement of some sort upon every respectable person who shall dare to speak of his having been bribed to support the late United States Bank. It is probable this threat may silence some; but I trust there are yet more who will despise it as utterly as the wretch who proclaims it ought to be despised by every honorable man. For my own part, while the proof that this atrocious braggart's services were bought and paid for by the United States Bank exists on the enduring records of the national legislature, I, for one, shall never hesitate to speak freely my sentiments of the contemptible apostate. I am willing to acknowledge that he is, technically and etymologically, a gentleman—that is, that this father and grandfather were respectable men, and that some few gentlemen lend him their countenance in society—but as for himself, I hold him to be one of the basest and most craven braggarts that ever disgraced the human form. If every man and woman in this community should speak their true opinion of him, it would be found that but few voices would dissent from that which I have here expressed. I say this, not because I have any desire to obtrude myself personally before the community, but because, in the face of such a defiance as that thrown out in the Courier of this morning, I deem it the duty of those who have heretofore spoken plainly of this creature's character, to show that they are not to be intimidated by his bluster from continuing freely to express their sentiments.

WM. LEGGETT.

New York, March 2, 1838.

FRONTIER INTELLIGENCE.

Extract from a letter dated

ST. LAWRENCE CO. N. Y. Feb. 26, 1838.

The forces began to arrive at French creek on Tuesday afternoon and evening, and large quantities of arms and ammunition were received there. Van Rensselaer was there; and they did not embody men on the American soil, (acting, in this respect, under the advice of counsel) but transported their arms and ammunition to Hickory island—a small British island lying between Grindstone and Long islands—and the men began to repair hither. They had about 4,000 stand of arms, 20 barrels cartridges, 500 long pikes, (a very efficient article, manufactured for the occasion) and plenty of provisions. On the island, the only shelter was a small log house and a barn. On Wednesday, the men gathered on the island to the number of 3,000. The day was cold, and the men suffered from exposure. Mackenzie, it seems, was dissatisfied that Van Rensselaer was to command, and neither he nor Gibson attended at all. This threw a damper on the whole proceeding: the Jefferson men would not take arms. Van Rensselaer, it is said, offered to march into Canada in the ranks, with his knapsack and musket, under any command, with 100 men; but on calling for volunteers, the first time there appeared 83, from St. Lawrence and Salt Point, and all told: second, 71 appeared; and the third time only 35 would volunteer. They then concluded to disperse, and by great exertions of the leaders, enough were kept together to remove the arms, &c. to French creek; and then they fled, "every man to his tent," or rather to his own home.

Thus ends the affair, and I presume no further agitation will be kept up on this frontier. Mackenzie has showed himself equally selfish, heartless, unprincipled, and cowardly; and so great is the revulsion of feeling here, that I verily believe, if he should venture here again, he would be handed over to the tender mercies of the Canadians, without ceremony or pity.

From the New York Journal of Commerce.

The news of the plunder of the United States arsenal at Elizabethtown, Essex county, N. Y. published in our morning edition, is confirmed. The robbery took place on the night of the 25th ult. A letter from Mr. Hand, the keeper, to the state authorities at Albany, says one thousand muskets with fixed bayonets were stolen, twenty-six rifles, twenty pairs of pistols, a large quantity of knapsacks, and perhaps a quantity of cartridge boxes. Entrance was effected at the back door, by means of an iron bar. The stolen arms, says the Albany Argus, "are supposed to have been taken in several sleighs, and were tracked north. Messengers had been sent in every direction, but Mr. H. believes that the property is secreted within a few miles, unless it has been transported into Vermont. The guns were mostly old; but recently cleaned, polished, and oiled. Mr. H. had applied promptly to Gen. Wool for aid in the recovery of the property." This officer, according to a letter in the Albany Journal, has several companies of militia at his disposal, but no regulars. Another letter in the same paper states that the teams which carried off the stolen property came from Westport and Lewis.

On the night previous to the above outrage, the state arsenal at Batavia was again broken open, and robbed of one hundred muskets and 1,000 lbs. of powder.

From the Albany Argus.

Despatches are from Gen. Wool to the 25th, inclusive, dated at head-quarters, Champlain. The early indications of quiet had given place to a revival of the Canadian war spirit; and recently persons had been actively engaged in collecting and concentrating between Champlain and Plattsburg supplies of cannon, carriages, ball, small arms and ammunition, with the avowed intention of invading Canada, the first favorable opportunity, at three points, viz: at Swanton, Vermont, Plattsburg; and at some point between Ogdensburg and Watertown. The main attack, it was believed, was intended to proceed from the Champlain frontier. These circumstances had induced Gen. Wool to call for three companies of infantry militia, and some thirty or forty mounted men. This corps had been judiciously distributed at the proper passes, with guards near the patriots' depots, with instruction to detain them the moment their removal should be attempted: and the greatest vigilance was exercised to prevent and arrest these movements, and with expected success. A material change had taken place in the public mind; so much so, that it was thought Gen. W. would be able to obtain a volunteer force sufficient to answer all present purposes.

The movement from the neighborhood of Ogdensburg, we know, has proved an entire failure; the poor creatures who composed the expedition having returned, half frozen, without setting foot on the main shore of Canada. The most valiant of them, however, did cross the line, and took possession of Hickory island—a feat which we suppose might have been accomplished by one man, as easily as by three companies. By the last accounts, General Skinner, who had been deputed by General Wool for the service, with orders to call out a battalion from General Hazleton's brigade, had reached Watertown, and would proceed forthwith to French creek, and endeavor to secure the arms, etc. belonging to the state.

PROCLAMATION.

By William L. Marcy, governor of the state of New York.

Whereas information has been communicated to me that the arsenals belonging to this state, situated at Batavia, in the county of Genesee and at Watertown, in the county of Jefferson; and at Elizabethtown, in the county of Essex, have been recently broken open and a part of the property of the state deposited in them has been stolen therefrom, I do hereby offer a reward of $250, in addition to a like sum offered by the keeper of the state arsenal at Batavia, to any person who will furnish information that shall lead to the detection and conviction of the offenders. I do further offer the sum of $300 to any person who shall give information that shall lead to the detention and conviction of the persons who broke open the arsenal at Elizabethtown and stole property of the state therefrom; which said rewards is to be paid on the conviction of the offenders. And I do furthermore offer the sum of $250, in addition to a like sum offered by the keeper of the arsenal at Watertown, to any one who will give such information as shall lead to the discovery and conviction of the persons who broke open the arsenal at that place and stole the property of the people of this state therefrom; the said sum to be paid on conviction of the offenders. And whereas, also, several pieces of ordnance belonging to the people of this state have been stolen and carried away from those who had possession thereof on behalf of this state, I do hereby offer the sum of $100 as a reward to any person who will give information which shall lead to the apprehension and conviction of the persons guilty of forcibly and feloniously taking and carrying away any piece of ordnance or cannon, the property of this state, from any gun-house, or from the persons having possession thereof; and I do hereby call upon all magistrates, sheriffs, and civil officers, to be vigilant and active in their efforts to bring to justice the persons who have committed any of the aforesaid offences.

Given under my hand and the privy seal of New York, the first day of March, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-eight.

W. L. MARCY.

JOHN A. DIX, Secretary of state.

The "Globe" of Tuesday night contains the following:

A report has been received from Colonel Worth, at Buffalo, stating that the arms, ammunition, and artillery, stolen from the state arsenal at Batavia, have been recovered. They were found in the possession of about seventy men, who were encamped several miles higher up the lake, and about three miles from either shore. The men were ordered to disperse and return to our shore, where many arrests were made by the district attorney; of whom five, including Burnham and Holmes, first and second in command, were conducted to Buffalo, and are now undergoing examination with the most abundant testimony, having been caught in the fact. In the course of the preliminary examination, it was clearly established that the final movement was to be made on the night of the 27th, before which some six or eight hundred men were waiting in the immediate neighborhood to join.

From the Buffalo Com. Advertiser, March 1.

Early this morning we received by express, the following intelligence, which, as it comes officially, may be depended upon as correct.

Gen. Scott arrived at Monroe, Michigan, on the 25th ult. On the 24th, a party of patriots took possession of a small island in the Detroit river, on the Canada side, and the next day were dislodged by the British batteries, and escaped to the American shore.

There were about 150 in number, and were immediately disarmed by brig. gen. Brady, and suffered to disperse.

A deputy marshal is in pursuit of the leader, the patriot adjutant gen. McLeod.

No other expedition has attempted to cross the frontier in that region. This is the fourth Navy island expedition.

The Kingston Chronicle gives further particulars of the threatened invasion of Canada. A despatch was received at that place, stating that the patriots were concentrating their forces with an intention of making an attack upon Kingston or Gananoque, on the night of the 22d of February. The militia, under major Fitzgerald, were fully prepared to receive them, and mustered to the number of 1600 bayonets. The patriots are stated to have been about 200 strong. An account of what transpired on our own frontier at the same time is given by the Ogdensburg Republican. Mackenzie had been visiting that vicinity some weeks since, and had addressed our citizens at that place and at Canton. On his return to Plattsburg, a convention was held somewhere in St. Lawrence county or in Jefferson, and a plan of operations concerted. The passing and repassing of many strangers induced the belief that a general rising was about to take place on the frontier, and an attack made upon Kingston on the 22d. Three thousand men, with arms, ammunition, and provisions, poured into French creek like a torrent. Fearing a visit from the United States' authorities, they removed to Hickory island, on the Canada side, 24 miles from Kingston. The next step was to call for volunteers from among this chivalric host, when eighty-six responded to the appeal. This was a damper. The lookers-on bore the same portion to the actors as in other farces, and activity became the order of the day. The play was ended, and the audience retired.

HON. FELIX GRUNDY'S LETTER, On the Tennessee resolutions of instruction.

WASHINGTON CITY, Feb. 6, 1838.

To the members of the general assembly of the state of Tennessee who voted for the following resolution:

"Resolved, therefore, by the general assembly of the state of Tennessee, That our senators be instructed, and our representatives in congress be requested, to vote against any law which may propose to enforce the sub-treasury system of finance, recommended by the president of the United States in his message to congress of the 4th day of September, 1837."

Gentlemen: I received, last evening, the foregoing instructions from the legislature of the state I, in part, have the honor to represent in the senate of the United States, and hasten to inform you of the course I shall feel it my duty to pursue.

I have always been an advocate for the right of instruction, and holding that right as belonging to the immediate constituency of the representative; I also hold that it is the duty of the representative to obey; that is the state legislature possesses the right to instruct the senators from their state in congress, as to any particular measure, and the people possess the right to instruct their immediate representatives.

You have instructed me to vote against a particular measure. To vote against it will involve no infraction of the constitution; nor am I required, by a compliance with your instructions, to inflict a direct and vital injury upon my country. You, by your instructions, have taken upon yourselves the responsibility of the vote I am required to give, and I am relieved from it. The people will look to you as the principal, and to me merely as the agent, in performing an act expressly required by those in whom I recognise the power to instruct.

I therefore shall obey, in good faith, your instructions as expressed in your resolution, and shall vote against the bill, in all its stages, precisely in the same way I should do were I opposed to it myself, and not follow the example of those senators of the opposition who have felt at liberty to disobey the instructions of their state legislatures.

If my political principles would allow me to do so, perhaps a case cannot be imagined where stronger circumstances could exist in justification of a course different from the one I have adopted. You were elected as members of the legislature in August last. Before that time, nothing had been said publicly among the people of the state in regard to the collection, safe-keeping, and disbursement of the public revenue. Consequently, your election furnishes no indication of public opinion on this subject, because the question was not then considered, and was not before the people.

The president's message, at the special session in September, first disclosed the views of the administration upon this subject. This document could not have been seen by many of your constituents before you left home for the seat of government, where you convened on the first Monday in October. Therefore, most of you could not have had an opportunity of ascertaining the sentiments of your constituents before you met in October. I am also constrained to believe that such was the fact, as to your means of knowing the views of your constituents on this measure, from the obvious consideration that had you really known that their opinions were against it, your respect for those opinions must have led you to immediate and prompt action on the subject. How, otherwise, can you justify your conduct in delaying to act till the 18th day of January, 1838.

Neither have I heard of any memorials or remonstrances, indicating the public sentiment, that have been sent to you, requiring you to interpose between me and my vote on this subject.

You met on the first Monday in October last, and have continued in session ever since. I cannot, therefore, but think it improbable, if not impossible, that the people have impelled you to this measure; because, but few of you, since the commencement of your session, have visited your constituents, and I have not understood that any of you before your election or since, have been instructed by them.

I have noticed in the newspapers one political meeting having been held in Nashville, to instruct the Davidson members on other subjects; but this measure, on which you instruct me, was not named.

Further. If it were for the public interest for you to act in this matter, why did you not act more promptly upon the president's message, which appeared in September last; and the bill introduced by the finance committee at the special session? For three months and a half after you met, and knew what measures were recommended by the executive branch of the government, you remained silent, permitting your senators to exercise their own judgments; and not till a few days past did I hear that you were earnestly engaged, in one branch of the legislature, in passing your instructions.

It cannot be supposed that you were waiting to know what measures would be proposed, for you had the last message of the president early in December, in which he adhered to his former recommendation.

As to the bill which might be brought forward by the finance committee in reference to the measure recommended in the message, you did not see it before you adopted your resolutions, at least in one branch of the general assembly.

The bill reported by the finance committee, known as the sub-treasury bill, and which you could not have considered when you instructed me, differs in several important particulars from the bill of the special session, and, with proper modifications, I feel confident that some of you, as well as myself would pronounce it a measure of great public utility. Yet without knowing any of the provisions of the bill, or how it might be amended or changed in the senate, you have instructed me to vote against it.

You thus see, that if I were disposed to depart from, or evade, the principles I have long professed, you have furnished as fair an opportunity as I could desire; because, in the first place, there is no evidence that your instructions are in accordance with the will of the people of Tennessee, with whom rests the paramount right or power to instruct; and, in the next place, because you instruct me to vote against a bill, of the contents of which you were wholly ignorant, never having seen it.

But, sirs, the abuse of a right does not prove that it does not exist, and it is better to adhere to sound principles, although sometimes errors may be committed in the application of those principles by men who have the management of public affairs, than to abandon any of those fundamental doctrines on which the people must rely to carry out, in practice, the representative principle itself.

I therefore waive all exceptions to your proceedings, and shall vote upon this measure, when it comes before me, according to your instructions. In doing this, I act upon a great principle, which I deem essential in a free representative government, and hope you will not suppose, for a moment, that I am influenced, in the slightest degree, by a desire to conciliate your favor, beyond the simple discharge of my duty.

Having thus explicitly stated the course I shall pursue, I should consider myself altogether inexcusable, were I to omit bringing to your notice some important considerations connected with this subject.

You instruct me to vote against a particular measure. You are obeyed. What am I next to do? You, at least some of you, as I know, have been vehement in your complaints against those who administer the government and their friends, for not doing something to relieve the embarrassments of the times.

A distinct recommendation is made by the president, and the subject is brought before congress for its decisive action. You say that the measure recommended by the president will not do; and tell me to vote against it. This instructs me negatively as to what I am not to do, but gives me no light whatever as to what I am to do, affirmatively. If you had only vouchsafed to have told what would answer the purpose and meet the exigency, you would have relieved the public as well as myself from great anxiety, and from the negative position in which you have placed me, of being obliged to prevent, (so far as my vote may go,) anything being done to relieve the country.

You say the patient is very sick, and will die, unless immediate relief be afforded. The president of the United States, who is admitted by all parties to possess talents of the highest order, as well as great experience, has given his opinion as to the appropriate remedy. You condemn it; declare it will kill the patient if applied; and yet you leave the patient in his suffering condition, and will not disclose the panacea that, in your opinion, would effect a cure. Now this, it seems to me, is precisely the condition in which you have placed yourselves.

I am aware that the leaders of the opposition, in other parts of the country, say that a bank of the United States would afford a remedy for existing evils; but this I am constrained to believe is not your opinion, from the following evidence. A proposition to instruct the Tennessee senators in congress to vote for a bank of the United States, was brought forward at an early period in your session. You failed to act upon it, and no such instructions were adopted. From this fact, but one inference can be drawn, which is, that you did not desire the establishment of such an institution. Therefore, if I were inclined to vote for a United States bank, as the remedy, (which I am not,) you have thrown an obstacle in the way by your conduct, which implies that you would disapprove of such a course; and more especially, as, according to my recollection, there stands on the journals of former sessions of the general assembly or Tennessee, legislative condemnations of a national bank in almost every form; and these you have not rescinded or revoked. It is true, I have heard it suggested that the opinions and situation of my colleague in the senate prevented your acting as you otherwise would have done on the subject of a national bank, against which he stands committed.

I will give no credence to an intimation so disreputable to the majority of the legislature of my own state. It cannot be that members of the general assembly of Tennessee would forego what they deemed a great public benefit, to favor any individual whatever. They would indeed be to change the good old maxim of "measures not men," into men, not measures, which I am sure, none of you will venture to avow, before those who have honored you with their confidence.

I think, therefore, I may fairly conclude that you are not only opposed to the particular measures you instruct me to vote against, but also opposed to

United States bank. You will perceive that I am confirmed in this conclusion by the fact that you are an instructing legislature. In some states they never instruct their senators. They say that they are opposed to the practice, if not being founded on principle; and such is understood to be the creed of a large party in the country. But this is not the case with you. You instruct where you wish to do so, to insure a vote against a specific measure; and you refuse to instruct where the instruction proposed to be given is contrary to your opinions and wishes.

This is shown in the proceedings of the majority of the legislature at your recent session. Resolutions were before you for instructing your senators to vote against one measure, and to vote for another. You adopted the resolutions instructing the senators to vote against the sub-treasury system of finance, and did not adopt those instructing them to vote for a United States bank. Hence, the conclusion is irresistible that you were in favor of the first instruction, and against the last.

Thus the treasury bill, for the collecting, safe-keeping, and disbursing the revenue, which is the remedy proposed by the friends of the administration, and a United States bank, which is the great panacea of the opposition, being both rejected and negatived by you, what remains?

Nothing, that I can think of, but the present deposit system. This, no doubt, three-fourths of you have often censured and condemned; in fact, the very preamble to your present resolutions contains an unequivocal condemnation of it. I am, therefore, left to my belief that you are opposed to the continuance of that system. But if you are not so, and do really think favorable of it, how easily could you have said so, in your instructing resolutions, and then I should have known that, in laboring to amend and rectify that system, and render it safe, I was fulfilling the wishes of my instructors.

We, who are here, see daily developed the plan of the opposition, which is to embarrass the administration by thwarting its measures, and, at the same time, to propose no measure themselves to extricate the country and the public revenue and credit from existing difficulties. I will not, however, permit myself for a moment to believe that you are acting under any sort of dictation or instructions, emanating from this quarter. Common courtesy, and the relation I bear towards you, forbid such an idea, although I cannot deny the fact that there is (accidentally, no doubt) a remarkable coincidence between your course and that of the opposition here.

Perhaps you have not distinctly understood my sentiments in relation to the collection, safe-keeping, and disbursement of the public money.

The principle, for the establishment of which I have felt anxious, is that a separation between the government and all banks should take place, so as to prevent the public money, (which ought to be collected only to pay the expenses and for support of the general government,) from being used for banking purposes; or in other words, from being banked or discounted; or which must involve the public credit in all the hazards and losses of private business transactions. All beyond this is matter of detail, about which I have never felt any great solicitude, provided this great object should be attained, and the money be forthcoming, when wanted to meet the exigencies of the government, without being so mixed up with banks and business concerns, as, in times of great embarrassment or excessive trade, to leave the government without its means, in order to enable those who have used those means, through the banks, to return them at their convenience.

I consider such a separation as I have named as very desirable, both for the banks and for the government; and until it shall be accomplished, the community will be periodically afflicted by those expansions and contractions of bank issues which are incident to, and produced by, the deposit and withdrawal of the public money from the possession of banks who hold it with permission to loan it.

Besides all these weighty considerations, at this moment, in a time of profound peace and great national prosperity, we find the banks all over the country (including the late United States bank, under its state charter) with their vaults closed, and the banks that were used for receiving deposits to be loaned refusing to pay to the government the money which has been placed with them on deposit. The consequence is, that while the money of the government has been invested by these banks in doubtful or deferred loans to the trading community, it has been obliged to resort to an issue of treasury notes to pay the public expenditures. This has produced considerable inconvenience; but should such an occurrence take place (as it would be almost certain to do) in time of war, disgrace and ruin, and national bankruptcy and dishonor, would be its inevitable consequences.

Such a disaster, too, would be quite as likely to happen from inability on the part of the banks, as from design; to either or both of which the government must be subjected; and it would be more likely to occur where one bank had the custody of all the public treasure than where it should be in the custody of many banks; because a single bank could act with more direct concert in thwarting the government, or in withholding its means, to effect any favorite object of its own, or of a political party.

I presume that none of you would hazard the opinion that the bills of non-specie paying banks should be received in payment of the public dues. If, however, such an opinion should be entertained by any of you, you must perceive, on reflection, that no just discrimination could be made between banks that may ultimately be found solvent, and those whose notes are not worth six cents in the dollar. Would you undertake to maintain that the government shall be compelled to receive and collect its debts in bank paper, which no individual can be compelled to receive for a debt due to him? No man in the community can be compelled to take any thing for debts due him but gold and silver; then why should the government be coerced to take depreciated paper?

So far from the friends of the administration attempting, as is unjustly charged upon them, to make one currency for the people and another for the government, their effort is to place the government precisely on the same footing, in this respect, as that which every individual in the United States now occupies. Besides, can any thing be clearer than that congress, by authorizing any thing but gold and silver, or their certain equivalent, to be received in collecting the public revenue, would violate that provision in the constitution which declares that "no preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one state over the ports of another?" Now, if the notes of non-specie paying banks are to be received for customs, and the notes of the banks in New Orleans and Charleston should be fifteen per cent. below specie, while the notes of the banks of New York and Philadelphia were only two and a half per cent. below specie, and the notes of all these banks are receivable, would there not be a plain and palpable advantage, and preference given, "by a regulation of revenue," to the ports of New Orleans and Charleston over the ports of New York and Philadelphia? This is certainly forbidden by the constitution.

It has been urged against the democratic party, of which I am a member, that we are hostile to state banks. This is unfounded so far as I understand the sentiments of the party, and I know it to be unjust so far as it relates to myself. My only wish is, so far as any action of congress is concerned, that the banks shall not be permitted to trade upon, or on any pretence to loan or use, the public money. In this there is no hostility to the banks, unless it can be shown that, in addition to the other privileges conferred on them by their charters, these corporations have a right to claim the possession and use of the money belonging to the people of the United States, and collected for the lawful purposes of government. No such right exists; and the banks have no more cause of complaint against the government, on this account, than they would have against an individual who would not let them have his money to loan out and trade upon. As to the state banks, I would say, the states have created them, and whatever control should be exercised over them, ought to proceed from the state governments respectively, and not from congress, which has no power either to establish or abolish them.

Equally unfounded is the misrepresentation made by the opposition respecting an exclusive metallic currency for all purposes. It is certainly desirable that all banking institutions should so establish and secure their metallic basis, as that the paper circulation founded upon it may be rendered safe, and convertible, in times of depression as well as prosperity, into gold and silver, at the will of the holder; and that this convertibility shall be substantial, and not merely theoretical. It would also be highly beneficial to banish all small bills from circulation, as this would introduce specie into common use for the ordinary transactions of life, and would also be a protection to the industrious classes, who always suffer most in any bank failure, because they hold the greatest portion of the small bills in circulation.

But for the accomplishment of these objects, the people must look mainly to their state authorities, and not to the general government.

As to a United States bank, my opinion is unchanged and confirmed. Waiving all constitutional difficulties, I should look upon an act chartering such an institution, as creating a power dangerous to the liberties of the people; a power that would not merely control the currency and the rise and fall of property, but would control the government itself. It would hold in its hands the means to make war or peace, and to dictate all the policy and measures of the government.

It is all a delusion to suppose that congress, by its enactments, could fetter and bind down such an institution, with a large capital, and to which all the other banking institutions in the country must be subservient. Place around it what legislative guards you please, it is still an unshorn Sampson, that will, at pleasure, snap asunder all the ligaments with which you may seek to bind it. The late bank of the United States has disregarded the very law of its creation, whenever it became its interest to do so, as in the case of the investigating committee appointed by congress, its exclusion of the government directors, &c. and no reason exists to authorize a belief that another bank would not conduct in a similar manner. If it should oppose the government, it would be stronger than the government. If it should unite with the government, it would make the government stronger than the people.

In conclusion, I would remark, that you have exercised a right which you possessed in instructing me, and I have only discharged a duty which you have imposed on me, in making this address to you as declarative of my views. We are co-agents for the people of Tennessee, in our different positions. Your instructions do not at all conclusively prove that I either had done wrong in that respect, or should have done wrong, had they not been given. They only show a difference of opinion between you and myself, which, in this case, no doubt does really exist. But as I understand and shall practice upon the right of instruction, it is not based on any supposed superiority of the instructing members of the legislature over the senators of the state; nor is it founded upon the idea that the particular or individual opinions and feelings of those members who vote to instruct, create any binding obligation upon the instructed senator, because these opinions and feelings may not be the result of a careful consideration of the subject, or a knowledge of the will of the people, but may be produced by party prejudices or partialities, stimulated from other sources than the people themselves to effect party purposes. On none of these is the right of instruction founded; but it is founded upon the presumption that the members of the legislature, from their great number, their mode of selection from all parts of the state, and their supposed converseance with the people are the safest exponents of the public will.

But the great common arbiter, the people themselves, have a right to decide all questions between their agents, and they may be of opinion that my instructors have instructed me either too much or too little; and to them, so far as I am concerned, the whole matter is respectfully submitted.

Your fellow-citizen,

FELIX GRUNDY.

NEW YORK AND THE SUB-TREASURY.

The following preamble and resolutions have passed the lower branch of the legislature of New York and been transmitted to the senators and representatives from that state in congress:

IN ASSEMBLY, February 14, 1838.

Whereas, his excellency the governor of this state, in his late annual message to the senate and assembly, held the following language:

"If the view I have taken of the origin of the difficulties in which the country has been involved is correct, they are in a great degree attributable to the accumulation of a large surplus revenue by the United States, and the use of it by the banks. It is the duty of congress to guard against evils from this source, and it is gratifying to perceive that the president of the United States has promptly directed their attention to the subject, and suggested important changes in the existing mode of collecting, keeping, and disbursing the public moneys. There can be no question, that it is both the right and the duty of the general government, to collect the public dues in the legal currency or its equivalent, and so to keep its funds that they will be safe while they remain with the government, and be at its command whenever wanted for disbursement. Fully concurring in the necessity of attaining these results, I am confident that the measures necessary to produce them, may be of such a character as will not affect injuriously the business concerns or the banking institutions of the country. One of these measures, and the most desirable among them, is the discontinuance of the use of the banks as the fiscal agents of the general government, or such a modification of their agency as will effectually prevent them from using, for any purpose whatsoever, the public moneys that may be committed to them for safe-keeping. This discontinuance or essential modification of their agency will, I have no doubt, prove mutually beneficial to all parties and to all interests. The subject is now before congress, and if acted on by that body in the same conciliatory spirit with which it had been presented to them by the president, and with the same sincere desire he has evinced to arrive at a right conclusion, I have scarcely a doubt they will speedily dispose of it, in such a manner as will be safe for the government, satisfactory to the great body of their constituents, and conducive to the general welfare."

And whereas, it is notorious to the assembly, and to the country, that the "important changes in the existing mode of collecting, keeping, and disbursing the public money," suggested by the president of the United States, and above alluded to by his excellency, have been proposed for adoption in the senate of the United States in the form of a bill "to impose additional duties, as depositories, upon certain public officers, to appoint receivers general of the public money, and to regulate the safe-keeping, transfer and disbursement of the public money of the United States: therefore,

Resolved, That this assembly does solemnly and earnestly protest against the passage of the said bill, and against the adoption of any scheme on the part of the government of the United States, whereby the revenues of that government shall be required to be collected in specie alone, or in any other medium than the common currency of the country, or whereby the custody of the said revenues shall be committed to the hands of any officers or agents, other than those appointed by the representatives of the people:—

Because such a scheme will require the creation of a multitude of new officers, and a large and needless expenditure for its establishment and maintenance.

Because it will render the public moneys insecure—will expose them to embezzlement and peculation, and will be used for partisan and corrupt purposes.

Because it will augment to a dangerous extent the patronage and influence of the federal government by placing the control of the whole treasure of the nation in executive hands, through the power of appointment to, and removal from office.

Because it is an alarming and "untried expedient" in finance, combining in itself the odious features of all the disastrous "experiments" which have preceded it, and tending directly to the establishment of a dangerous engine of despotism, under the form of a treasury bank.

Because, by requiring specie alone in payment of all debts to the government, it will place at its command a large portion of the coin of the country, thereby enabling it to control at pleasure, and to destroy the currency created by the states.

Because its necessary effect will be, even if honestly and faithfully administered, to weaken and destroy the state banks, by removing from their vaults the metallic bases of their circulation.

Because it will withdraw from the trade, commerce and industry of the country, many millions of money, to be locked up, and remain for long periods unproductive in the chests or vaults of receivers general and other officers, and thereby must injuriously affect the business of the people.

Because it will practically establish one currency for the government, and another, and inferior currency for the people.

And, finally, because it is recommended by nothing in experience or in theory—is in direct hostility to the fundamental maxims of free governments which refuses to the executive branch all control over the public moneys—is pregnant with dangers to the business, the credit, the prosperity and the liberties of the country:

Resolved, That in the opinion of this assembly, the reiterated recommendation of the aforesaid scheme by the president of the United States, seconded by the approval of his excellency, the governor and the persevering effort made to procure its adoption, have deeply alarmed the people of this state; and furnish, at this time, a prominent obstruction to the revival of credit and business, and a return to specie payments by the banks; and that the senators and representatives from this state in congress, will best conform their acts and votes to the wishes of their constituents, by steadily and faithfully opposing its adoption.

Resolved, That the speaker of the assembly be requested to transmit to each of our senators and representatives in congress, a copy of the foregoing preamble and resolutions, with a request to present the same to both houses.

L. BRADISH,
Speaker

J. N. LAKE, Clerk.

RESUMPTION OF SPECIE PAYMENTS.

From the New York Evening Post.

At a meeting of the officers of the banks of the city of New York, held on the 25th of February, 1838, the committee on "the resumption of specie payments" submitted the following report, in part, viz.

In contemplation of the resumption of specie payments by the banks of the city of New York on, or before the 10th of May next, and under the uncertain contingency of a simultaneous or early resumption by the banks of some of the other great commercial cities, it is incumbent on those of New York to adopt all the measures within the limits of their resources, which may enable them, not only to resume, but also to maintain specie payments.

Much already has been done in that respect, the result, as well of causes not under the control of the banks, as of positive action on their part.

1. It appears, by the annual returns of the bank commissioners, that, exclusively of the dry dock bank, which is not included in the returns of this year, the gross amount of all the liabilities of the city banks, payable on demand, deducting therefrom the notes and checks of other banks held by them, and the balances due to them by other banks amounted

On the 1st January, 1836, to -	$26,918,105
Do. do. 1837, to -	25,485,287
Do. do. 1838, to -	12,920,694

making a diminution in the liabilities of more than twelve millions and a half during the year 1837.

2. The detailed statements for the 1st January, 1838, rendered by the several city banks to their standing committee, show a balance to their credit of more than four millions due to them by the banks out of the state, and of more than two millions in account with all the banks out of the city. Ample means, as also appears by those statements, have been provided by the country banks of the state for the redemption of their notes which circulate in the city.

On a view of the whole subject, we may confidently say that the relative strength of the banks is, and at the time of the resumption will be, greater than it was during the last two years, and probably at any former time.

The fall in the rate of foreign exchanges, now considerably below par in our city paper, renders it absolutely certain that no exportation of specie can take place, and more than probable that a considerable influx may be expected. This fact, now indisputable, must have an effect on public opinion, and ought to remove the apprehensions of those who may have believed our efforts for an early resumption premature. Secure, as all the banks in the United States now are, against foreign demands, we are justified in expecting their co-operation. If this is obtained, we do not perceive any obstacle to an early, easy, and safe resumption of specie payments.

A continued suspension, on the part of some of the other great commercial cities can alone render the resumption on our part difficult, and may prevent a free application of the legitimate resources of New York. Yet such is the favorable relative state of the balances between this and the other parts of the union, that, for the present at least, but little difficulty need be apprehended from the effect of natural causes. Of deliberate acts of hostility, as there could be no motive for such, there should be no apprehension of them on our part. We trust that, supported by the community of this city and by the state, the banks will be able to surmount all obstacles, and, on or before the tenth of May, to resume and maintain specie payments.

The preparatory measures on their part appear to be: 1. a reduction of their liabilities out of the state, and drawing in their foreign funds; 2. an equalization of the balances due from and to each other, and a mutual return of notes, which may enable all to resume on an equal footing, and with equal safety; 3. a sufficient increase of their specie. On those points the committee will submit a separate report.

PETER STAGG,
GEO. NEWBOLD,
CORNELIUS HEYER,
JOHN J. PALMER,
C. W. LAWRENCE,
F. W. EDMONDS.

Whereupon the report was unanimously adopted by the meeting.

On motion,

Resolved, That the same be published.

PORK TRADE. Cincinnati, Feb. 3. Mr. Coleman, has given me the exact number of hogs slaughtered in this city the present winter, (the business is now over.) The number is 118,950. At Covington opposite Cincinnati, the number is 13,923. About 6,000 only, I am told, of those slaughtered in Covington, have been brought over and packed in Cincinnati. The number of "wagon hogs," those slaughtered in the country, and brought into our market on wagons, &c. is not ascertained,—supposed to be about 7,000. There have all been packed in this city,—making altogether 132,000 packed in Cincinnati. Three years ago, the number of hogs packed in this city, was 162,000—two years ago, 123,000—and last year 103,000—so say the "pork men."

In weight there is not more packed this year than last, owing to the lightness of the hogs generally;—they fall short, at least one fifth,—and the spoiled meat, (owing to the warm weather,) the amount, at least, will be ten per cent.

RAFT OF THE ST. FRANCIS. About three hundred miles up the St. Francis, from its discharge into the Mississippi, commence the rafts of timber by which its navigation is obstructed. These rafts are three in number the most extensive not exceeding one mile. They commence at the head of the back water on the St. Francis, from the overflow of the Mississippi; and it once properly removed, they would not probably again obstruct the channel. Like all other obstacles of a similar character on the western rivers, these rafts are formed of immense masses of heavy timber, piled up and driven compactly together; and in some portions, by the deposit of alluvion, and the decay of vegetation, a soil of some depth has been found upon them, supporting living trees, under brush and herbage. In some places a person may cross the St. Francis without beholding any indication of the stream, or being conscious that he is in its vicinity. The river enters above, flows beneath the raft, and again issues below, as if it had just risen from the ground. Some of the rafts rise and fall with the variations of the stream, like a floating bridge. The principal obstruction is opposite the lower extremity of West Prairie; but there are several smaller ones lower upon the stream, and on its various tributaries. In the vicinity of this raft, lies an extensive swamp, some eighty miles in length, which, it is thought, may be reclaimed by a canal, which would cost $250,000. A short distance below the raft, an extent of country fifty miles in length, and about thirty in breadth, was sunk to the depth of one hundred feet, perpendicular, by the earthquakes of 1811 and 1812. The effect of this was completely to destroy the channel of the St. Francis for thirty miles, its waters being divided into a number of small streams none of sufficient depth, for navigation. By filling up all those channels excepting one, and cutting that deeper, a good navigation might be obtained, it is thought, most of the year for steamboats. The expense of this undertaking is estimated at $50,000.

There is said to be something remarkable in the vast inundation between the St. Francis and the Mississippi. Prior to the earthquake of 1811 and '12, these bottoms were not flooded; but by that event, this whole section of country was so shaken and depressed that the freshets of the St. Francis found their way across the interval to the Mississippi; yet, as a general thing, the banks of the latter stream exceed those of the former in height, by sixteen feet—a levee of a few feet altitude would therefore, be amply sufficient, for every variation of the waters. The eastern bank of the St. Francis, it is believed, should also be leveed, for a distance of one hundred miles from its mouth, to prevent the back water of the Mississippi from the overflowing the bottoms, that lie between the streams, in time of flood. The probable expense of removing the rafts and other obstructions to the navigation of the St. Francis, as well as of constructing the necessary levee, is estimated at less than $200,000, and the value of the territory redeemed at nearly eight millions! When the St. Francis is once cleared from obstructions to its navigation, it will present one of the noblest streams in the western valley—navigable for a distance of four or five hundred miles, through lands of unrivalled fertility. The redemption of this extensive tract—three hundred miles in length, and upwards of thirty in breadth, is a subject of deep interest to the State of Missouri. All her southern countries would be profited: a navigable stream would flow past every farm—the health of the region would be improved—the agricultural interests would be advanced, and 30,000 new families could be settled on lands, now deemed worse than valueless. This subject, we repeat, is one of vital importance to the southern section of Missouri, and we trust that her representatives at Washington, will duly consider those measures, which may be introduced before our national councils, most conducive to her interest.

A CURIOSITY. We have on our table a curious specimen of the freaks which old Neptune, in his coral caves, plays upon the treasures, which have, from time to time, been snatched by him, with the aid of Æolus, from the clutches of man. 'Tis nothing more nor less, than four silver dollars, so rare in these "suspension-specie times"—locked together in a close embrace, but as unnatural as the Siamese connexion, and covered with little shells, and stones thrown upon them, we presume, at the beck of Neptune, by the nymphs of the sea, in their fantastic gambols, when issuing for a frolic, from their grottoes. Some of these shells are beautiful, and must have been the result of these nymphs' curious searches in "the deep bosom of the ocean" where they were buried. But to the narrative.

A Spanish ship was lost on the Borlings, coast of Portugal, about 55 years ago, bound from a port in Peru to a port in Spain. When wrecked she had fifteen millions of specie (so says our informant) on board. Two English captains, capt. H. Abbinette, and brother, last year obtained permission from the owner in Lisbon, to fish for the money, and with india-rubber dresses dived into six fathom water, and obtained some days £1500—$3,000,000 had been previously fished up.

Captain —, of the —, to whom this curiosity was presented, while at St. Ubes, by these fishers of dollars, saw some doubloons which they succeeded in getting up a few days previous to his leaving that port, just as bright as when they came out of the mint.

These money fishers are the same who blew up the royal William at Spithead. The curiosity can be seen at our reading room.

RESUMPTION. Nine of the banks of the state of Maine, held a meeting at Augusta on the 6th ult., and came to the following resolution:

"Resolved, As the sense of this meeting, that an early resumption of specie payments is desirable and practicable, and that it is hoped that the convention of banks, which is adjourned to meet on the second Wednesday of April next, in the city of New York, will name an early day after said meeting, for a general resumption of specie payments by the banks; and that it be recommended to the several banks in this state, to express to the delegation from the state, in said convention, their earnest wish that they should vote for an early day after said meeting for the general resumption of specie payments by the banks." [Jour. of Com.]

WASHINGTON'S LIFE-GUARD. There is a man now living in this county, named Valentine Gruber, who was attached to Washington's life-guard, and who is, most probably, the last man living who belonged to it. We do not know the particulars of his services, but in consequence of them he now receives a pension from government of $96 per annum. He is a very old man now, and cannot long survive those of his compatriots who have gone before him. We were never more strongly impressed with the truth, that "Republics are sometimes ungrateful," than we were upon learning the decision of congress this winter, upon an application made by this man. He was placed on the pension list about the year 1820, under the law of 1818, and was stricken off under the law of 1820, which allowed pensions to indigent persons only. He was quite a poor man and really within the provisions of the act, but upon representations made to the war department which were not according to fact, his name was stricken off. He toiled on in poverty until about 1832, when, upon full proof of the facts, he was reinstated upon the list. Conceiving that he had a claim upon his country for the pension unjustly withheld from him, as he believed, from the time he was stricken off, until he was restored to the pension list, he made application to the present congress for the passage of an act authorizing the payment of the pension so suspended; but although all the facts, we believe, were made out by good proof, this justice was denied him—his claim was rejected. Millions of the people's money can be squandered with impunity, but the just claim of an old soldier for a few hundreds, cannot be recognized or paid!

There was one other member of the life-guard, resided formerly near this place, named John Britt, of whom the following anecdote is told:—General Washington, when visiting Bedford at the time of the whiskey insurrection in 1794, it is said, stopped at the house of one of the citizens, Mr. David Epsy, we believe, and while sitting at a front window, observed a person passing up the street whose face he instantly recognized. He ran to the door, and called out several times "John Britt," when the person thus addressed turned around, and perceiving who was calling him, flew with all imaginable speed to meet once again his revered general. The meeting was cordial and mutually gratifying; and it is said, the constables and other officers of the law, who used before to plague the old man with unwelcome visits, never more troubled him after his interview with general Washington.

EXEMPLARY VERDICT.—In the case of A. S. Garr, against B. H. Day, editor and proprietor of the penny paper called the Sun, for libel, the jury gave a verdict yesterday morning for the plaintiff with $3,000 damages. The great majority of the jury, as we hear, were for even heavier damages.

The gravamen of the offence was that after having published the libel, which might have been done inadvertently, the defendant refused to publish a correction unless paid for it. He was very justly mulcted therefore in heavy damages.

REMINISCENCE. A friend, who is curious in the preservation of local facts connected with the early history of this island, has furnished us with the particulars of a remarkable occurrence in the year 1669, which we do not recollect to have seen recorded in any of the historical publications respecting this place. At any rate, in the absence of more interesting matter, it may afford a moment's gratification to those readers who have a taste for antiquarian details of this nature.

Martha's Vineyard, it will be remembered, was settled by white inhabitants some years prior to the settlement of Nantucket; and the people of the latter were occasionally wont to visit the former, in order to procure such articles as might be needed, from time to time, for agricultural or domestic purposes. In the year above mentioned, John Barnard and wife, a newly married couple, together with Eleazer Folger, brother of the latter, Isaac Coleman, and an Indian, proceeded to the Vineyard in a boat, in order to obtain the requisite materials wherewith to commence house-keeping. While on their return, June 6, 1669, the boat was overturned by a sudden squall of wind, near the island of Muskeget. Barnard, his wife, Coleman, and the Indian were immediately drowned; but Folger clung to the boat, which was soon carried by the tide to those shoals or flats called Swile island, lying two or three miles northeast of Muskeget. On finding he could reach the bottom, he arrested the progress of the boat and turned it over. But nothing of the contents remained excepting a ploughshare, which had been tied to one of the thwarts—and with this he succeeded in throwing out the water. After long continued exertions he became much exhausted, and entered the boat in a truly helpless condition, without sail, oar, paddle, food, or drink. He laid himself down in the boat, fell asleep, and remained so until the boat, drifted by the current, landed on Cape Cod, near Morris island.—Nantucket Inquirer.

MISSISSIPPI BANKS. The bank commissioners reported to the legislature of Mississippi the result of their investigation. They give it as their opinion that the banks of that state will not be able to resume before August, 1839. There were several bills pending before the legislature for the charter of additional banks.

FRANKLIN BANK OF BOSTON. We learn from the Boston papers that the grand jury, sitting in that city, on Wednesday last found bills of indictment against Josiah Dunham, Thos. G. Dunham, Eb'zer Stevens, Ebenezer Hayward, and Samuel S. Ridgway, directors of the Franklin bank, for official misdemeanor and criminal neglect of duty in certifying a false return made by Hathorne, cashier of that bank, to the legislature. They were arrested and gave bail in $2000 each, with sufficient sureties for their appearance from day to day.

REMARKS OF MR. TALLMADGE,
In defence of the people of New York against the charge of bank influence, in the result of their election. Delivered in the senate of the United States, February 8, 1838, in reply to Mr. Hubbard, of New Hampshire; the sub-treasury bill being under consideration.

"Out, dam'd spot! out I say!"

Mr. President: The senator from New Hampshire (Mr. Hubbard) who has just taken his seat, introduced, in the course of his remarks, the subject of the late elections. He read, with approbation, that portion of the president's message which charged the result of those elections to the interference or the influence of the banks; and he undertook, by this means, to explain the result in New York. Sir, I am not in the habit of interfering with the concerns of other states, or of attempting to explain the causes of political movements in them. But, when I find one "poaching upon my manor," and endeavoring to account for matters which he can but ill comprehend, I feel it my duty to interfere.

I rise, therefore, not to enter upon the immediate merits of this sub-treasury scheme, but for the sole purpose of setting the gentleman and country right, upon this allegation of bank interference or bank influence in the recent election of the state of New York.

Sir, I saw with pain this charge in the president's message. I felt humiliated that it should emanate from him. I felt that the honor of my native state was wounded, and that the wound was inflicted by one of her own sons. Had any other man occupied the executive chair, I would have lost no time, after the delivery of the message, containing that unwelcome and unmerited aspersion, in repelling it in a manner and with a spirit becoming the occasion. But, sir, the relations which have always existed between the president and myself, rendered the task one of reluctance and of delicacy; and but for the introduction of it into this debate, by the senator from New Hampshire, I might have submitted to the mortification of the charge, from my unwillingness to encounter it from such a source. As it has been thus introduced, I will endeavor to show that it has been made without the slightest possible foundation, and wholly unjustifiable, let it come from what quarter it may, or let its endorsers be whom they may. In saying this, I speak from my own personal knowledge and observation, to a great extent, and from an intimate acquaintance with the concerns of the state, and the causes which influence the minds of her citizens in political matters. Previous to the extra session of congress, when the Globe, the reputed organ of the administration, put forth Gouge's sub-treasury scheme, with his money drawers and hydrostatic balance, and all the other paraphernalia which accompanied it, and seriously recommended it to the public consideration, it was received and treated as a mere matter of burlesque—as the dream of a visionary. No one, for a single moment, supposed that it would ever be brought forward by the president for the consideration of congress. The whole country was astounded, when the executive, at the extra session, did recommend it. The people then perceived, that the "untried expedient" from the banks of the St. Lawrence had been put forth in the official organ, as a mere feeler. And with the characteristic boldness of all experimenters, it was determined if it did not conform to the public pulse, the public pulse should be made to conform to it. To accomplish this, there must be no apparent force nor unnecessary rashness. Hence, the executive, with great meekness and humility, expressed his entire willingness to co-operate in any other measure, if this should not meet the approbation of congress. This declaration was received with great satisfaction by those who foresaw, from their knowledge of the business wants of the country, that such a measure would be destructive of its best interests. They hoped to be able to demonstrate its utter impracticability and inapplicability to the state of the times, and that then the president would cheerfully unite with them in some plan which would afford relief to a suffering and almost desperate community. It was, however, soon perceived, from the pertinacity with which this unexpected measure was urged forward by its advocates, that the whole power of executive influence was brought into requisition in order to force it through in the shortest possible period, and before the people had time to deliberate upon it, or to send their remonstrances against a project so fatal to their interests and so destructive to their hopes. I will not detain the senate with a history of its progress. It is familiar to us all. Suffice it to say, that the bill passed the senate, and was laid on the table in the other house by a decisive vote. This was deemed equivalent to a rejection of the bill. It could not have been called up again at this session if it had been desired. Many voted against the state bank deposit system, which was offered as an amendment, for the express purpose of killing the bill in its original shape. After all this, the president, in his next message, seems to think that congress, at its extra session, made an expression against a national bank; against the state banks; but not against the sub-treasury project! And as the late elections were carried by bank influence, he deems those overwhelming expressions of the popular will as no evidence that the people are against this wild and visionary scheme! He considers his election as evidence that a majority of the people of the United States are against a national bank, because he had expressed himself decidedly hostile to such an institution. I am free to admit that his inference is as fair as can be drawn from a popular election where a thousand other considerations enter into the canvass. But it cannot be disguised that many electors, who were in favor of a national bank, always voted for gen. Jackson, notwithstanding his avowed hostility to it. He had personal popularity which scarcely any man before him possessed, and which I hope to see no man hereafter enjoy. Often have I heard it said by many, that although they disapproved of his measures, they would still support him, because they believed him honest, and would not suffer him to be abused for the honest exercise of his opinions, though they led to the adoption of bad measures. Sir, this feeling was extended to the present executive in his election. He was known to be the favorite candidate of the late president, and many electors supported him on account of their ancient prepossessions in favor of general Jackson. I say, then, that the success of a candidate for office, who is for or against a particular measure, is not conclusive evidence that the people accord with his views on that measure.

The state elections, in my judgment, were more conclusive against the sub-treasury, than the president's election was against a national bank. There were, undoubtedly, other causes which mingled in the contest. But still, the expression of the popular will, in every state where an election was held after this project was first recommended by the executive, was such as ought to have commanded his respect, and prevent him again urging a measure so odious to the people, and, if carried out, so fatal to their prosperity.

But, Mr. President, this hard money policy must be persisted in. The executive had embarked in it, and he seemed determined that no obstacles should impede his progress. He, therefore, charged all this outbursting of the people to the influence of the banks, and considered it as no evidence of an honest opinion against this ill-fated measure. Notwithstanding the decisive vote against it in the house of representatives—notwithstanding his declared willingness to adopt any substitute for it, it is again brought forward with the same expressed deference to public opinion, and again urged with the same open contempt of it.

Sir, this charge, though general in its terms, seems peculiarly intended for the state of New York. As a representative of the people of that state, I repel it as unworthy of the chief magistrate, as it is undescribed by them. In the lawful exercise of the elective franchise, they have seen fit to rebuke the administration for its destructive policy, and their action is attributed to the influence of the banks! They saw industry paralysed, the energies of a whole population frozen up, business of all kinds at a stand, the wives and children of a portion of them famishing for want of bread, and suffering for want of clothes to cover them, and they resorted to the ballot box as the only means in their power to express their disapprobation, and that expression, thus made is charged to the influence of the banks! Sir, the president has forgotten the character of the people of his own state. He treats them as mere slaves—as men born to obey the executive mandate, and not to think or act for themselves. Sir, let me tell you, that the people of New York "know their rights, and knowing dare maintain them"—and as long as I remain here, they shall not want a representative to assert them on this floor. No man, be he high or low, shall go behind the ballot box to canvass the motives of my constituents, without being rebuked for his presumption. I care not what the result of an election may have been; when the people have spoken, their voice is to be respected and obeyed—and they shall not be called to an account, with my consent, by an officer of the general government for their conduct in their local elections. No matter what party succeeds, such a charge is an indignity to the whole people. I am utterly astonished to hear it from such a quarter. I knew that the official organ here, and other loco-foco prints, had, in this way, attempted to account for this overwhelming result in New York—but I also knew that this charge, from such sources, had been indignantly repelled by the democratic press of the state—and, notwithstanding all this, the president, as in the case of the sub-treasury, adopts the repudiated explanation of the Globe, and ushers it forth to the world.

Sir, I have said that there was no pretence of foundation for this charge. I will demonstrate, by statistics and by figures, as clear as any proposition in Euclid, the truth of my assertion. New York has fifty-six counties—all, except thirteen, have one or more banks,—of those thirteen, five are opposition, and eight are administration counties. These eight counties gave the administration a majority at the presidential election in 1836, of 6,781. In 1837 they gave 2,617—making an opposition gain of 4,164 in a net vote of less than 18,000. These are counties where there are no banks. It is another remarkable fact that the opposition gain in these eight counties is nearly double what the other counties in the state averaged in their gains. Now, sir, if the banks influenced the results of the election, why do we find the administration losing more, in proportion, in counties where there are no banks, than in those where there are banks? The truth is, the influence of the banks, as such, was exerted on neither side—but, so far as there was an influence exerted by their officers or those connected with them it was greater on the part of the administration than the other. There never was a charge made which is so entirely destitute of any one circumstance to justify it, and which so entirely fails. Coming from such a source, it is an assault upon our free institutions. It is impeaching the principle of self-government. What becomes of our boasted liberty, if the petty incorporations of the states can so far influence the exercise of the elective franchise, that the expression of the ballot box is not to be taken for what it is intended to represent? What will be our character abroad? The eyes of all Europe are turned to our experiment of self-government, and are confidently expecting a failure of the system, which we have predicted would regenerate the civilized world. What will they now think, when they have the authority of the chief magistrate of this nation, that in the great state of New York, the "empire state," the influence of her local banks has controlled her elections, so that their results cannot be relied on as any evidence of the popular will? Sir, under such an imputation as this, a citizen of the United States in a foreign land, would blush for his country. And should he repel it, he would be confronted with the president's message, as conclusive evidence in support of the charge. As to my own state, so far as my action will go, I will endeavor to wipe out the blot from the fair escutcheon of her fame.

Mr. President, having shown that the election in New York was in no way controlled by the interference or influence of the banks, it may not be amiss to inquire what causes produced those results which were so astounding to the whole union? Sir, it was the principles understood to be entertained by the administration and its prominent friends, and the measures which they were pursuing to carry out those principles. What are they? They are to be found in the creed of a faction which had its origin in the city of New York in 1829. I do not say they embraced the whole creed, but I do say they were a part of it. And if any man, at that day, had predicted that a democratic republican administration would have countenanced any portion of the principles of this faction, he would have gained no more credence, nor as much, as he now would, if he predicted that, in an equal period, the administration would adopt the other part of the same creed.

Sir, it will hardly be believed by the people of other states that any portion of those doctrines have been adopted by the administration and its prominent friends. I do not say that they have been—but I say their course of measures has been such as to impress upon the people the belief of their adoption. I will not undertake to go into the documentary evidence at this time, as the ground of that belief, although I may deem it not inappropriate on some other occasion. This faction was the origin of that party which is now termed loco-foco, and which, in the pure days of the democratic republican party, was turned out of Tammany hall, and held their meetings in the open air, whenever it was necessary to take measures to reduce the price of flour, or carry out any other great principle in political economy! After their principles received the countenance of the administration, they again returned to the old wigwag, displaced the ancient sachems, and there they now illustrate their ideas of freedom of speech and free discussion, by violent inroads and forcible interruption of the assemblages of orderly citizens, who happen to entertain opinions on matters of public policy, contrary to their own. They are now the leaders of the party, and the prominent candidates for executive favor.

The leading feature of their creed was THE DESTRUCTION OF THE WHOLE BANKING SYSTEM OF THE COUNTRY—THE REPEAL OF CHARTERS AND THE ABROGATION OF VESTED RIGHTS. This was a part of their doctrines, and was understood by the people to be the policy of the administration.

Why was it so understood? I will endeavor to answer the question.

After the war on the Bank of the United States had ceased, a more ruthless and unrelenting warfare commenced and carried on against the state banks. The success which had attended the former emboldened the assailants, and they supposed they could make an easy conquest of the latter. It never occurred to them that they might not be able to bring the same force into the field in the one case as in the other. They never stopped to inquire whether the people entertained any different views in regard to the state institutions and a national bank. They seemed to have forgotten that during the progress of the first war, they had per-sualed the people that there were monstrous evils connected with the one, and equal benefits to be enjoyed with the others. They left out of view all their promises of a sound currency, and an equalization of the domestic exchanges of the country by means of the state banks. They forgot the oft repeated pledges and assurances that the state institutions could perform, equally well, all the duties the Bank of the United States had performed for the government. In short, they had no recollection that those institutions were to give even a "better currency" than we had enjoyed under a national bank.

But, sir, although they had overlooked all these things, the people had not forgotten them. Those who opposed the re-charter of the Bank of the United States were honest in their opposition. The present generation has principally grown up and come on to the political stage since the incorporation of the Bank of the United States in 1816. They have enjoyed its benefits—and that it possessed great benefits no rational man ever denied—but they were not able fully to appreciate them, whilst in the full fruition of them. They could see what seemed to them to be its dangerous powers, and with the assurance that the state banks could perform all its duties to the government, and confer all its benefits on the people, without possessing those powers, they were content that it should go down, and that the state banks should be substituted in its place. Another consideration which influenced their action was the popularity of general Jackson, who led the forces in this contest. Many believed in his sagacity in this matter, and pinned their faith upon him; and others, although they doubted the policy of the measure, still believed in his honesty of purpose, and therefore went with him "right or wrong." But they had no idea of breaking down the state institutions, so intimately connected, as they believed them to be, with the business wants of the whole country; and when these attacks were made on those institutions the people began to suspect that they had been used as the instruments in assailing the national bank, with a view of destroying the others in their turn—such they thought they discovered to be the policy of the administration.

How did they discover it? By the principles which seemed to be maintained by the administration and its leading friends. By the manner in which they repudiated the state bank deposit system after they had suspended specie payments—a suspension brought about by causes beyond their control, and which certain measures of the executive had essentially contributed to produce—and the subsequent introduction of an "untried expedient," in the shape of the sub-treasury scheme—a scheme fraught with more mischief to the community, with more hazard to the public funds, with a more dangerous augmentation and concentration of executive power, than has ever been suggested in the history of this or any other government. And here, sir, permit me to say, that when the friends of this abominable measure, for I can characterize it by no milder term, present the alternative of it or a national bank, rest assured that there are thousands and thousands who have been opposed to such an institution, who will, without hesitation, give it their preference. But, sir, that alternative is not yet presented. Gentlemen are attempting to make up a false issue. They vainly imagine that they can conjure up the ghost of the old Bank of the United States to frighten men, as they would frighten children. Sir, that day has gone by. The people are looking for relief amidst the disasters which surround them. They see in the sub-treasury scheme nought but ruin—they look with horror upon its adoption as a consummation of ruin—they look to the state bank deposit system as the means of present, and if the anticipation of its friends be realized, of permanent relief. Some of the friends of a national bank have proposed plans for state institutions, which they think will supersede the necessity of a bank of the United States. At all events, those who are in favor of a national bank know that it cannot be had, if it be had at all, for some time to come; and they know that something must be done for the relief of the country. There is no other plan which can be adopted but the one proposed by the senator from Virginia. If it answers his expectations, it may satisfy the country—if it does not, the public mind will then be settled down as to what the remedy should be. As to the sub-treasury, I say with the senator from Massachusetts, give me any thing, or give me nothing, in preference to it.

What farther evidence had the people that the destruction of the state banks was a part of the policy of the administration? Meetings were held by the loco-focos, at New York, Philadelphia, Cincinnati and other places, where resolutions were adopted against the whole banking system, and in favor of an exclusive metallic currency. These proceedings were responded to by men in high official stations, and their responses were perfectly satisfactory. Being thus sanctioned by men in authority, these wild and visionary doctrines began to spread. Many who had viewed them as destructive of the best interests of society, began to renounce former opinions, and adopt this radical creed, because they believed it met the approbation of those who held the reins of party discipline, and who had the power of party dispensation.

The next evidence of the prevalence of this radical spirit was the manner in which the subject of the suspension of specie payments was treated. By the law of New York, when a bank neglects or refuses to redeem its notes in specie for ten days, the chancellor is directed to issue his injunction, close its doors, appoint a receiver to take charge of its concerns, whose duty it is to proceed to collect the amount due to the bank, to pay the amount owing by it, and finally, under the direction of the chancellor, to distribute to the stockholders the residue of its effects, according to their respective interests. There was due to the banks, at this time, by the people of the state, about seventy millions of dollars. A false collection of this amount, by receivers, would have spread ruin and desolation throughout the whole state. The most valuable estates would have been sold to satisfy these demands. There would have been no competition at the sales—for very few indeed could have commanded the means to become the purchasers. The result would have been, that the most desirable property must have been sacrificed, and bought in by some miserly hard money man, who had hoarded this vile trash for the purpose of preying upon the misfortunes of his fellow citizens, or by the receivers for the benefit of the stockholders. In either event, the community would have been the sufferers, and the hope of present business or of future prosperity would have been utterly blighted. Every rational man foresaw this result. The legislature was then in session, and a law was forthwith passed, by an almost unanimous vote, to suspend the forfeiture of the charters of the banks for one year. This act of the legislature was openly denounced by public meetings in the city of New York, composed of those claiming to be the exclusive friends of the administration. And this denunciation was reiterated by the official organ of the government here, claiming to speak the sentiments of the administration on all important public matters. Why was this act thus denounced? Because, if there had been no such interference, the banks would have been all prostrated, as I have already shown, and we should have been at once brought to the "golden age" which has been so long desired. It is true, the great interests of the community would have been sacrificed. But, what of that? We should have had the "constitutional currency"—"a hard money government"—"a successful experiment"—and let me add, a prostrate country and a ruined people! Sir, the people were saved from this awful calamity by the patriotism of the legislature. The suspension act was not a boon to the bank; it was a favor to the people. Whilst it saved the bank charters from forfeiture, it saved the people from destruction. Other states passed similar laws, and thus were frustrated the designs of those who deemed the suspension of specie payments the proper occasion to carry out their favorite plan of breaking down the whole banking system of the states. I will not say that the president entertained this design. But the people judged him by the effect of his measures. On his call, congress assembled at the extra session to take into consideration the "great and weighty matters" which he was to submit to them. The message was delivered, and the people no longer doubted that the president and the administration intended to destroy the banks. At all events, they could not doubt that such would be the effect of the measures recommended by him. They could only infer the intent from the result which must inevitably follow.

By the constitution, it is made the duty of the president, from time to time, to give to congress information of the state of the union, and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient. He can recommend no others—and if he deems such as he does recommend, both necessary and expedient, he of course desires that congress shall adopt them, and that they shall be carried into full execution. He had already seen that, by the intervention of the state legislatures, the bank charters of the different states had been saved from forfeiture, and that the designs of those who wished to destroy them, had been frustrated by these acts. Well now, sir, what were his recommendations, and what their inevitable results? He recommended a "uniform law concerning bankruptcies of corporations, and other bankers," as a measure "fully authorized by the constitution." Such a law, under his oath of office, he must have deemed "necessary and expedient." And he must, too, have desired its enactment by congress, otherwise he would not have recommended it. What would have been its effect, its practical operation, if congress had concurred in the views of the president, and passed a bankrupt law, as recommended by him? Why, sir, every bank in the union would have been forthwith handed over to commissioners to be appointed by the executive, under such a law, and their concerns closed up—for they had all suspended specie payments, and of course would have come within its provisions. This would have accomplished what was prevented by the action of the legislatures, namely, a forfeiture of their charters and a consequent destruction of the banks themselves. Sir, I do not state this case too strongly—such would have been the inevitable result throughout the union—there is no escape from it. The president could not but have foreseen it. It was the unavoidable consequence of his recommendation. He must have made it with his eyes open, and seen its effects, unless he was blinded and bewildered by this ignis fatuus of loco-focoism. What would have been the effect upon the business and credit of the country? Utter ruin and destruction from one extremity of the union to the other. Sir, "war, pestilence and famine" could not more effectually have done their dreadful work.

Fortunately for the country, congress did not adopt this recommendation of the president, although it was urged with great power by one of the most prominent friends of the administration, (Mr. Benton.)

Sir, there is another feature of this measure which deserves consideration. This subject was not new to the president. It had received his careful examination and full deliberation on a former occasion. In 1826, when he stood upon this floor, as a senator from the state of New York, he maintained on this subject the same principles which I am now endeavoring to maintain. He then represented all the great interests of the state, as I am now attempting to represent them. The banking interest was one of the most important, because it gave life to commerce, stimulated agriculture, aided the mechanic and manufacturing industry of the country, and produced a healthy action in the whole body politic. This was a period anterior to the origin of the faction in New York, whose doctrines have since been adopted. Mr. Van Buren, on the discussion of the BANKRUPT BILL, at that time before the senate, opposed its application to banking incorporations, "as an odious exercise of power not granted by the constitution." In 1826, senator Van Buren opposes a bankrupt law in reference to our banking institutions, "as an odious exercise of power not granted by the constitution," and in 1837, president Van Buren proposes "a uniform law concerning bankruptcies of corporations, and other bankers," as a measure "fully authorized by the constitution." Now, sir, permit me to ask if such a measure was unconstitutional in 1826, can the recommendation of the president make it constitutional in 1837? I should think not, unless the constitution changes as the party changes! But, whether it does or not, is immaterial to the present question. The president recommended a bankrupt law in reference to bank incorporations. He must have reviewed his former opinions on that subject. He must have deemed the crisis so important as to overcome his old constitutional scruples, and that it was now "necessary and expedient" that such a law should pass, and thereby bid the country of the curse of paper money, and thus restore the "constitutional currency" of gold and silver.

Mr. President, I have said that the people believed the design of the administration, and its prominent friends was to destroy the banking institutions of the states. They foresaw what would have been the effect of the adoption of the bankrupt law. They also saw, and still see, the effect of the sub-treasury scheme. They know that both are equally fatal. They saw the manner in which the sub-treasury was urged at the extra session. They saw, by the official organ, that, after it was defeated in the house, it was again to be forced upon congress at the present session, and they see clearly now that its adoption, at this time, will be as fatal to the banks as a bankrupt law would have been before. Its adoption would have prevented the resumption of specie payments. Or if the banks should resume, it would compel them to stop again. Or if they continued to pay specie, it would be merely a nominal thing, and they could do no business. If this were the proper occasion, I would undertake to demonstrate these propositions to the satisfaction of every rational man. But, I did not rise for that purpose. Suffice it to say, that if a deliberate plan had been formed for the total destruction of the banking system of the whole country, it could not have been more skillfully devised. What was the process by which it was to be accomplished? 1st. By inducing the legislature not to interfere. 2d. By a bankrupt law. 3d. By the sub-treasury scheme, which is the only proposition now under consideration. Under it, the banks cannot resume; and if the legislature grants no farther indulgence, their concerns must be closed up. If they do resume, they will be compelled to stop again, and they will be in the same situation as if they had not attempted it. If they do not stop, it will be because their circulation is all called in, and they continue because they do no business. In this event the stockholders will wind them up, for the reason that they cannot afford to have an investment which produces no income. In either case, the result is the same—the destruction of the banks. I have already shown the disastrous consequences to the whole community from such a state of things—and I will add, in the same language which I employed at the last session, "that it would even be better for the country that a tornado or an earthquake should spread its desolation around, than that we should have this scheme inflicted upon us."

Mr. President, these were some of the causes which produced the results of the late elections in New York. There was another. The people saw the treatment which those received, who opposed these measures. They saw some of their representatives here, pursuing the straight forward track of principle, and maintaining the ancient and honored creed of the party; they saw them turning neither to the right nor to the left to gratify the ambition of any man, or to court the favor of any faction; they saw them maintaining the same principles which the whole party maintained but a short period before, and refusing to turn about at the word of command; they saw them opposing the measure which the whole party, with general Jackson at their head, opposed in 1834, and which the official organ of the administration then pronounced "disorganizing and revolutionary," and manfully resisting the executive mandate to swallow the sub treasury scheme now, which they all repudiated then; they saw them standing in their places, and with that moral courage and undaunted firmness, which should ever characterize the representatives of a free people, resisting the encroachments of executive power; they saw them, with an independence worthy of the better days of the republic, combating the heresies and interpolations which were attempted to be introduced amongst the ancient canons of their political faith; they saw them endeavoring to revive the drooping energies of the country, to resuscitate its trade and commerce, to stimulate its industry, to invigorate its enterprise, to give hope and animation and life to its benumbed and palsied faculties, and to pour consolation into the wounded and broken spirits of the mercantile community. They saw all this; and they also saw, that for all this, their representatives were DENOUNCED AND PROSCRIBED by the official organ of the administration! They saw the despotism which had been introduced by the discipline of party. They saw that neither party men, nor the party press, dare speak their sentiments on any political subject, until they knew the executive will. They saw the manner in which the machinery of party was brought into requisition to manufacture public opinion to sustain that will when it was once made known. They saw that there was no independence of thought or of action within the sphere of executive influence. They saw, in short, established at the seat of government the most perfect despotism on earth. THE DESPOTISM OF OPINION!

Sir, this system of dictation, of proscription and denunciation commenced during the second term of general Jackson's administration. He would not tolerate a difference of opinion on any subject in which his feelings were enlisted. I hope it was the infirmity of age. I might instance the distribution bill, the specie circular and the currency bill. In all these measures, the great body of his friends in both houses were opposed to him. Still, the official organ did not hesitate to maintain the executive will, and to denounce the action and opinions of those who constituted the legislative branch of the government.

The present executive, on entering upon the duties of his high station, promised to "follow in the footsteps of his illustrious predecessor." This sub-treasury scheme is the darling project of the late president; and, I presume, in pursuance of the above pledge, it has been brought forward for our consideration. To my mind, this is its only merit—and no one would be more desirous than myself of gratifying the feelings of that illustrious man, and of smoothing the path of his declining years, by the adoption of his favorite measure, if my judgment did not tell me it would be at the expense of the great and paramount interests of the country. If he himself were here, in the zenith of his power, he, perhaps, might see his way more clearly. But, when his successor attempts to imitate his giant strides, he will follow him, as Iulus followed Æneas from the flames of Troy, hæud passibus æquis.

Sir, my colleague (Mr. Wright) has spoken of that portion of the friends of the administration, who oppose the sub-treasury scheme, as a small party, and, with seeming reproach, has kindly extended to them his charity; and more than intimates that they ought to give up their opinions to the majority of their friends. Sir, that small party are maintaining the same principles which the whole party maintained but a short time since; and the difference between them, being a matter of principle, cannot be compromised. It is, indeed, a small party, and should on that account have been protected from the apparent sneer of the senator from New Hampshire, when he said they had assumed the name of "conservatives." Whether that name has been assumed by them, or has been given to them, I will not stop to inquire. This much, however, I will venture to affirm, that we shall be as well satisfied with that appellation, as the gentleman and his friends will be with the name of "subservatives," with which they have been honored, and with how much justice I leave to themselves to determine. Sir, this small party has been, not inappropriately, called "A SPARTAN BAND"—and let me tell those gentlemen who have reproached them with the peculiarity of their position, and the paucity of their numbers, that when they are asked to lay down their arms they will give the Spartan answer—"Come and take them." Sir, my colleague, from the peculiarity of his own position, should have seen the indelicacy of commenting upon ours. The time has been when he has been left in a smaller minority of his political friends than we are now; but, I will do him the justice to say, that his opinions, in all matters in difference, have always coincided with the executive. And, had the executive seen fit to recommend the resuscitation of the state bank deposit system, instead of the sub-treasury, we should have seen my colleague, with my friend from Virginia and myself by his side, leading on his faithful troops, and instead of the golden banner under which he is now fighting against the institutions of the states, and the rights of the states, he would have raised aloft the stars and stripes of his country, the emblem of those rights, and under that sign he would have conquered. And the man who should have had the rashness to introduce the sub-treasury scheme, in opposition to the executive recommendation, would have found himself without even a corporal's guard.

Mr. President, the constitution guarantees the liberty of speech and of the press—but, under the present system of party discipline, and executive intimidation, there is virtually an abrogation of both. The executive department has become too powerful for the legislative branch of the government. The great apprehension of the framers of the constitution were from the legislative power. They little dreamed that in the short space of half a century, short in the lifetime of a nation, the executive department would become so formidable as to overawe the legislative branch, and dictate to them the measures which he himself was to execute. Sir, the very theory of the constitution has been reversed. The legislative has become the weaker power, and the executive arm is already strengthened beyond what the fathers of the constitution deemed consistent with the safety and freedom of the government. Add to that strength the powers of a treasury bank, which are contained in this bill, and you have given all that can define a despot.

Mr. President, I have spoken with some feeling on this subject. I have reason so to speak. I have seen the distress of the country—I have seen the embarrassments of my fellow-citizens. I have seen them imploring this government in vain for that relief, which they are entitled to ask, and which the government is bound to give. I have seen the government impairing public confidence in the institutions of the states, withdrawing itself upon its own resources, and leaving the people, unaided and alone, to buffet the storms of adversity which it has aided to bring upon them. I have seen the executive enter upon a system of experiments, destructive of our dearest interests, and subversive of our brightest hopes. I have seen him persist in those experiments after a decisive negative by the legislative branch of the government, and after his wild and visionary schemes have been most signally rebuked through the ballot box. I have seen him turn a deaf ear to all the remonstrances which have been made in every part of the country, and with a cold and dogged indifference, set at naught all these demonstrations of the popular will. Sir, I aver, in the face of the American people, that there is no cause for the continuance of the distress under which the country now labors. It is in the power of the administration to remove it by its simple fiat. This war upon the banks has dried up the sources of sustenance to the people, as well as of revenue to the government. Let the executive abandon this sub-treasury scheme—a scheme unworthy of the age in which we live—let him, in good faith, resolve to revive the state bank system, and forthwith, as fast as the joyous news could travel, hope, and life, and activity, and confidence would spring up on every side to gladden it on its way. I would say then to the people of this country, if I could flatter myself that my voice would reach them, rouse from your lethargy; burst the Lilliputian ties that bind you; walk forth in the dignity of freemen; and teach your public servants that you will not silently submit to have your credit destroyed, your property sacrificed, and your wives and children deprived of their bread, to minister to the partisan ambition or unwholy caprice of any man or set of men, whom your misplaced confidence may have elected to stations beyond their deserts. And let me tell you, sir, if the voice which New York has already uttered be disregarded, and these destructive measures persisted in, I warn you to beware of the INES OF NOVEMBER; for her voice will then be heard from the Atlantic to the lakes, louder than the mighty cataract which thunders on her western border.

TWENTY-FIFTH CONGRESS.

SECOND SESSION—SENATE.

March 1. Mr. McKean presented a memorial numerous signed by citizens of the borough and county of Erie, in the state of Pennsylvania, complaining that the medical board appointed under authority of the act of the 3d of March last, by the President of the United States, to select suitable sites for marine hospitals on the Mississippi and Ohio rivers and Lake Erie, for the benefit of sick and disabled seamen, boatmen, and other navigators on the western rivers and lakes, have, in discharging that duty, confined their examination exclusively to one or two places on Lake Erie; while the claims of all other places, many of them containing in a high degree all the requisites for such an establishment, have been overlooked and neglected; and praying congress to order a new examination by a competent, impartial, and unprejudiced board.

Mr. McKean, after some remarks upon the manner in which "poor Pennsylvania" had been neglected, moved to refer the memorial to the committee on commerce; which was referred accordingly.

Mr. Buchanan presented the following memorial:

To the senate and house of representatives of the United States in congress assembled:

The undersigned, delegates of the people of Pennsylvania to a convention now in session at the city of Philadelphia to reform the constitution of the state, respectfully represent:

That in the present crisis of public affairs, the undersigned deem it their solemn duty, as well as their unquestionable right, to counteract by memorial and remonstrance the false impression which may be made to congress as to the will of the people of this state concerning their deranged monetary interests, of which will and interests the undersigned believe they enjoy as good means of being well informed as any other representatives of the people of this state.

The people, at every election since the Bank of the United States, first, and afterwards various state banks, have, by violent and improper efforts, been struggling to compel the community to submit to banking control, contrary to the constitution, and the well understood public interest and will: the people have at every election chosen representatives instructed to put an end to such bank control and restore the authority of the people; but to many of those representatives have been misled to sacrifice the will and interests of the people to those of the banks.

Your memorialists have reason to believe that there are very few, whether of the people or their representatives, not unduly influenced by banks who do not now desire that an entire separation should be realized between government and all banks, and as speedy a restoration, as may consist with the general welfare, of the hard money which the banks have driven out of circulation; and these two fundamental principles, viz. first, the total separation of government from all banking opera-

Mr. Buchanan explained that it was not general Macomb's bill that he wished to speak on, but the subject of brevet pay, which he understood was involved in it, on which he wished to say a few

But, sir, my purpose is confined to a single particular object. It is to prohibit and suppress a practice here, which, if not stopped, must ultimately, in addition to other deplorable consequences of a private and social nature, put an end to all freedom of debate and action, in your halls of legislation, banish from them all just and rightful authority.

Mr. D. wished to add, that from information derived from this and other sources, he was convinced that the system of light-houses in this country was greatly inferior to those of France and of England. This subject was important and necessary to the public safety and interest. It was important in this, that many of our light-houses emitted but a feeble light, which could be seen only a few miles, in consequence of imperfection in the reflectors; whereas, in France such improvements had been made that they could be seen as far as the figure of the earth would allow. They had been seen at the distance of thirty miles. This document proved that some of our light-houses were in a very unsatisfactory condition. In one case a vessel with a cargo worth $300,000 had been lost, because the light could be seen but a short distance. Such lights, if depended on at all, were worse than none. The committee on commerce had, last year, inserted a clause improving the light-house bill. Some light-houses had been so badly located that they had never been lighted; others were found to be of very little utility; and it was required by that bill that an examination should be made, under direction of the navy commissioners, of every spot on which it was proposed to erect a light-house. The consequences had been, that there was now upwards of $200,000 of the appropriations for this purpose remaining unexpended, because the proposed sites were deemed to be bad. But the great object in this document did not relate so much to the location as to the improved character of the light. Mr. D. hoped the committee would look into the subject, and report to the senate if any improvements could be made.

The document was referred to the committee on commerce, and ordered to be printed.

The bills for the relief of Thomas J. Lawler and S. M. Niles; of P. M. Bohanan; of Francis Gardiner; of Benjamin Moore; of Eli Horton; of John M. Oliver; of the heirs of general William Eaton; and the bill to provide for the uniform payment for horses lost in the military service of the United States, were severally read a third time and passed.

The bills for the relief of Jonathan Davis, of Mary A. Patrick, and of Philip Revere and his legal representatives were severally considered, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Various private bills from the other house were read twice, and referred.

The senate resumed the consideration of the sub-treasury bill.

Mr. Strange concluded his remarks on this subject in favor of the bill.

Mr. Merrick having expressed his desire to speak on the subject on Monday,

The senate adjourned, after an executive session.

March 5. The following among other memorials, &c. were presented this day.

By Mr. Clay: from Jonathan Thomson, of New York, stating that he had been for many years collector of that port, more than $100,000,000 of the public money having passed through his hands; that he had fulfilled all his engagements to the last cent; and praying the surrender of the various bonds he had given. Referred, on the suggestion of Mr. Wright, to the committee on the judiciary.

By Mr. Wright: from William Wells and other citizens of Buffalo, praying congress to pass a law to indemnify him for the loss of the steamboat Caroline.

By Mr. Clay: a memorial from citizens of Hampshire county, Virginia, remonstrating against the exaction of specie by the post office department, and stating that Stockton and Stokes, the mail contractors, whilst they were receiving specie, were issuing their small notes to an unknown amount. Mr. Clay moved that this memorial be referred to the committee on the post office and post roads.

Mr. Grundy objected, regarding it as a matter of finance. Mr. Clay was satisfied that to whichever committee it might go, there would be no remedy provided. But if the shin-plasters mentioned in the memorial were to be suppressed, it was the appropriate business of the post office committee.

Mr. Grundy disclaimed such jurisdiction for that committee, and the memorial was referred to the committee on finance.

Mr. Wright, from the committee on finance, made an unfavorable report on the act of the legislative council of Wisconsin, chartering the State bank of Wisconsin and Prairie du Chien, together with a joint resolution annulling that act. Read, ordered to a second reading, and the report ordered to be printed.

Mr. Buchanan, from the committee on foreign relations, reported the bill referred to them, providing for the maintenance of our frontier neutrality, with various amendments, restricting the seizures to "arms and munitions of war," and limiting to ships at sea the proviso, that the action under the bill shall not interfere with any trade carried on according to existing treaties and the law of nations, thus excluding the frontier continuous trade from an appeal, under the bill, to said law and treaties; also, limiting the bill to two years, from apprehended practical imperfections. The other amendments were slight.

The amendments were concurred in, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; subsequently read a third time and passed, and returned to the other house for concurrence in the amendments.

[See the bill in the proceedings of the house on Friday last.]

The following resolutions were offered and agreed to:

By Mr. Webster: calling on the secretaries of the war, navy, and treasury departments, for the names of all persons, in and since the year 1832, appointed as pension agents; the authority under which the appointments were made; copies of the instructions given them; the forms of commission; the sums advanced to them, and the times of those advances; the amount paid at each office: the average balances remaining; and the average balance remaining in the hands of each agent at a time named; together with copies of all letters from pension agents asking advances, or other compensation.

By Mr. Linn: instructing the committee on the public lands to inquire into the expediency of granting to a company in Wisconsin certain pre-emption rights, to enable them to construct a canal between the Wisconsin and Fox rivers, together with a copy of the charter of said company.

By Mr. King: instructing the committee on finance to inquire into the expediency of paying to merchants of Mobile the costs incurred by them in renewing their duty bonds, which, Mr. K. stated, sometimes equalled half the whole amount of the bonds, and had in no case been less than one-fourth; a loss which they would not have incurred if they had not believed that the act of congress would relieve, instead of thus oppressing them, in its effect.

By Mr. Wright: referring to the committee on finance so much of the report of the secretary of war to the president as relates to the safe-keeping, &c. of money appropriated for Indian tribes and individual Indians.

By Mr. Young: calling on the secretary of war for a copy of a recent report of a survey with reference to improvements in the Illinois and Kaskaskias rivers, with an estimate of the expenses necessary to remove the various obstructions to navigation.

The house bill making appropriations for revolutionary and other pensioners for 1838, was read twice and referred.

The bills for the relief of Jonathan Davis, of David A. Patrick, and of Philip Revere and his legal representatives, were severally read a third time, and passed.

The senate resumed the consideration of the sub-treasury bill.

Mr. Merrick spoke in opposition to the bill till half past 3 o'clock, resting his objections on various particulars, and arguing especially against an exclusive metallic currency.

Mr. Norrell having obtained the floor for to-morrow, the senate held an executive session; after which,

The bill for the relief of Peter Barge, and the bill to establish an additional land office in Michigan, were severally considered, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The senate considered, at much length, the bill to create a surveyor general's office for the state of Illinois.

Mr. Davis called for the yeas and nays on the question of its engrossment, which were ordered, and there appeared—yeas 16, nays 10. This number not being a quorum, the senate adjourned.

March 6. Among the petitions presented to-day were the following:

By Mr. Linn: from a company in Wisconsin, praying a grant of land for the construction of a canal near Milwaukee.

By Mr. Clay, of Kentucky: from Mr. Watson, of New York, a scheme for a national internal improvement and loan company, as a regulator of the currency, and fiscal agent of the government.

By Mr. Smith, of Indiana: a joint resolution of the general assembly of the state of Indiana, instructing her senators and requesting her representatives to use their best endeavors to procure the passage of a law providing that notes of all the state banks that may redeem their notes in specie on demand, shall be received in payment of the public lands.

Mr. S. said he was very happy to find that his colleague and himself had not been mistaken in supposing that such was the opinion of the state. He entirely concurred with the legislature on this particular point. He had already given his views at large on the whole subject, and he would not detain the senate, at this time, further than merely to say that it would afford him great pleasure to aid in the object of the resolution. The resolution spoke of public lands alone for which the paper of a specie-paying banks should be received. Mr. S. went the whole on that point; he would extend the principle to all government dues, as embraced by the amendment of the senator from Virginia to the sub-treasury bill, and he would go for that amendment as the only plan submitted, or likely to be, to carry into effect that principle at the present session.

On motion of Mr. S. the resolution was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

A message was received from the president of the United States, through Mr. A. Van Buren, his private secretary.

Mr. Clayton, from the committee on the judiciary, reported the bill referred to them to prevent the giving or accepting of challenges to duels in the District of Columbia, with amendments, the principal one of which was the substituting for the penalty of death, from ten to twenty years' confinement in the penitentiary.

The amendments were read, and the bill was made the special order for Monday next.

After several other bills of minor importance had been reported,

Mr. Niles offered the following, which being objected to, lies over one day:

Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury and the postmaster general be directed to communicate to the senate copies of any correspondence between their respective departments and the Metropolis bank of this district, with a statement of facts touching the conduct of that bank as a public depository and fiscal agent, and particularly in relation to the conduct of that bank in attempting to retain the public money in its possession, to pay pretended claims not allowed by competent authority.

The senate resumed the consideration of the bill to create a surveyor general's office for the state of Illinois.

Mr. Prentiss moved to amend the bill by striking out the salary of $2,000 and inserting 1,200.

After a protracted conversation by Messrs. Clay, of Alabama, Smith, of Indiana, Young, Walker, and others, the amendment was carried—yeas 20, nays 18; and,

On motion of Mr. Clay, of Kentucky, the bill was, for the present, laid on the table—yeas 29, nays 15.

The bills to create an additional land office in Michigan, and for other purposes; and for the relief of Peter Barge, were severally read a third time and passed.

The senate resumed the consideration of the sub-treasury bill, and the substitute for it offered by Mr. Rives. Mr. Norrell spoke two hours in favor of the bill. No other senator rising to speak on the question—Mr. Tallmadge remarked that several senators were at present absent, he therefore moved to postpone the bill until to-morrow morning, with the understanding that the vote should be taken on Mr. Rives's substitute. Mr. Wright would consent to the delay, but preferred that the bill should be passed informally, that it might not lose its place in point of precedence. Mr. Buchanan then rose, and said he had been waiting some time for an occasion on which it would be proper for him, in obedience to the instructions which he had received from the legislature of Pennsylvania, to move to postpone this bill till the next session of congress. Mr. B.'s colleague (Mr. McKean) had told him that he thought the period for this motion had arrived several days ago. Mr. B. now moved that the bill be postponed until the next session of congress, with the understanding that the vote should be taken on this question to-morrow morning, prior to the vote on Mr. Rives's substitute; and Mr. B. called for the yeas and nays on this motion, which were ordered.

The bill was then informally passed over.

The bill to maintain our neutrality on the frontier was received from the house, taken up by the senate, and on account of the supposed impotence of the senate's amendment, in which the house had non-concurred, (the amendment excluding the frontier continuous trade from an appeal to treaties and the law of nations,) the bill was, for the present, laid on the table.

On motion of Mr. Walker,

The bill to create a surveyor general's office in the state of Illinois, was taken up, and after a brief conversation, and on motion of Mr. Clay, of Ky., was again laid on the table. Yeas 20, noes not counted.

The senate proceeded to the consideration of the bill supplementary to the "Act to amend the judiciary system of the United States." After some conversation of a legal character,

On motion of Mr. Webster, the bill was laid upon the table.

Mr. Buchanan stated that he had consulted the committee on finance in relation to the amendment of the senate, non-concurred in by the house, to the bill to maintain our frontier neutrality; and they had expressed the opinion that the senate ought to insist on their amendment on account of its importance. He, therefore, moved that the bill be taken up, that the senate do insist, and appoint on their part, a committee of conference, in case the house should insist on its non-concurrence.

These motions were severally and successively agreed to.

The senate adjourned after an executive session.

March 7. We are indebted to the "Globe" for the following abstract of this day's proceedings. They will be recorded in detail in our next.

In the senate to-day, the presentation by Mr. Tallmadge of the memorial of certain citizens of New York against the independent treasury scheme, gave rise to a debate of the most interesting character, in which Messrs. Tallmadge, Webster, and Wright, took part. After the discharge of some business of little general interest, the question came up, on the motion of Mr. Buchanan, to postpone the consideration of the independent reasury bill until the next session of congress. A few remarks were made by Messrs. Culhoun, Webster, Morris, and Preston, when the question was taken on the motion to postpone, and it was decided in the negative by the following vote:

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Lyon, Morris, Moulton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Smith, of Connecticut, Strange, Trotter, Walker, Wall, Williams, Wright, and Young—29.

An amendment to Mr. Rives's substitute was then moved by Mr. Preston. After remarks by Messrs. Preston, Rives, Clay, and Buchanan, the senate, at a late hour in the afternoon, went into executive business.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Friday, March 2. Mr. Grennell, of Massachusetts, and Mr. Grantland, of Georgia, were announced as being appointed by the chair to fill the vacancies occasioned by the resignation of Mr. Briggs and Mr. Harrison, on the select committee to investigate the causes of the deaths of the late Gen. Jonathan Cilley.

In the place of Mr. Muhlenberg, Mr. Craig, of Virginia, is now chairman of the committee on revolutionary claims, and Mr. Potter was appointed to fill up the vacancy on said committee.

Mr. Adams asked the consent of the house to submit a motion to grant the use of the hall on Tuesday evening next to Mr. Buckingham, to deliver a public introductory lecture on the subject of Egypt.

Objection being made, Mr. A. moved a suspension of the rule; when the vote being 78 to 41, no quorum.

Mr. Boon called for the yeas and nays; which were—yeas 92, nays 60.

Reports of committees were then called for. After several had been received, the house passed to the special order, being the neutrality bill, reported by the committee on foreign affairs yesterday, the senate bill having been laid on the table this morning. This important bill was as follows:

A bill to amend an act entitled "An act in addition to the act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States, and to repeal the acts therein mentioned," approved twentieth of April, eighteen hundred and eighteen.

Be it enacted by the senate and house of representatives of the United States of America in congress assembled, That the several collectors, naval officers, surveyors, inspectors of customs, the marshals and deputy marshals of the United States, and every other officer who may be specially empowered for the purpose by the president of the United States, shall be, and they are hereby, respectively authorised and required to seize and detain any vessel or other means or materials which may be provided or prepared for any military expedition or enterprise, contrary to the sixth section of the act passed on the twentieth of April, eighteen hundred and eighteen, entitled "An act in addition to the act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States, and to repeal the acts therein mentioned," and to retain possession of the same until the decision of the president be had thereon, or until the same shall be released as hereinafter directed.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the several officers mentioned in the foregoing section shall be and they are hereby, respectively authorised and required to seize any vessel or vehicle, and all arms or munitions of war, about to pass the frontier of the United States for any place within any foreign state or colony contiguous with the United States, where the character of the vessel or vehicle and the quantity of arms and munitions, or other circumstances, shall furnish probable cause to believe that the said vessel or vehicle, arms, or munitions of war, are intended to be employed by the owner or owners thereof, or any other person or persons, with his or their privy, in carrying on any military expedition or operations within the territory or dominions of any foreign prince or state, or any colony, district, or people, contiguous with the United States, and with whom the United States are at peace, and detain the same until the decision of the president be had for the restoration of the same, or until such property shall be discharged by the judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction: Provided, That nothing in this act contained be so construed as to extend to, or interfere with, any trade with or by the citizens of the United States to or with any parties engaged in war: which trade is now authorised either by treaty or the laws of nations,

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the officer making any seizure under this act, to make application, with due diligence, to the district judge of the district court of the United States within which such seizure may be made for a warrant to justify the detention of the property so seized, which warrant shall be granted only on oath or affirmation, showing that there is probable cause to believe that the property so seized is intended to be used in a manner contrary to the provisions of this act: and if said judge shall refuse to issue such warrant, or application therefor shall not be made by the officer making such seizure within a reasonable time thereafter, the said property shall forthwith be restored to the owner. But if the said judge shall be satisfied that the seizure was justified under the provisions of this act, and issue his warrant accordingly, then the same shall be detained by the officer so seizing said property, until the president shall order it to be restored to the owner or claimant, or until it shall be discharged in due course of law, on the petition of the claimant, as hereinafter provided.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the owner or claimant of any property seized under this act, may file his petition in the circuit or district court of the United States in the district where such seizure was made, setting forth the facts in the case; and thereupon such court shall proceed, with all convenient despatch, after causing due notice to be given to the district attorney and officer making such seizure, to decide upon the said case, and order restoration of the property, unless it shall appear that the seizure was authorised by this act: and the circuit and district courts shall have jurisdiction and are hereby vested with full power and authority, to try and determine all cases which may arise under this act; and all issues in fact arising under it, shall be decided by a jury in the manner now provided by law.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That whenever the officer making any seizure under this act shall have applied for and obtained a warrant for the detention of the property, or the claimant shall have filed a petition for its restoration, and failed to obtain it, and the property so seized, shall have been in the custody of the officer for the term of three calendar months from the date of such seizure, it shall and may be lawful for the claimant or owner to file with the officer a bond to the amount of double the value of the property so seized and obtained, with at least two sureties, to be approved by the judge of the circuit or district court, with a condition that the property, when restored, shall not be used or employed by the owner or owners thereof, or by any other person or persons, with his or their privy, in carrying on any military expedition or operations within the territory or dominions of any foreign prince or state, or any colony, district, or people, contiguous with the United States, with whom the United States are at peace; and thereupon the said officer shall restore such property to the owner or claimant thus giving bond: Provided, that such restoration shall not prevent seizure from being again made in case there may exist fresh cause to apprehend a new violation of any of the provisions of this act.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That every person apprehended and committed for trial, for any offence against the act hereby amended, shall when admitted to bail for his appearance, give such additional security as the judge admitting him to bail may require, not to violate, nor to aid in violating, any of the provisions of the act hereby amended.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That whenever the president of the United States shall have reason to believe that offences have been, or are likely to be, committed against the provisions of the act hereby amended, within any judicial district, it shall be lawful for him, in his discretion, to direct the judge, marshal, and district attorney of such district to attend at such place within the district, and for such time as he may designate, for the purpose of the more speedy and convenient arrest and examination of persons charged with the violation of the act hereby amended; and it shall be the duty of every such judge, or other officer, when any such requisition shall be received by him, to attend at the place and for the time therein designated.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the president of the United States, or such person as he may empower for that purpose, to employ such part of the land or naval forces of the United States, or of the militia, as shall be necessary to prevent the violation, and to enforce the due execution, of this act, and the act hereby amended.

Mr. Howard explained that this bill had been reported by the committee on foreign affairs, in consequence of the difficulty of amending the senate's bill in such manner as to meet the views of the members of the house. He trusted that this bill would be more acceptable, and hoped that the clerk would read it by sections, so that the amendments, if any, might be proposed in regular order to the bill.

The first section being read,

Mr. Underwood moved to strike out the words which authorized the president to release goods which may be taken in certain cases.

Mr. U. stated the reason why he moved this amendment to be, to prohibit the president from acting in a judicial capacity.

Mr. Howard stated that this provision was introduced, because it was considered that the president was the most competent judge in these cases. He was fully acquainted with our relations with foreign countries, which made him more competent to judge in such cases than the judges of courts. If the matter was referred to the courts, there might be difference of opinion between the judges in consequence of the information which was in their possession; but the president, having all the information could decide more understandingly and properly. It was a mere power to relieve property that had been seized, and might be assimilated to the pardoning power. He trusted, therefore, that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky would not prevail.

Mr. Underwood replied, that if it was proposed to give this power to the president in consequence of its being merely a pardoning power, there was no necessity for it, as he now had that power under the constitution and laws without further legislation. His objection to the clause which he had moved to strike out, was, that it invested the executive with judicial powers, and powers which belonged exclusively to the judiciary department; because it enabled him to determine whether or not an offence had been committed. He apprehended it would not do in this country to vest judicial powers in the executive.

Mr. McKay considered that it would be entirely improper to strike out this clause. It simply gave power to the executive, in cases where property had been seized, to release it. The law provided for the seizure of property, but not for its forfeiture; therefore, it was proper that the president should have the power to release it, under certain circumstances. In case this amendment prevailed, and the clause was struck out, goods could only be restored by the judgment of courts; and where they had been seized in consequence of a violation of the law, there must be great delay and loss to the citizens in certain cases.

The motion to strike out was then disagreed to.

The second section being read,

Mr. Fillmore moved to strike out that part of the section which made the bill applicable only to contiguous territories. Mr. F. remarked that it might be said that there was very little danger of getting into any difficulty with countries which did not lie contiguous to the United States; but he thought our legislation ought to be uniform. He had an objection to having a law passed by congress which subjected his constituents to a rule which was not general, and for this reason he hoped his amendment might prevail.

Mr. Howard remarked that it was necessary to shape our legislation to the circumstances in which we were placed. We already had laws which were applicable to expeditions fitted out for service at sea, and against foreign countries, and it now became necessary to pass laws to preserve our neutrality with contiguous countries, and this law had been introduced to effect that object. He hoped the amendments would not prevail.

Mr. Holsey contended that this bill was about to place us in the same relation to contiguous countries which it did to other foreign countries, if it passed, and urged upon the gentleman from New York to withdraw his proposition to amend.

Mr. Fillmore sustained his amendment on the ground that the bill created invidious distinctions which ought never to exist in the legislation of any country.

Mr. Peck called for the yeas and nays on this amendment; but the house refused to order them, and the amendment of Mr. Fillmore was disagreed to.

Mr. Everett moved to strike out that clause which provided that the law should not interfere with the trade authorized to be carried on by the laws of nations: lost.

Mr. Robertson moved to strike out all after the enacting clause to line sixteen, and insert an amendment which he sent to the chair, providing that in all cases of seizures, affidavits should first be made, and a warrant issued.

Mr. R. urged his amendment on the house, on the ground of the unconstitutionality of making seizures without due course of law, as was proposed to be done by the bill.

Mr. Patton replied to Mr. R. pointing to the third section of the bill, which provided that immediately after the seizure, a warrant should be obtained in due form from some judicial officer, for the purpose of holding the property seized. This he contended was all that was necessary to guard against the abuse of power, and he argued that if a warrant under oath was to be obtained before seizure, that the law would be wholly ineffectual, as it would in almost every instance, if not in every one, be evaded.

Mr. Menifee then addressed the house at some length, in opposition to the bill, on the ground of its unconstitutionality.

The debate was further continued by Messrs. Legare, Menifee, Maxwell, and Underwood; when,

Mr. Cushman said, that wishing to bring the house to a direct vote on the question, he moved the previous question; which was seconded—83 to 41, and the main question ordered without a division.

Mr. Petrik asked for the yeas and nays on the main question, on the engrossment of the bill; which were ordered, and were as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, H. Allen, J. W. Allen, Anderson, Atherton, Ayer, Beatty, Beirne, Bell, Bicknell, Briggs, Brodhead, Bronson, Bruyn, Byrum, Cambreleng, John Campbell, Wm. B. Carter, Chapman, Coles, Connor, Corwin, Cranston, Curtis, Cushman, Darlington, Davies, Deberry, DeGraff, Droomgoole, Duncan, Elnore, Evans, Farrington, R. Fletcher, Foster, Fry, Gallup, J. Mason, Sampson Mason, Martin, Maxwell, McKay, Robert McClellan, Abraham McClellan, McKim, McKennan, Mercer, Miller, Moore, Morgan, S. W. Morris, Noble, Noyes, Palmer, Parker, Patton, Pearce, Phillips, Pickens, Potts, Potter, Pratt, Prentiss, Rariden, Randolph, Reed, Rencher, Rhett, Richardson, Ridgway, Rives, Sergeant, Sheffer, A. H. Shepperd, C. Shepard, Shepler, Spencer, Stuart, Stone, Stratton, Taliaferro, Taylor, Thomas, Tillinghast, Titus, Toucey, Turney, Wagener, Webster, A. S. White, J. White, Elisha Whittlesey, T. T. So the bill was ordered to its third reading.

The bill having been engrossed was read a third time, passed, and sent to the senate.

The bill reported this morning for the relief of Potter and Cassidy, of Wilmington, North Carolina, was read a third time and passed.

The bill directing the commissioner of the general land office to ascertain the quantity of land covered by grants made to Anthony Shane and Lewis Godfrey, in section 16, township 14, range 2 east, in Lima district Ohio, was read a third time and passed.

The bill supplementary to the act for the relief of Paine and Arnold, was also read a third time and passed.

Sundry bills and a joint resolution from the senate were taken up, read twice, and referred to their appropriate standing committees.

Mr. Alans asked leave to submit a resolution calling upon the secretaries of the treasury, war, and navy, for a return of the names of pension agents, agencies, &c. but it was objected to.

On motion of Mr. Hopkins,

The house adjourned.

Saturday, March 3. A report of the committee for the District of Columbia, in relation to the reorganization of the orphans' court, was again taken up, and its further consideration postponed until Tuesday next, and to be printed.

Mr. Thomas, from the committee on the judiciary, reported, with an amendment, senate bill (No. 113.) respecting counterfeiting copper, gold, silver, and other coins of the United States.

Some business of more importance having been disposed of,

The Speaker laid before the house a letter from the secretary of war, stating that since the answer of the department of the 6th of February to the resolution of the house of the 11th of October, 1837, it had been found, on examining it, that copies of a considerable portion of the correspondence with general Jesup called for by the resolution were accidentally omitted to be furnished, and transmitting said copies.

He also laid before the house a letter from the secretary of war, transmitting the testimony taken under an order of the house of the 3d of July, 1836, in relation to the claims of John Jones and others for work done on the Pea Patch island.

Mr. Johnson, of Maryland, proceeded in support of his resolution, as modified by himself, until the expiration of the morning hour, when he gave way.

Mr. Cambreleng moved to suspend the rule appropriating this day to the discussion of private bills, for the purpose of taking up the appropriation bill: and upon this motion he demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered; and the motion to suspend prevailed by the following vote, (requiring two-thirds)—Yeas 121, nays 36.

On motion of Mr. Cambreleng, the pension appropriation bill was taken up, the question being on the engrossment and third reading of the bill, an animated discussion took place between Messrs. Curtis, Chandler, Cambreleng, Cushman, Haynes, and Marvin. Finally Mr. Taylor demanded the previous question.

On seconding the call for the previous question the vote (by tellers) stood—65 ayes, 63 noes. So there was a second.

The question being, "shall the main question be now put?" Mr. Reed demanded the yeas and nays. On this demand, (requiring one-fifth of the members present,) the division was 26 to 105.

Mr. Adams said that as the division was so close, he would prefer another count.

Mr. Robertson moved that the house adjourn.

Mr. Lewis demanded the yeas and nays; 12 members only rising, the yeas and nays were not ordered.

The question on adjournment (by tellers) resulting in the following division—Ayes 71, noes 70, the chair voted in the negative, and the motion was lost.

Another count was then had on the call for the yeas and nays, the result of which was—Ayes 26, noes 112; and they were not ordered.

The main question was then put; and the bill ordered to be engrossed and read a third time this day, without a division.

It was then read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. McKim, the house adjourned.

[The remarks of Messrs. Curtis, Chandler, &c. shall have a place hereafter.]

Monday, March 5. This being the day set apart by the rules for the presentation of resolutions, the states were called in order, and one hundred and sixteen were presented, chiefly of a local or private character. The following were among the most important:

On motion of Mr. Jones, of Wisconsin,

Resolved, That the committee on the territories be instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the territory of Wisconsin to take the census, and adopt a constitution preparatory to being admitted into the union.

On motion of Mr. Downing,

Resolved, That the committee on the territories be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reorganizing the legislative council of Florida territory, so as to give another branch to said council, to be called a senate.

Mr. Lawler submitted the following, which lies one day under the rule:

Resolved, That it is inexpedient to discontinue the receipt of the notes of specie-paying banks of the states, under proper regulations and restrictions by the treasury department, in the collection of the public revenues, and that to do so would be highly injurious to the interests of the citizens generally.

On motion of Mr. Montgomery,

Resolved, That the committee on the post office and post roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of revising the rates of postage on newspapers and other printed matter conveyed by mail.

On motion of Mr. Legare,

Resolved, That the committee on revolutionary pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of granting suitable compensation to Mrs. Brown, only daughter of the gallant sergeant Jasper, of South Carolina, who fell at the battle of Savannah, after the most distinguished services at the attack upon fort Moultrie, and other memorable occasions.

On motion of Mr. Sawyer,

Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury report to this house the cost of erecting and establishing the principal mint and its branches, including buildings, fixtures, and apparatus, the salaries and expenses of the different officers, the amount expended in the purchase of bullion, the loss arising from wastage, and other expenses, and the average length of time it requires to coin at the principal mint all the bullion with which it can be furnished; and, further, what amount of coin has been struck at the several branch mints since their organization.

Mr. Carter offered the following preamble and resolution, which lie over under the rule:

"Whereas purity in the administration of a free government can only be maintained by the observance of strict economy in the public expenditures; and

"Whereas extravagance and prodigality in the management and disbursements of the public revenue are the sure indications of an unjust and corrupt government; and whereas a free government cannot exist where public officers and agents are multiplied beyond the demands of the public service, merely to gratify the increasing desire for public employment, and where the public administration relies for its support more upon the interest and attachment of dependents, and the amount of patronage under its control, than upon the impartial discernment of an enlightened community; and

"Whereas public officers and employments have increased of late in a degree unprecedented at any former period of the government; and

"Whereas the public expenditures have increased, within the last nine years, from thirteen millions of dollars, that being near the average of the annual expenditures in time of peace up to the year 1829, to upwards of thirty-two millions since that time; and

Whereas these facts clearly indicate a great degree of laxity and weakness in the public administration, or a wilful abuse of the powers of government, and a determination to rule by the use of patronage; therefore

Resolved, That a select committee be appointed to inquire into and report to this house the causes which have led to the late extraordinary increase of public officers and agents, and the alarming increase of public expenditure within the last nine years, and that they have power to send for persons and papers."

Mr. Menifee submitted the following resolution, which lies over under the rule.

Resolved, That the president of the U. States be, and he is hereby, requested to communicate to this house, if not incompatible with the public interest such information as he may possess relative to the seizure of the steamboat Caroline, acquired since the date of his late message on that subject, the measures which this government have adopted to obtain from the government of Great Britain an explanation of said seizure, and the ground which the diplomatic representative here and the provincial authorities of Upper Canada have assumed in relation thereto.

On motion of Mr. Graham, of N. C.

Resolved, That the committee of elections be instructed to inquire into the expediency of passing a law of the following import, constituting the committee of elections:

"That on the third day of the session of each congress, the name of that member from each state who has received the greatest majority of votes for congress among his own delegation, shall be deposited in box number one.

"That the names of all the other members of congress then in attendance shall be severally put in box number two.

"That a boy under ten years old shall forthwith proceed to draw out of box number two the names of ten members, which names, so drawn, shall be placed in box number one.

"That box number one, then containing thirty-six ballots or names, shall be revolved or turned three times round, to mix the ballots; and immediately a boy under ten years old shall, after each successive revolution of the box, draw out one ballot, until the names of twelve members of congress be so drawn, which twelve persons shall constitute the committee of elections.

"That said committee shall thereupon be sworn by the speaker to hear, investigate, and report truly, all such contested elections as may be committed to their charge, according to the constitution of the United States and the laws of the state in which the contest may or shall originate.

*That said committee shall immediately retire to their committee room and elect their own chairman.

"That, in case of a vacancy in said committee by death, resignation, or otherwise, such vacancy shall be filled by drawing one or more names from box number one, until the committee be again filled."

On motion of Mr. Garland, of Va.

Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury be requested to lay before this house, as early as practicable, copies of all letters written by him to collectors and receivers between the 1st January, 1834, and the present time, having relation to delinquencies, omissions to comply with the laws and regulations established for their government, and other irregularities. Also, copies of all reports made by persons appointed to examine and report on the state of the land offices within the same period.

Mr. Mallory submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That a select committee of — be appointed to investigate the cause of delay in the sailing of the exploring expedition, and to ascertain why the resolutions of this house have failed to extract a satisfactory explanation from the navy department.

Mr. Rencher moved to amend this resolution by adding thereto the following:

"And that the said committee inquire into the expediency of abandoning the said expedition."

Debate arising, the resolution and amendment were laid over.

On motion of Mr. Craig,

Resolved, That the committee of accounts ascertain as nearly as they can, and report to this house, the annual expense incurred in supplying members of congress with the various articles covered by the general denomination of stationery, and that they report their opinion upon the expediency of allowing a fixed sum of money to each member, at each session of congress, in lieu of the ad libitum supply of stationery now allowed.

By Mr. Morgan:

Resolved by the senate and house of representatives of the U. States of America in congress assembled, (two-thirds of both houses concurring,) That the following amendment to the constitution of the U. States be proposed to the legislatures of the several States, which, when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the states, shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the constitution: "Congress shall have power to provide by law that no person shall be capable of holding or being elected to any post of profit, trust, or emolument, civil or military, legislative, executive, or judicial, under the government of these United States, who shall hereafter fight a duel, or send or accept a challenge to fight a duel, the probable issue of which may be the death of the challenger or challenged, or who shall be a second to either party, or shall in any manner aid or assist in such duel, or shall be knowingly the bearer of such challenge or acceptance; but no person shall be so disqualified by reason of his having, prior to the passage of such law, fought such duel, or sent or accepted such challenge, or been a second in such duel, or bearer of such challenge or acceptance."

On motion of Mr. Mercer,

Resolved, That the president of the United States be requested to lay before this house any recent information which may be received from the seat of war in Florida, which he may deem it expedient to communicate, touching the present state of the campaign in that quarter, and especially such intimation, if any, as he may have received of the disposition of the hostile Indians to treat for peace, and the terms on which they propose to negotiate.

On motion of Mr. Robertson,

Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury report to this house a statement of the disbursements and appropriations for fortifications, light-houses, revolutionary and other pensions, and internal improvements, including piers, breakwaters, preservation of ports and harbors, removing obstructions in rivers and creeks, &c. and the support of light-houses, including all incidental expenses; and showing, as far as practicable, the amount disbursed in each state in each year since the period embraced in his report on the same subjects of the 17th of January, 1835.

On motion of Mr. Jenifer,

Resolved, That the president of the United States be requested to communicate to this house what steps have been taken, under the resolution of the 21st February, 1837, in relation to the high duties and restrictions on tobacco imported into foreign countries from the United States; the number and names of agents appointed under said resolution, and the government to which they are accredited; together with such information as he may have received from our ministers and other agents abroad in relation to the same. Also, whether any specific instructions have been, or are intended to be, given to the minister lately appointed to Austria to negotiate in behalf of the tobacco trade between the United States and the Austrian dominion.

Mr. Thomas moved the following as an amendment to the 20th rule, which lies over one day.

"And, on the first Friday of each month, the calendar of private bills shall be called over, and the bills to the passage of which no objection shall then be made shall be first considered and disposed of: private bills from the senate having a preference over private bills of the house."

Mr. Davis submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the senate and house of representatives of the United States, in congress assembled, will adjourn and close the present session on Monday, the fourteenth day of May next.

Mr. Mercer raised the question of consideration, which was decided in the negative. So the house refused to consider the resolution.

On motion of Mr. Peck,

Resolved, That the committee on agriculture be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the introduction of foreign seeds and plants through our consuls, public ships and merchant vessels, and of establishing an office at the seat of government, to be under the direction and management of the commissioner of the patent office, for the reception and distribution of such seeds and plants as would tend to the advancement of the agricultural interests of the country.

On motion of Mr. Grant,

Resolved, That the postmaster general be instructed to report to this house the amount of postages received on paid and unpaid letters sent by the express mail to the city of New York, from Philadelphia, Mobile and New Orleans, and the amount of postages received at New York on letters sent to the other offices named by the express mail between the 15th November, 1836, and the 30th September, 1837. Also, the amount of postage received at the post office in the city of New York on letters, both paid and unpaid, sent during the same period by the regular or usual mail to, and received from, the offices above mentioned. Also, the amount of postage received at the post office in New Orleans on paid and unpaid letters, sent by the express mail from Mobile, Philadelphia, and New York, and the amount of postage received at the office on letters sent to the said other offices by the express mail during the above mentioned period. Also, the amount of postage received at the post office in the city of New Orleans on paid and unpaid letters, during the period above stated, sent by the regular or usual mail from that office to Mobile, Philadelphia and New York, and on letters received at the New Orleans post office from the said other post offices.

Resolved, That the postmaster general be instructed to report to this house a list embracing all the contracts for carrying the regular mails on the several routes on which the express mail is carried, the name of each contractor or contractors for each route, the length of the route by measurement or estimate, the sum paid for the mail transportation on each route, and the speed with which each mail is carried under each of the contracts; and whether any vehicles or carriages for the conveyance of passengers are used or employed on any of these mail routes that travel faster than the one in which the regular mail is carried.

On motion of Mr. Hoffman,

Resolved, That the committee on naval affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of creating the rank of admiral in the navy of the United States.

On motion of Mr. DeGraff,

Resolved, That the committee on revolutionary pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so amending the laws now in operation granting pensions to widows or their children, as to extend the benefits of the same, under the usual restrictions, to the widows or children of all those who died in consequence of wounds or injuries received while in the service of the United States previous to 1818.

On motion of Mr. Loomis,

Resolved, That the committee on the judiciary be instructed to inquire into the power of the United States government to compel the application of the assets and effects of the late Bank of the United States to the payment of its outstanding debts and liabilities, and, if satisfied that such power exists, that they report to the house the proper measures to be taken for that purpose.

On motion of Mr. Childs,

Resolved, That the president be requested to communicate to this house (if the same can be done without prejudice to the public service) all the documents and information in his possession relative to the prosecution of the claim to the Smithsonian bequest; also, what duty had been performed, and remains to be performed, by the agent employed at London, in reference to said claim, and how the money heretofore appropriated by congress had been applied.

On motion of Mr. Taylor,

Resolved, That the committee on the judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of amending the law now in force for printing and distributing the acts of congress, so as to give to them a more uniform and general circulation.

On motion of Mr. Lincoln,

Resolved, That the committee on militia be instructed to report, as soon as may be, a bill for the reorganization, arming, disciplining, and governing the militia, upon such principles, and with such provisions, as are adapted to the present state of the population, and will better conform the required service to the probable occasions of the country, and which will relieve the people from unnecessary burdens; render more equal the duties to be performed, and give greater efficiency to the organized force of the nation, in preserving the public peace, maintaining the supremacy of the laws, and repelling hostile invasions.

On motion of Mr. Adams,

Resolved, That the secretaries of the treasury, of war, and of the navy, be directed to report to this house the names of all persons appointed as agents for the payment of pensions from the first attempt to transfer the payment of pensions from the late Bank of the United States to other agents for said payments to the present time; specifying the authority by which such appointments have been made, the forms of the commissions issued to such agents; the sums of public money advanced or otherwise paid to such agents for said payments, and the dates of all such advances and payments, and the balances remaining credited to each of them at the end of each quarter; the compensation, if any, allowed to said agents for such services, the banks with which they have been respectively connected; the officers, whether under authority of the United States, or of the separate states, held by such agents; at the same time, when charged with the pension agency, and the compensation which they have received therefor.

When the state of Massachusetts was called, Mr. Adams presented the following:

Resolved, That the letter and petition of John V. Brown and twelve others, from Rocky Mount, Franklin county, Virginia, praying, for reasons therein assigned, for the arraignment at the bar of the house, and expulsion, of John Quincy Adams, a member of this house, be printed, with the names of the signers thereto, and referred to a committee of nine members to consider and report thereon, with liberty to send for persons and papers.

Mr. A. was about to address the chair in support of the resolution, when the speaker reminded him that, under the order of the house, if any resolution was likely to cause debate, it must be laid over. Mr. Adams said that as the resolution referred to a question of privilege, he presumed that part of the rule did not apply to this resolution. The chair, having considered the resolution, decided that, as a question of privilege, its consideration would be in order. Mr. Rencher of North Carolina, moved the preliminary question of consideration, viz. whether the house would consider the resolution? The chair said that the question of reconsideration would take precedence of all others. Mr. Adams said that the resolution concerned his own privilege as a member of the house, and of the house also. Mr. Rencher said he would withdraw his motion for the question of consideration.

Mr. Adams then called for the reading of the letter and memorial to which the resolution referred. And they were read as follows:

ROCKY MOUNT, Franklin county,
Virginia, Feb. 26th, 1835.

Mr. Adams: As the representative of the interests and wishes of the people of the whole United States, and defending in theory so ably, and in practice so fully, the hallowed right of petition from your countrymen, we, whose names are heretofore subscribed, respectfully ask you to present the following humble and needful petition to the congress of the United States for immediate action:

To the congress of the United States of America:

Whereas, for a long time we have seen with deep regret the course pursued by our distinguished fellow-citizen, the hon. John Quincy Adams, of Massachusetts, upon the deeply interesting question of the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, and acknowledging as we do the rights of petition, and the duty of congress to attend to all petitions coming from the freemen of the United States, and as it is clearly and fully conceded by all that you have the constitutional power to keep order in your body, and to preserve harmony in the country, by all proper means, we respectfully and humbly pray that, as the aforesaid John Quincy Adams has pursued and is pursuing a course upon the aforesaid subject, in our opinions morally and politically wrong, and calculated, certainly, to stir up the deadliest strife between the north and south, and finally to involve our beloved country in the horrors of a civil war, and to lead to a dissolution of the union, you do arraign him at the bar of the house, and formally and forever expel him from your most honorable body, if sufficient evidence appear to justify your adopting such a measure. Your petitioners deem it unnecessary to lay before congress any labored argument in favor of this important measure, and will content themselves simply by stating that no feelings, but motives of patriotism, and a deep desire to silence the discussion of this most absorbing and dangerous question, here induce them to appeal to you, in their popular right, to exercise this constitutional power, clearly vested in you by the very instrument itself.

They humbly and most earnestly pray that this their petition will be attended to by your very honorable body; and, with great reverence and respect, sign themselves your most obedient servants.

Mr. Stuart, of Virginia, said that the memorial appeared to have come from his own district, but he had never heard any thing of it: he wished to hear the names of the signers.

[They were read by the clerk.]

Mr. Stuart then said that he was satisfied the names were all fictitious, and moved that the resolution be laid on the table; which was agreed to, and the resolution was laid on the table accordingly.

The states having been called through for resolutions, the speaker called the states, in order, commencing at Wisconsin, for petitions and memorials. Among others,

Mr. Lawler presented certain resolutions of the legislature of Alabama, in reference to the reception of Texas into the union, which he moved should be laid on the table and printed.

Mr. Adams called for the reading of the resolutions, and they were read at length.

Mr. A. then observed, that as the resolutions contained a lengthy argument in favor of the admission of Texas, and that professedly on the ground that such admission was intended to change and destroy the balance of power which had heretofore existed between the states in different portions of the union—

The chair here interposed, and said that a motion to lay on the table precluded debate. Mr. Adams said he should not debate the question, but move the reference of the resolutions to a select committee. The chair said that the motion to lay the resolutions on the table then took precedence. On this motion Mr. Adams then demanded the yeas and nays, and the house ordered them to be taken; they resulted as follows: yeas 109, nays 40.

So the resolutions were laid on the table.

Mr. Ewing presented certain resolutions of the legislature of Indiana, on the subject of the treasury circular, which, giving rise to debate, were laid over.

A number of petitions and memorials were presented and disposed of. After which,

The house adjourned.

Tuesday, March 6. As soon as the journal was read,

Mr. Adams rose, and asked leave to present a petition from citizens of Newark, in New Jersey, praying that congress would investigate the circumstances of the late duel. Objection being made, Mr. A. moved the suspension of the rule, and asked the yeas and nays, which being ordered, the motion (requiring a vote of two thirds) prevailed. Yeas 113, nays 43.

A similar memorial from other citizens of the same place was presented by Mr. Farfield: the rule having been suspended, on his motion, both memorials were referred to the select committee on that subject.

Mr. Chambers, of Kentucky, asked leave to offer a resolution fixing the daily hour of meeting at 10 o'clock, A. M. during the remainder of the session; objected to. The motion to suspend the rule for the purpose of offering this resolution, was negatived.

Mr. Chambers gave notice that he should renew this motion on every morning until the house acted on it.

Among the bills reported was the following:

By Mr. Cambreleng: from the committee of ways and means, made a report at length upon the memorials relating to the currency and a national bank, and relating to the collection and safe-keeping of the public money.

[This report shall have a place in the next "REGISTER."]

When the committee on foreign relations was in order, Mr. Howard asked and obtained leave to take up and consider the amendments of the senate to the bill for the preservation of neutral relations. Mr. Howard said that the number of these amendments was six, and were as follows:

1. To limit the operation of the first section to "arms and munitions of war," instead of the "means and materials" provided for a military expedition.

2. To limit the section also to "conterminous countries" with whom the United States are at peace.

3. To make the seizing officer apply a warrant within "ten days."

4. To authorize the president to send the judge, &c. to the district where "this act" as well as the "act hereby amended" is likely to be violated.

5. To limit the duration of the act to "two years."

6. To strike out the proviso which permits all trade recognized by "treaties or the law of nations," and to substitute one which permits trade in munitions of war in "vessels by sea." If the senate's amendment had been concurred in, all trade "by land" with conterminous countries, in arms and munitions of war, would have been forbidden.

The first, second, third, and fourth, were agreed to without a division.

The fifth being read,

Mr. Mason of Ohio, said that if this law were desirable at all, it should be enacted for a longer term than two years. It carried upon the face of it an admission that it has reference to one particular foreign power alone. But, if there were any occasion for the passage of the law to meet the present emergency, there was also reason for making it the permanent law of the land. He was not in favor of occasional legislation, out of respect to any individual power; it seemed too much like making a concession to one which the government was unwilling to make to another power. It was a peace-offering; its object was to preserve neutrality. If in any way, he hoped this bill would be passed in a permanent form, rather than in this temporary way, at the invocation of a foreign government. The law of 1818 was a permanent law, and this ought to be so too.

Mr. Adams moved to strike from the proposed amendment the word "two," and insert the word "four," and to add the words "to the then next session of congress."

[Upon this amendment, which was ultimately rejected, and upon another proposed by the committee, (to non-concur with the senate in the 6th of the above amendments,) a debate arose. The amendment proposed by the committee was adopted, and the bill returned to the senate.]

On motion of Mr. Cambreleng, the house resolved itself into committee of the whole (Mr. Casey in the chair) and resumed the consideration of the civil and diplomatic bill for the year 1838—and after some time spent thereon, without coming to a final decision on the bill, on motion, the committee rose, and the house adjourned.

Wednesday, March 7. Mr. Adams asked leave to present two petitions from certain clergymen and others of his state, on the subject of the late duel, but the leave was refused; and a motion to suspend the rules failed: yeas 86, nays 55, (not two-thirds.)

Mr. Chambers repeated his motion to allow the hour of meeting to be 10 o'clock; but the house refused the yeas and nays, and rejected the motion.

A number of bills for the relief of individuals, and of local interests, were reported.

Mr. Bronson, from the committee on the territories, reported the senate bill to authorize the president of the United States to cause the southern boundary line of the territory of Wisconsin to be ascertained and marked, with amendments thereto.

Mr. Bell, in pursuance of previous notice, asked for and obtained leave to bring in a bill to secure the freedom of elections.

Also, a statement showing the names and grades of all officers in the line and several departments of the staff of the army, holding brevets, and receiving by reason thereof a greater amount of pay and emoluments than they would be entitled to from their lineal commissions.

The senate bill, entitled "An act to change the times of holding the circuit courts of the United States in the seventh circuit," was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. Howard, from the committee on foreign affairs, moved that the house do insist on its disagreement to the senate's third amendment to the neutrality bill, (confining trade in arms and munitions of war to vessels by sea,) and appoint a committee of conference on their part. The motion was agreed to, and Messrs. Howard, Patton, and Corwin were appointed conferees on the part of this house.

The house then passed to the orders of the day.

On motion of Mr. Cushman, the house went into committee of the whole, Mr. Lincoln in the chair, on the bill to continue in force an act of the legislature of Maryland; which, after a brief conversation between Messrs. Cushman, Reed, and Howard, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time this day, and was then read a third time and passed.

The joint resolution reported by Mr. Lincoln, and ordered to be engrossed this morning, authorizing the taking down of the walls of the old post office, was taken up and passed.

On motion of Mr. Cambreleng, from the committee of ways and means, the house then went into committee of the whole on the state of the union, (Mr. Casey in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the appropriation bill for the civil and diplomatic service for the year 1838.

It gave rise to considerable discussion, during which several questions of order were raised. Before a final decision upon the bill, the committee rose and reported progress.

Mr. Bell obtained the printing of an amendment he intended to offer.

Mr. Reed, on leave, submitted a resolution calling upon the secretary of the treasury for a report of the amount of additional compensation received by revenue officers in 1837, under the provisions equalizing the same to what they would have received if the bill of 1832 had not passed; which was concurred in.

Mr. Henry, of Pennsylvania, and Mr. Halsted, of New Jersey, presented resolutions of their respective legislatures on the subject of a national armory; which were referred to the committee on military affairs.

And then the house adjourned.

THURSDAY'S PROCEEDINGS.

In the senate—Mr. Buchanan, from the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two houses in relation to the proviso of the house in the neutrality bill, denying an appeal to treaties and the law of nations against the operations of the bill, reported that the committee had agreed on a certain form for this part of the bill. The amendments agreed upon were read, but were inaudible to the reporter.

Mr. B. stated that by this agreement of the committee the senate would secure the trade which they wished to secure, (by sea,) and that, in effect they had adopted the proviso of the house.

The senate agreed to this report of the committee of conference.

After some business, which will be noticed in our next, the senate resumed the consideration of the sub-treasury bill.

Mr. Davis argued at some length, against one of the suggested propositions of Mr. Preston, that the notes of non-specie-paying banks should be received temporarily by the government, as a dangerous precedent; and as probable not practically better than the provisions of the substitute that such bills should be received when the banks should resume.

Mr. Niles spoke chiefly in reply to Mr. Davis, especially characterizing the banks as trading companies, with which the government have nothing to do, and denying emphatically that the country was suffering distress or embarrassment.

Mr. Davis having briefly responded—

Mr. Preston said the proposed amendment, last discussed, was not before the senate, but had been merely suggested. He hoped the question would now be taken on the amendment which he had actually offered in relation to the selection of the twenty-five deposit banks proposed by the substitute.

In accordance with the suggestions of Mr. Rives, and from information which he had obtained that most states own stock in one or more of their respective banks, Mr. P. withdrew the latter part of this amendment; so as to make it merely require that the deposit banks should be selected from those banks the stock of which is owned in whole or in part by the respective states in which they are situated.

Mr. Hubbard was understood to object to the withdrawal of the latter branch of the amendment; but Mr. Preston claimed the right of doing so; and the vote being taken on the amendment as modified, it was negatived, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Clay, of Kentucky, Crittenden, Davis, Knight, Merrick, Niebois, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Robbins, Smith, of Indiana, Southard, Spence, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Webster, White—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Clayton, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Lyon, McKean, Morris, Mouton, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Smith, of Connecticut, Strange, Trotter, Walker, Wall, Williams, Wright, Young—32.

The question now recurring on the substitute, as offered by Mr. Rives,

Mr. Bayard spoke on the subject at large, and in opposition to the original bill. Before he had concluded, he yielded the floor to a motion to adjourn; and about 5 o'clock.

The senate adjourned.

In the house no business of importance was transacted. Some time was spent in considering the bill in relation to the northeastern boundary, which was ultimately referred to the committee on foreign affairs.

WASHINGTON CITY, MARCH 17, 1838.

[Vol. LIV.—WHOLE No. 1,381.]

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

PRINTED AND PUBLISHED, EVERY SATURDAY, BY WILLIAM OGDEN NILES, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

Our pigeon-holes are crowded, and our table and desk literally covered with articles which claim a place in our pages, and would be most acceptable to our readers; but we are constrained by what we deem to be a high duty at this peculiar crisis in our affairs, to devote a large portion of our pages to the proceedings of congress—and thus to defer the agreeable for the useful. We would cheerfully dispose of this vast accumulation of articles by the aid of supplemental sheets, but do not feel justified in incurring the expense at this period of general embarrassment and distress.

The present sheet contains Mr. Rives' speech in support of his substitute for the sub-treasury bill reported by the committee of finance. In our next we will give Mr. Calhoun's speech in opposition to the substitute, and in support of the sub-treasury bill.

The hon. Timothy J. Carter, a member of congress from the state of Maine, died at his lodgings in this city on Wednesday evening last, after a severe illness. In consequence of this melancholy event both houses of congress adjourned at an early hour on Thursday morning to meet this day at 12 o'clock to attend the funeral of the deceased. Mr. Carter's death was announced to the senate by Mr. Ruggles, and to the house by Mr. Evans, both of whom paid eloquent tributes to his private and public virtues.

The hon. John L. Murray, who has been seriously indisposed for some time past, has, we are pleased to learn, sufficiently recovered to be able to take his seat in the house of representatives.

FROM FLORIDA. We learn from Gen. Hernandez, who passed through here on Tuesday last, says the Wilmington (N. C.) Advertiser, on his way to Washington, and who came direct from Florida, that the operations against the Seminoles must soon close for the season, but that there is no prospect of the war's ending with the present campaign, unless, of which, however, the hope is slight, the distractions among themselves may induce a voluntary submission. No hostile movements had recently taken place.

The last number of the "Frederick (Md.) Herald" contains the following letter from Fort Pierce to a gentleman in that city.

Fort Pierce, Indian River, }
February 15th, 1838. }

Dear Sir.—I have seized a few moments during the suspension of hostilities, to give you a little camp news. You have probably seen in the papers an account of col. Taylor's fight, in which he lost so many valuable officers. Since that engagement our own division, under general Eastis, met the enemy at Jupiter Inlet. They were under the command of Tuskegee. The engagement lasted about an hour—we lost seven killed and thirty wounded—four have since died. After the fight the army marched for Jupiter and there established a fort. Two-thirds of the command were literally without shoes or stockings, after accomplishing a march (most of the time in mud and water to their waists) of 270 miles. The army remained some days at Jupiter to recruit and await supplies from fort Pierce. It is impossible to conceive the deplorable situation of the troops without being an eye witness. Teams broken down, without forage, and even officers on short allowance. And yet, under all these difficulties, every individual seems to be in fine spirits, although all hopes of finishing the war this campaign are at an end. After having received supplies from fort Pierce the army moved in pursuit of the enemy, whose trail, as had been previously ascertained, ran south, and came up with him about twenty-five miles from Jupiter. Instead of attacking the enemy, as every one expected, a white flag was sent to them to treat, which they very politely acknowledged with Tuskegee's compliments to the commander-in-chief. The terms of the truce were:—arms to be held sacred, and the hostilities were to come into Jupiter after a period of ten days, and await the will of their Great Father. If he said they must leave the country, go they would, but they petitioned to have but a slip of the vast territory they once called their own. Even the barren wastes, the Everglades, would suffice their few wants. They say you have captured our cattle and horses, destroyed our villages, and overrun even the graves of our people. And for what? For a land where white men can never inhabit, and into which none but a native can penetrate.

I am disposed to think they are playing the same game they were so successful in last year. The more I see of the Seminole character, the more I am convinced of their indomitable and unyielding determination to fight or die in the land of their fathers.

We are in a state of statu quo, awaiting for the will of the president, who, as many think, will make a treaty with them.

I nevertheless anticipate another campaign, for it is finished to all intents and purposes for this year. The army cannot operate after this month, in this latitude, (25.) During the month of March the country becomes inundated and impassable.

FROM THE FRONTIER. The Vermont and St. Lawrence portion of our Canada frontiers seems to have been perfectly tranquilized by the well directed and vigorous efforts of gen. Wool. Col. Worth has in like manner pacified the Niagara quarter, and the accounts from the N. W. or Michigan portion, under Gen. Brady, represent all as quiet, except the few straggling parties of patriots who escaped from the British in the late action at Fighting Island, (Port au Plait,) near the mouth of Detroit river. Letters from Sandusky city, (Ohio), to March 6th, state that the commander-in-chief, gen. Scott, and snite, had arrived there, and the last accounts left him with his four-horse wagon in close pursuit of the patriot adj. gen. McLeod, and some says he had in fact captured him. The patriots lost in the fight at Port au Plait some fifteen killed and twenty wounded, and the British, they say, as many. Sleigh loads of the wounded patriots had reached Sandusky.

[N. Y. Courier.]

The Cleveland (O.) Herald of the 7th inst. says general Scott arrived in this city from the west, this morning. A general dispersion of the 'patriots', on the frontier above us, we presume, renders his presence in that quarter no longer necessary. We confidently hope our border troubles are now over. General Scott is entitled to much credit for promptitude and perseverance in his efforts to maintain the neutrality. He left in the stage this afternoon for Buffalo.

THE NEUTRALITY BILL. We learn from the "Globe" that the neutrality was approved by the president on Saturday last, and instructions immediately forwarded from the several departments to the civil and military officers on the Canada frontier, to enforce the execution of it by all the means in their power. It is expected, says the "Globe", that our fellow-citizens in that part or the country will, at once, submit to the law, and return peaceably to their homes.

We have this bill in type and will publish it in the next number of the "Register".

SPECIE PAYMENTS. At a very numerous meeting held at the New York Exchange on Thursday the 8th instant, of which James Boorman, esquire, was chairman, and James Lee and Jonathan Sturgis, secretaries,

The following resolutions, offered by Pelatiah Perit, esq., and seconded by Samuel Ward, esq., were read and unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That this meeting hail with great satisfaction the declaration on the part of the New York city banks of their purpose to resume specie payments on or before the 10th of May next.

Resolved, That we have entire confidence in the solidity of our banks, and in their ability to resume and maintain specie payments, and that in this measure we will give them our cordial and active co-operation.

Resolved, That, independently of moral obligation and legislative enactment, the favorable state of foreign exchanges and the diminished liabilities both of banks and individuals calls for a prompt resumption of specie payments, and we consider such a course the surest means of equalizing ultimately our internal exchanges and of restoring general prosperity.

Resolved, That, in contemplating the resumption of specie payments, we can perceive no reason to apprehend that it will occasion any farther contraction on the part of the banks; but, on the contrary, that the restoration of confidence which must necessarily grow out of that measure, will lead to a gradual increase of their issues, and enable them to extend greater facilities to the community.

Resolved, That, regarding the general resumption of specie payments by the banks throughout the United States as essential to our national credit abroad, and as calculated to regulate our internal exchanges, we respectfully invite the institutions of other states to a simultaneous effort to accomplish this most desirable object.

MARYLAND. At the last session of the legislature several important amendments were made to the constitution of this state, which, having been confirmed by the present legislature, will soon go into operation. Among the amendments is one which provides that the governor shall be elected by the people, in regular succession from one of the three districts into which the state has been divided—the order of districts to be designated by the drawing of ballots by the president of the senate. The following is the result of the allotment.

First District.—Includes all the counties on the Eastern Shore—Cecil, Kent, Queen Anne's, Caroline, Talbot, Dorchester, Somerset, and Worcester.

Second District.—Baltimore, Hartford, Carroll, Frederick, Washington and Alleghany counties.

Third District.—St. Mary's, Charles, Calvert, Prince George's, Anne Arundel and Montgomery counties, and Baltimore and Annapolis cities.

THE MANDAMUS CASE.

The supreme court of the United States adjourned on Monday last, having, in a session of sixty-four days, disposed of sixty-one cases, leaving only twenty-one cases on the calendar. Among the cases decided was that of Amos Kendall, postmaster general United States vs. W. B. Stokes, et. al. in error to the circuit court of the United States for the District of Columbia. The decision affirms the judgment of the circuit court, with costs, and remands the case to that court for further proceedings. We are indebted to the "Intelligencer" for the following synopsis of the opinion of the court.

SUPREME COURT, MONDAY, MARCH 12.

Amos Kendall, Postmaster General,

vs.

United States ex relatione Stockton, Stokes, and others.

ABSTRACT OF THE OPINION OF THE COURT

The questions are, first, Does the record present a proper case for a mandamus? 2d. Does the circuit court of this district possess jurisdiction in the case?

The court think that the act required to be performed by the postmaster general is a mere ministerial act, in which the president has no authority to interfere. It would be an alarming doctrine to maintain that, in the performance of such duties as are enjoined by law upon any public officer the president has any right to interfere. In this case there is no conflict between the judicial and executive authority.

The claims originally were against the United States through the United States. The United States could not be sued without their consent. They submitted the claims to the solicitor for his examination and award, and the postmaster general was directed to credit the amount of the award. The decision of the solicitor, under the act, was final; no appeal was allowed—no supervising power given to the postmaster general or to any other party.

It may well be questioned whether the parties, under the act of congress, did not possess a clear vested right. But, whether the legislature could have revised this decision or not, it has not done so. So far as concerns one branch of the legislature, the action of the senate amounts to a recognition of the binding authority of the award. The unanimous opinion of the senate precluded the necessity of going to the other house.

The right thus ascertained, the means of enforcing it is by the judicial authority.

The authority of the president to forbid or to control the execution of the law is at variance with every principle of the government.

In fact, the president has not acted in the case, so as to bring these departments into conflict. He has refused to interfere to prevent the execution of the law.

The right of the relators, under the act of congress for their relief, is now absolute and irreversible.

How is it to be enforced? The act to be done is purely ministerial. The officer directed to perform it has no discretion. Is the remedy by mandamus a fit and appropriate remedy?

The common law of Maryland is the law of this district. The common law provides this writ as the peculiar remedy in such cases. The remedies suggested at the bar, were, an application to the president; or to congress; or a civil suit. These are not such remedies as the law requires.

A case of mandamus is a case within the constitution. It possesses all the qualities of such a case.

2. Has the circuit court of the district jurisdiction of this case? It has been decided that the circuit courts of the United States have not jurisdiction. Has the circuit court of this district larger powers in this particular?

The terms of the constitution are broad enough to warrant congress in vesting such a jurisdiction in the circuit or other inferior courts of the United States.

No objection can prevail derived from the official character of the party to whom the writ is directed, or the character of the act which he is called upon to perform.

The cases decided in this court have settled that the power to issue such a writ is within the judicial power as conferred by the constitution; and that those courts could not exercise the power, because congress had not conferred upon them all the power which it constitutionally might do.

By the constitution and acts of cession, congress possesses exclusive legislative authority over this district. So far as regards cases in which individual rights are concerned, the judicial authority should be co-extensive with the legislative.

In Maryland, prior to the cession of this district, the writ of mandamus was recognised as an appropriate remedy in cases where, upon the principles of the common law, it would lie.

The circuit court is the only court in this district which possesses that original jurisdiction which can be thus exercised.

Under the 1st section of the act of 27th February, 1801, continuing the laws of Maryland, it would seem that this remedy is continued. The 3d and 5th sections of the same law confirm the same conclusion.

The court affirms the decision of the circuit court for the District of Columbia, with costs, and remands the case to that court for further proceedings.

The chief justice, for himself and judge Barbour, and judge Catron, dissented from the opinion of the court. The chief justice concurred with the majority of the court in the opinion that the judicial power, as indicated by the constitution, authorized congress to confer jurisdiction upon any of the circuit courts to issue writs of mandamus; and also that this was a fit case for a mandamus, as, in his judgment, it was the bounden duty of the postmaster general to enter the credit for the full amount awarded by the solicitor as soon as that award was notified to him. The only ground of dissent was, that he did not concur in that part of the opinion which considered the circuit court of the district as possessing larger powers in this particular than the other circuit courts of the United States.

VERY LATE FROM EUROPE.

The packet ships are coming into New York in rapid succession. The latest are the Independence, from Liverpool January 24th, and the Oxford, from Liverpool February 1, inclusive. We copy from the Commercial Advertiser the following:

The parliamentary proceedings on Canadian affairs were of high interest. The earl of Durham has been appointed governor general of all the British provinces in North America, and was to sail for Quebec in season for the opening of the St. Lawrence. It affords us great pleasure to state that the earl will come out clothed with full powers to grant a general amnesty.

So intense was the anxiety caused by the affairs of Canada, that steamboats are stationed off Holy Head to receive the letter bags from the packet ships. The London press have their agents stationed at every port to receive and forward the latest accounts from North America. The London Times has sent out a special correspondent; this gentleman arrived in the Oxford.

Our London correspondent writes us as follows:—

"It is currently reported in the clubs, this evening, that the reason of the adjournment of the house of commons to Friday, (Feb. 2d,) is a split in the ministry; and that the duke of Wellington has been applied to on the subject."

Parliament met on the 16th January, pursuant to adjournment. In the house of lords, the papers relating to the state of Canada were laid on the table by lord Glenelg, who submitted it to the house whether the discussion of the proposed measures should be commenced at once, or whether he should give notice for an address to the throne, to be moved the next day but one.

The duke of Wellington desired to know, in the first place, what sort of measures were proposed. He thought it the duty of her majesty and the government to speak out, and let the country know what ground they meant to take. It was indispensable, he thought, that the measures taken should be such as would bring this unfortunate business to a speedy conclusion. It must be remembered, said the duke, that a great country like this cannot have a little war. If any thing is undertaken, it must be on such a scale as to make it quite certain that the operations will succeed, and that at the very earliest possible period.

Lord Melbourne assured the duke that the ministers were prepared both to speak and act with energy.

In the house of commons lord John Russell said it was his duty to propose, first, that an address be sent to the queen, pledging the house to assist her majesty in restoring tranquillity to Lower Canada; and, second, to move to bring in a bill by which, for a certain time, the calling of an assembly in that province may be suspended, and authority provided to meet the emergency and provide for the future government of the province.

Lord John Russell then went at great length into a history of the administration of the province, contending that there had been no injustice or oppression in the course of the mother country, and condemning with great severity the disloyal sentiments that had been uttered in that house by certain members. His lordship then proceeded as follows:—

I come now to a question which has been argued in a very different temper—it is a question whether it is for our interest to abandon Lower Canada, altogether. I say, at once, I cannot bring my mind to the conclusion that it would be so. I say, at once, that the single motive of the attachment of a considerable portion of the population to the British constitution, and the situation in which they would be left if we abandoned the province to the French party, that motive alone would be sufficient reason with me for emphatically saying "No" to such a proposition. [Cheers.] But if the reasons I have mentioned were sufficient, there are other considerations which would induce the government to oppose any project of abandonment. Supposing the St. Lawrence under the command of the United States, and a Canadian republic established at Quebec, does any one believe that the other provinces, the provinces of Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick, could be kept under control? No sir, I am convinced, if such a state of things should by any mischance come round, the question would arise whether we should not try to regain Lower Canada, or abandon North America altogether. Was England prepared for such an alternative? I do believe that the possession of our colonies tends materially to the prosperity of this empire. On the preservation of our colonies depends the continuance of our commercial marine, and on our commercial marine mainly depends our naval power, and on our naval power mainly depend the strength and supremacy of our arms. I think, then, I may say, without arguing the question any farther, that it is our policy, as well as but fairness and justice to our fellow subjects, that we should not think of abandoning these provinces. [Hear, hear, hear.]

I say, likewise, if I could find that it is not the interest both of this country and the colony itself that Canada should continue to be a part of the British empire, I should be prepared to counsel a separation; but coming as I do to a most decided conviction on both these questions, I am quite prepared to come to the farther question, namely, what is the course we should adopt upon the present occasion? I conceive there can be no doubt that the first duty of the country and of the house, if they concur in the view of the question which we take, is to put down insurrection. With respect to force it will be, I think absolutely necessary that a very sufficient force should be in the St. Lawrence in the spring, to be landed in Canada as soon as the navigation opens. [Hear.] For my own part, I say I entertain no apprehensions as to what may have hitherto been done by these insurgents, abandoned as they seem to have been by the great body of the British, and even French Canadians.

But it is obvious, at the same time, that, an insurrection having once broken out, a temptation is by the very circumstance presented, to many a temptation not to be resisted, to endeavor to shake the British power in Canada. Let me be understood as not meaning to say that any treaties or friendships with this country are likely to be forgotten on the present occasion, either by the great powers of Europe or by America. I have no intention of even insinuating the possibility of such an occurrence, and the conduct of the United States government since the commencement of the disturbances in Canada, strongly tends to convince us that from the United States the Canadian rebels will meet with neither sympathy nor assistance. [Cheers.]

But at the same time it is impossible not to see that both in Europe and America there are many whom the want of employment at home, and the hope of a participation in those splendid spoils so temptingly held out by the abettors of the rebellion, will induce to flock to the scene; and for this reason, even though circumstances may in the end prove that the precaution is unnecessary, I think it will be quite necessary that we should be prepared for action by the next spring, and have in the St. Lawrence ready for disembarkation, a force sufficient to put down every vestige of the insurrection. Then comes the question with respect to the civil government. It is obviously quite impossible that we should think of convening the assembly, or of asking them to pass laws, or do any act properly belonging to their jurisdiction.

After some further remarks by lord John Russell, who was followed by other members, the address was agreed to, and lord John Russell moved for leave to bring in his bill for the temporary government of Lower Canada.

On the 17th lord John Russell read the queen's answer to the address, which was to the following effect:

Her majesty thanked her faithful commons for the assurance given to support her efforts for the restoration of the tranquillity of Lower Canada.

The unfortunate events that had taken place there had given her the deepest concern; and her majesty looked forward with anxiety to the period when the re-establishment of order would enable her to lay the foundation of lasting peace.

The spirit of concord manifested, and the exertions made by the North American provinces, in support of her authority, demanded her warmest acknowledgments.

The bill introduced by lord John Russell, relative to a provisional government in Canada, proposes the appointment of a governor general and a council selected from the two provinces, to do the duties of the defunct assembly. The said new government to organise a new constitution, subject to the approval of parliament. The bill was passed on the 27th by the house of commons. On the same day it was brought up to the house of lords, read once, and ordered to its second reading on the 3d of February.

The latest advices from New York were to the 2d January, at which time the Navy Island folly was in full tide of operation. We are glad, on many accounts, to perceive that the tone of the papers is discreet and moderate towards this country, and that of the speakers in parliament still more so.

SPEECH OF MR. RIVES, OF VIRGINIA,

In opposition to the Sub-Treasury Bill, and in support of his Substitute. Delivered in the Senate of the United States, February 6, 7, 1838.

Mr. President: It would have been very gratifying to me if I had found the measure now under consideration such an one as I could conscientiously support. The question is one which every interest of the nation requires should be settled promptly, but wisely settled. It is time that the country were relieved from those anxieties and apprehensions in regard to the future, which, added to the embarrassments of the present, weigh like an incubus upon the national enterprise and palsy all its faculties. I should have been most happy, therefore, if I could have seen in the measure recommended by the committee of finance, any of those healing and salutary tendencies which the circumstances of the times and the situation of the country so imperiously demand. I had hoped, indeed, at one time, that such a measure would have been presented to us. The president, in his message to congress at the commencement of the present session, while renewing the expression of his own opinions in favor of the financial project of the late called session, very properly invited the consideration of congress to the manifestations of public sentiment which had, since then, taken place; and recognizing "the national will as the supreme law of the republic," plainly intimated that a measure which had proved unacceptable to the people ought not to be again pressed on their adoption. I had hoped, that the committee of finance, concurring in this republican sentiment of the chief magistrate, and in the presence of the manifestations which the recent elections in the north and the south, the east and the west, had afforded of the national repugnance to the measure of the late session, would, in the resources of their wisdom and acknowledged abilities, have presented us some other, on which we might have rallied with more harmonious opinions. I am sorry to say that, in the examination of the bill on your table, I have found nothing to justify or sustain this hope. It is, in every essential respect, a reproduction of the condemned measure of the late session, with some superadded features, which only seem to aggravate its deformity and increase its dangers. It commits, as that did, the millions of public treasure to the hazardous and demoralizing possession of executive agents—it levies that treasure from the pockets of the people, after a short period, in gold and silver only—it then disposes these collections in masses at a few important commercial points, to serve as a basis of operations, which must inevitably terminate in a great government bank—and to take charge of and manage this machinery, it institutes a new corps of executive officers, whose very name, (receivers-general,) calls up by an indissoluble association, the extravagance, the speculation, the clumsy magnificence of that bloated and unwieldy system of French finance, which is the acknowledged prototype of this new scheme.

I propose, Mr. President, in as brief and rapid a manner as possible, to pass in review the principal points of this new financial project. Its fundamental and vital principle is to collect the public revenue in gold and silver only, out of a circulation consisting exclusively now, and mainly at all times, of bank paper for the common use of the people. Of this invidious discrimination between the money of the government and the money of the people, and its anti-republican and injurious tendencies, I had an opportunity of stating my views very fully during the late session of congress. It was the subject of very thorough discussion on both sides, at that time; and for one I am perfectly content to abide the verdict of public opinion on the arguments, on the one side and the other, then presented. It was shown, in my judgment, most conclusively that the effect of this principle would be permanently to create two currencies in the country—one and that the "better" one for the government, another and inferior one for the people—that it would thus separate the interests of the governors from those of the governed, destroying that bond of sympathy and common feeling between them which is the best, if not the only, security for a sound administration of public affairs—that it would indefinitely protract the present derangement of the currency and deliver it over finally to a state of hopeless and irremediable disorder—and that its operation upon the institutions of the states would be of the most hostile and destructive character. I should not now recur to these topics, having heretofore discussed them fully, but that the senator from New York, (Mr. Wright,) has thought proper again to argue them, and I must say, with all his ingenuity, has failed, in my estimation, to shake a single position maintained by the opponents of his bill. It has been fashionable to denounce these objections as mere ad captandam arguments; but, sir, have they been answered? Can they be answered, otherwise than by returning epithets for arguments?

That measure would establish a distinction, an odious distinction, between the currency of the government and the currency of the people, cannot be denied, for such is the positive provision of the bill. It expressly requires that, after a certain time, the government shall receive, in discharge of the public dues, and pay to its officers and other creditors, nothing but gold and silver or its own paper, while the common currency, in which the people transact their dealings, would still remain bank paper. The fact, then, is undeniable. But it is intimated there is nothing wrong in this; and we, who oppose it are asked if we would have the government in the present condition of things, for example, to receive its revenue in the various spurious substitutes for money, which now form so large a portion of the actual circulation of the country. The answer, sir, costs me no embarrassment. I say, no; but this is precisely a case in which the corruption proves the rule. The present is a temporary and accidental state of things; and the refusal of the government, under existing circumstances, to receive the degraded currency of the times in payment of the public revenue, so far from being founded on any permanent distinction between the currency of the government and the currency of the people, is intended to do away this distinction, and to provide a sound convertible currency for the common use of both government and people—for the joint resolution of 1816, which is still the law of the land, expressly declares that when the banks shall resume specie payments and thus provide the people with a sound convertible currency, that currency shall be equally receivable by the government in discharge of its dues. But the bill of the honorable senator contemplates no such thing. It rejects the paper of the banks inexorably, under all circumstances whatever—even though convertible instantly into specie. It will have, for the government, nothing but gold and silver, or its own paper. It demands, with Shylock severity, its "pound of flesh," and that, too, without the condition of humanity imposed on the Venetian Jew "not to spill a drop of Christian blood" in the exaction.

The honorable senator from New York seems, however, to have persuaded himself that the requisition of gold and silver in payment of the public dues would improve the general currency by bringing into circulation a larger portion of the precious metals. But, sir, how can this be? It was shown, in the discussions of the late session of congress, that when there are two currencies in a country, one answering all the purposes of the other, and a valuable purpose besides, that which answers the additional purpose, would be at a premium, and being so, would not enter into general circulation, but be bought and sold as an article of merchandise. According to this law of currency, it would follow, under the operation of the proposed system, that gold and silver only, being applicable to revenue payments, they would, in general, command a premium, and would consequently be withdrawn from general circulation. They would be sold by the broker to the public debtor, who would pay them to the government—by the government, they would be paid out to the public creditor, and the public creditor would go and sell them again to the broker. This would be the narrow and charmed circle of their movement. They could never enter into the general circulation, under such circumstances; nor, indeed, under any circumstances, (as has been amply shown on another occasion,) without a previous suppression of the smaller denominations of bank notes, for which this bill contains no provision.

The honorable senator also argues, that this policy would tend to secure soundness in the paper portion of the currency, by checking over-issues of the banks. But, instead of contributing to the soundness of the paper currency, it would necessarily increase its insecurity. The great source of insecurity in the banking system at present, as is well known, is the danger of a suspension of specie payments arising from a foreign drain of the precious metals. But this measure would superadd to the foreign an internal drain of specie, to be locked up in the vaults of the government; and, from the nature of things, this internal and external drain would occur at the same moment, and exert together their destructive influence upon the banks. It would be in years of heavy importations that, the balance of trade turning against the country, the foreign drain would be most sensibly felt, and it would be precisely, under such circumstances, that the demand for specie to pay the duties, on these importations being greatly augmented, the internal drain would operate also with most severity. How then can the honorable senator imagine that the security of the paper currency, supplied by the banks, is to be increased by exposing them to a double pressure, from within and from without, at so critical a moment.

In regard to the hostile operation of this measure on the state currencies, and the credit institutions of the states, the honorable senator has taken up the subject in far too narrow a point of view. He spoke as if the whole matter of complaint, in this respect, consisted in withholding the deposits of the public money from the banks. But, sir, the gist of the question does not lie here. This is a matter in which the convenience and the safety of the government itself are concerned far more than any interest of the banks generally, or of the states by which they are created. The real grievance is in the stern exclusion by law of the sound convertible currencies of the states from all transactions of the federal government, (transactions in which they have been heretofore invariably admitted, from the origin of the government to the present day,) the official discredit and protest, in advance, thus stamped upon those currencies by the unfriendly action of this government, giving the signal for general distrust and want of confidence in regard to them. Sir, it will be no difficult matter to show that, under the blight of this legislative denunciation, and in the progressive working of the system now proposed, the state currencies will be finally broken down, and a national government paper currency, resting on the same principles as our old continental money, be made to take their place. But the senator from New York tells us that the state currencies will enjoy as much favor under the new policy, as they did under the regime of the United States Bank—that that institution very rarely received the notes of the state banks in collection of the public revenue, and when it did so, it promptly returned them for conversion into specie. I certainly had not expected, Mr. President, that the Bank of the United States would be held up, from that quarter, as a model for imitation, in regard to its policy toward the state institutions. But the senator is mistaken in what he says of the course of that institution, and it will appear that even its policy was one of far more liberality toward the state institutions than that which the honorable senator himself now proposes. It is officially stated in the triennial report of the president of that institution to the stockholders in September, 1831, that the Bank of the United States was in the practice of "receiving freely the notes of the state banks, within convenient reach of the bank and its branches;" and this free reception of the notes of the state banks and periodical "settlements of accounts" with them, were the boasted means on which that institution relied to regulate and preserve the soundness of the general currency of the country. It is farther shown by the answer of that officer to certain interrogatories propounded to him by the committee on finance, of this body, in March, 1830, that though frequent "settlements of accounts" were made by the Bank of the United States with the state banks, they were "rarely forced to pay specie" to any considerable amount for their notes, but payment was taken in their bills of exchange, or balances permitted to lie over, 'till melted down in the ordinary course of their business and mutual transactions. This statement is sustained, through a series of years, by the annual returns of the bank to congress, exhibiting generally large balances due to it from the state banks. But, sir, even though the course of the United States Bank had been as unfriendly toward the state institutions, as the gentleman from New York supposes, the law of the land, the legislation of congress, made no attack on them, as is now proposed. On the contrary, their credit was cherished and sustained by the law; for the joint resolution of 1816 expressly declared that their notes, when convertible on demand into specie, should be receivable, equally with specie, in payment of public dues. This is the important consideration; for in the law, in the policy and language of the government, abides mainly that principle of confidence, on which all paper currency rests, and which is now proposed to be rudely withdrawn from the currencies of the states, however unquestionable their soundness and value.

But Mr. President, without dwelling farther on these considerations, I beg leave to ask gentlemen who are so zealously patronising the policy of this measure, if they can adduce to us, from ancient or modern times, from civilized or even barbarous communities, a solitary example of a government demanding and collecting its revenue in a currency different from the common, actual currency of the country. If there be any such, it has escaped my researches. In countries where the public revenue may have been, or may now be, collected in gold and silver, it will be found that gold and silver constitute the common, actual currency of the people. Even in England and France, where the circulation consists, in so large a proportion of the precious metals, the revenue payments are, by no means, confined to gold and silver; but bank notes are freely received in both, in discharge of the government dues. It is, indeed, a fundamental maxim of taxation, laid down by all writers on political economy,* and respected in the practice of all governments, that the mode of payment of the public contributions ought to be that most consistent with the convenience of the payers—the great body of the community. Is it reserved for the government of the United States, in its theory the most popular on earth, and claiming the merit of the closest sympathy with the wants and interests of the people, to set the first example of a departure from this just and benignant rule of policy? and for what reason—for what purpose? I think I have shown that none of the great interests of the country are to be promoted by it. It may, it is true, be quite agreeable to the office-holders, and other recipients of the bounty of the government, to obtain their emoluments in a "better" currency, than the common currency of the people; but surely this will be held no legitimate consideration for legislators and statesmen. What end, then, is to be answered? What object to be promoted by the introduction of this anomaly in the history of legislation? Is it to carry out some theoretical dogma—some mere common place of party? Is it, in short, to satisfy the notions couched and propagated under the well-sounding phrase constitutional currency?

I ask, then, what is meant by this phrase? Is it meant that no other currency is constitutional but gold and silver? If so, I deny the proposition. Bank notes, as currency, are as constitutional as gold and silver. The constitution, it is true, declares that "no state shall make any thing but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts." This was intended to establish an ultimate standard of value for the adjustment of contracts, where the parties chose to insist on the strictness of legal rights, but not to prevent the states from authorizing convertible representatives of that value to be used as currency, or a common medium of exchange and circulation, in the ordinary business of life. On the contrary, those representatives in the shape of bank notes, were known and used as currency, at the time of the adoption of the constitution, and nothing in that instrument prohibits them—the states have, constantly since, been in the habit of creating corporations, authorized to issue and circulate them—the power, thus exercised by the states, has been invariably acquiesced in and recognised by the general government—and recently it has been determined by the solemn and unanimous judgment of the highest judicial tribunal of the country, (in the case of Briscoe vs. the Commonwealth Bank of Kentucky,) that the states rightfully and constitutionally possess the power. I say it was unanimously so decided by the supreme court, because, although a minority of the court were of opinion that, where the state owned the entire stock of the bank, the exercise of the power would be an infringement of the constitutional prohibition on the states "to emit bills of credit," yet all the judges concurred, that the authority of the states was unquestionable where the stock of the banks was owned either by individuals entirely, or by them in common with the state as a partial stockholder. State bank notes, then, being issued in pursuance of an unquestionable constitutional authority, are a constitutional currency, as well as gold and silver. It is true, a creditor cannot be compelled to accept payment of his debt in bank notes, if he object to doing so; but this does not affect their character as currency, as a common medium of exchange and circulation, or prevent a payment in bank notes from being a final and complete discharge of the debt, if accepted.

But, perhaps, by this oft repeated phrase, it is meant to be implied that there is some special constitutional obligation on the government to demand its dues in gold and silver. There is as little foundation, however, for this notion as for that which I have just exposed. The government is like every other creditor. It has the power, as every individual creditor has, (if it chooses wantonly to exert it, and to recur to the rigor of strict right,) to insist on the payment of its dues in gold and silver; but, as an individual creditor also, it may waive its strict right, the sternness of the summum jus, (which, we are told, is most frequently summa injuria;) and receive its dues in the same medium which individuals and the people, by common consent, use for the adjustment of their transactions. This it has done, from the adoption of the constitution to the present day, and never, heretofore, with any question of the constitutionality of the procedure. It not only has the constitutional power which every other creditor has, to waive the strictness of its right, in this respect, but it is especially incumbent on it, as the common agent of the people, guided by that fundamental and benignant maxim of taxation, to which I have already adverted, to waive an extreme right, which, in its exercise, would so seriously affect the convenience of its constituents—the great body of the people.

We must not, then, be led away, under the dominion of well-sounding phrases, of plausible or pompous common places, to disregard the real interests of the country. As legislators and statesmen, we must emancipate our minds from the delusive authority of mere dogmas, and look to the consequences of our actions, the practical effects of our measures. If we trace this requisition of specie for the public dues in its effects on the actual business of society, we shall find that it is calculated to convulse the whole monetary system of the country, and to keep it in a state of ceaseless and distressing commotion. Under the operation of the banking system as it exists in this country, specie is to be regarded not so much a part of the currency, as the basis or source of a far larger portion. For every dollar of hard money that is taken from the banks, four or five times its amount is withdrawn in another form from the actual circulation of the country. Bearing this in mind, let us see how the proposed system would work. In years of abundant importation, the circulation of the seaports being insufficient to furnish the requisite sums of specie to pay the duties, large amounts would be drawn from the south and west to meet the demands of the custom house in the north and east. The sections, thus stripped of their specie, would be, all at once, subjected to the greatest of all calamities in a pecuniary point of view—that of a deficient circulation, suddenly contracted, not in the ratio, merely, of the specie removed, but of four or five times its amount; for to that extent would the banks be compelled to call in their circulation, in order to meet the drafts upon them for the precious metals. Under this desolating process, the prices of property would be struck down, the relation of debtor and creditor violently disturbed, and every branch of industry paralysed and withered. On the other hand, when the land sales became active, the current would be reversed, large masses of specie would be drawn from the north and the east to the south and the west, attended with the same distressing effects on the trade and industry of the country, and only shifting the theatre of their disastrous operation. What could result from this perpetual dragging, to and fro, of the specie of the country, contrary to the natural laws of trade, and in obedience only to arbitrary governmental regulations, but incessant throes and convulsions in the whole system of its business and currency?

It would be some compensation, in a national point of view, if the specie, of which different portions of the country would, in their turn, be stripped, under the operation of this new system, were restored to active and beneficial use in those sections to which it would be transferred. But would this be the case? No, sir. The whole surplus, beyond the current disbursement of the government, would rest in barren and unproductive idleness, in the "vaults and iron safes" of your sub-treasuries. It would be an annihilation of so much of the national capital, susceptible of multiplication, through conventional substitutes, to four times its nominal amount, and capable of fructifying and sustaining the national industry to a corresponding extent. I must confess, Mr. President, that this monopoly and hoarding of the precious metals by the government, does seem to me unworthy of the age in which we live. We may find examples of it among the nations of antiquity. But their circumstances were very different from ours. They were engaged in frequent wars, and they accumulated their treasure in advance, as a provision for those national emergencies, always with them, more or less near at hand. It may also deserve consideration whether the practice which prevailed among them of hoarding the public treasure was not the cause, fully as much as the effect, of the frequency of their wars; for the relief to industry from unlocking those vast hoards in time of war, may well be conceived to have rendered the occurrence of war no unwelcome event to their crowded populations. If we descend to modern times, we find no instance of this national hoarding, but among rude and uncivilized communities—the barbaric powers of the tartar tribes, for example. The dey of Algiers is said to have been the master of a large hoard of accumulated treasure, when he was expelled from his dominions by the French. So, also, was Mazeppa, the celebrated Cossack chieftain, the untutored ally of Charles the XII. But surely, we are not going to the banks of the Dnieper, or the shores of Africa, for lessons in policy and legislation. We shall not thus, I humbly trust, dishonor the spirit of the age, belie the genius of our free institutions, and mar the destinies of our great and glorious country.

But there are aspects of this measure even more dangerous and alarming. In the remarks I had the honor to submit to the senate, at the late session, I said that this scheme had a squinting, "an awful squinting" towards a treasury bank. It now has that character boldly planted on its front. It is, to all intents and purposes, a great government bank; and of this I persuade myself I shall be able to satisfy every gentleman who will do me the honor to accompany me in the analysis I propose to make of its composition. In the first place, the national revenue, collected in gold and silver, is to be disposed in masses at certain leading points, designated by their importance in a commercial, financial, or political view. The bill directs that there shall be a great central depot of it in the new treasury building here—another depot in the mint of Philadelphia—a third at the branch mint at New Orleans, and four other similar depots of the national treasure in gold and silver, at New York, Boston, Charleston, at St. Louis. Buildings are to be erected (where they do not already exist,) for the reception and security of these funds, fitted up with vaults, safes, and all the usual appendages of banking establishment. The treasurer and secretary of the treasury are to preside, particularly over the central establishment here—the treasury of the mint and the branch mint over the establishments in Philadelphia and New Orleans, an four receivers general, with their clerks and assistants, over those at New York, Boston, Charleston and St. Louis. Thus you have the funds or capital to operate on, placed in position at suitable point and a complete organization of officers to manage and administer those funds. Nothing but the placid hand of the secretary of the treasury will be wanting to mould these materials into a bank, as to give motion and direction to the machine. How will it be done? The modus operandi will be perfectly natural and simple.

The government funds, compared with the disbursements to be made, will be in excess in some places, while they will be deficient in others. The must then be transferred from one place of deposit to another. This will hardly ever, it is to be presumed, be done by an actual transportation of specie. It will, doubtless, be generally effected by the ordinary commercial means of drafts and bills of exchange. The bill most sedulously gives to the secretary of the treasury an unlimited discretionary authority to make and order these transfers from one place of deposit to another, and from one individual depository to another. At a place therefore, where the government funds are in excess, and he wishes to transfer a portion of them to some other place where they are deficient, he will naturally direct a draft, or bill of exchange on the latter place to be bought, paying for it out of the specie accumulated in excess at the place of the negotiation. On the other hand, when he wishes to draw funds from a distant place, where they are in excess, to a place where they are deficient, a bill on the former place will be sold, and the money received for it, added to the deficient funds at the place of the negotiation. The officers of the government, thus operating on the public funds under this system, would become habitual dealers in exchange—a regular and acknowledged branch of the business of banking. In the exercise of these functions, the accommodation of individuals would come to be fully as much consulted as the wants of the government. The receiver general at St. Louis, for example, having an excess of the public moneys in his hands, and instructed to transfer that excess to the sub-treasury at New York, would naturally do so by buying drafts on merchants or other individuals on the latter place. But in this application of the public money to the purchase of drafts, what an endless field would there be for undue favors to individuals, as well as discriminating among those who might have drafts to sell, as in adjusting the price and other terms of the purchase. So, likewise, if we suppose the receiver general at New York, authorised to draw surplus of public moneys from St. Louis, he would do so by selling drafts on the receiver general at St. Louis; and in this operation of selling, there would be precisely the same danger of abuse, as of the influence of personal considerations, as have just shown to exist in that of buying change.

It is also very easy to perceive that, under the forms of buying and selling bills of exchange, government officers, real loans to individuals will be couched. If I buy, for example, a bill of exchange which has sixty or ninety days to run, and pay for it in cash, as I suppose to be done in the case, put above, of a receiver general purchasing bills to transfer an excess of public moneys in his hands, what is this in fact but a loan of money be returned, at the end of sixty or ninety days, some other place where the government wants it. It is, indeed, except as to place, the ordinary form of discounting mercantile paper. In like manner the sale of a bill of exchange, to be paid for at a future day, is a very convenient medium of a loan. The purchaser immediately sells the bill, has bought, realizes it in money, the use of which he enjoys for the stipulated period, and then returns it with the rate of profit agreed upon in the normal purchase. The transaction is, to every practical intent, a loan; and professional gentlemen conversant with the devices practised to evade the statutes against usury, will tell you that nothing more common than to make a real loan under a very form of selling a bill of exchange. We see then, that the officers of the treasury, under the organization provided by this bill, would not only be engaged in buying and selling bills of exchange, but they would have the power of discounting mercantile paper and making real loans. Thus the bill creates, in effect, a bank of discount.

It would, moreover, be a bank of deposits, the 27th section of the bill expressly authorises dividuals to deposit money in the "treasury, or at such other points as the treasurer may designate," the receipts for which, it is declared, shall be current in the several land offices as cash. This, I am aware, is but a special and limited provision, confined at present to payments in advance for public lands. But the principle being once introduced, will, from time to time, be extended to other cases. I shall hereafter have occasion to show that president Jackson, when he suggested the idea of a government bank, of which this bill seems to be the development, expressly recommended that it should be based upon individual, as well as public deposits.

The organization instituted by this bill would also be a bank of circulation, for the drafts, receipts, and other paper authorized to be issued by the officers of the treasury, under the provisions of the bill, would form a part of the actual currency and circulation of the country. That it is designed, through the medium of this machinery, to issue permanently a government paper currency, under some form or other, is sufficiently evinced by the alternative clause of the bill relating to receipts and payments by the government, which requires that all such receipts and payments, after a certain period, shall be in gold and silver, "or in notes, bills, or paper, issued under the authority of the United States." The senator from South Carolina, (Mr. Calhoun,) the patron and champion of this bill, and the author of the provision just referred to, is known to advocate a paper currency of that description, issued and resting exclusively on the credit of the government. The secretary of the treasury too, in his report on the finances, at the commencement of the present session, does not hesitate to ask congress for the permanent grant of an authority to issue treasury notes, (at his discretion, within a certain limit,) according to the varying wants of the treasury. But the design of supplying a paper medium, for general circulation, through the fiscal action of the government, is more fully developed in the report of that officer at the last session, and from that document, I beg leave to read to the senate a few significant extracts.

"Should congress," says the secretary, "determine that it is proper to furnish by its own authority, and for the purposes before mentioned, some paper medium of higher character, and other than what now exists in private bills of exchange, or notes of date banks, no doubt exists, that any benefits which may occasionally be derived from its employment can be readily secured, without treading on the debatable ground of either the power or the policy of chartering a national bank. Certificates, not on interest, but payable in specie to bearer or order, as well as being receivable for all public dues, could be authorized to be given in payment to the public creditor, whenever preferred by him, and sufficient specie existed in the treasury. This kind of paper would be very convenient in form, and would differ little from the drafts now in use on banks, except being drawn on a known specie fund, and expressing on its face not only this, but its being receivable, in the first instance, for all public dues. It would possess the highest credit attainable in society." "The common drafts of this department, in the present conventional form, possess one advantage, which could be imparted to the certificates. When used at places against which the balance of trade exists, but drawn on places in whose favor it is, the former do now, and may hereafter, not only facilitate essentially the domestic exchanges, but at the same time, supersede numerous bank transfers, and the more expensive transportation of specie itself."

"The mint certificates, heretofore given on the deposit of bullion and specie for coinage, might be easily made running to bearer or order, and receivable for all public dues; and, in that way, would contribute to the same desirable ends."

"It must be obvious that the paper of any bank would be less safe and useful in being received for public dues, in proportion as it may want such solid securities and foundations as the certificates before described."

My purpose is not now to discuss the supposed advantages of this government paper currency, so much lauded by the secretary. The great recommendation of it, in his eyes, is that it would rest upon a specie basis co-extensive with the issues. But as the certificates would be rarely returned for redemption, nothing would be more likely to happen than what occurred in the case of the bank of Amsterdam—that, in the mean time, large portions of the specie would be withdrawn and diverted to other purposes. But my intention was simply to show that an issue of a government paper currency, in some form or other, is one of the main objects of this new financial scheme. In looking at the passage above quoted, and others of similar import in the report of the secretary of the treasury, it is impossible to wink so hard as not to see that the design is to supply a paper medium, through the fiscal operations of this government, which, it is hoped, would ultimately supersede the state currencies; and the organization proposed, in this bill, is the instrument by which that design is to be accomplished. That it would be a bank of circulation is unquestionable; and I have already shown that it would be a bank both of discount and deposit.

The secretary of the treasury, however, seems to think there would be no bank in all this, because there would be no incorporation. But incorporation is not necessary to constitute a bank, which derives its character wholly from the nature of its business and functions. The government bank of Russia is not incorporated. Neither is the government bank of Austria. They are both constituted of, and managed by, officers of the government, precisely as the machinery created by this bill is proposed to be managed and directed. So in regard to the private and joint stock banks of England. They are not incorporated; but no body ever supposed them to be the less banks on that account. Some thirteen or fourteen years ago, the celebrated Mr. Ricardo proposed the plan of "a national bank" in England, which, among other things, was to have the exclusive privilege of issuing the whole paper currency of the kingdom. It was to be a government institution, consisting of five commissioners, residing in London, to be appointed by the crown and removable by parliament, and to be assisted by agents and officers established in the leading country towns. The plan of this bill bears, in some respects, so close a resemblance to that of Mr. Ricardo, that it is difficult to resist the impression that the one must have suggested the other. The organization proposed by Mr. Ricardo, consisted, like that of this bill, of public officers, having certain duties and functions assigned to them, connected with the collection and management of the public revenue, as well as with the issue of a paper currency. No act of incorporation was proposed or deemed necessary; but he did not, on that account, the less consider his scheme a "national bank," under which name it was expressly presented to his countrymen.

But there is another authority on this head still more in point. It remounts to the first suggestion ever made in this country of a government or treasury bank. I allude, of course, to president Jackson, who in his first annual message to congress, (1829,) threw out the idea of a bank, founded on the "credit and resources of the United States." This suggestion became the subject of very able and elaborate examination by the committees on finance, in this and the other house, by both of which, though consisting of warm friends of the president, the suggestion was repudiated and exploded. The president, in his message at the commencement of the following session of congress, (December, 1830,) thought proper to recur to the subject, and to define more precisely what he meant by a bank founded on "the credit and resources of the United States." The scheme he then brought forward was identical, in every respect, with that contained in the present bill; and yet, with the soldierly frankness which characterized him, he did not hesitate to call it by its proper name—"a bank of the United States." Let us see what he said on that occasion.

"In the spirit of compromise and improvement which distinguishes our country and its institutions, it becomes us to enquire whether it be not possible to secure the advantages afforded by the present bank, through the agency of a bank of the United States, so modified in its principles and structure, as to obviate constitutional and other objections. It is thought practicable to organize such a bank, with the necessary officers, as a branch of the treasury department, based on the public and individual deposits, (without power to make loans or purchase property,) which shall remit the funds of the government, and the expenses of which may be paid, if thought advisable, by allowing its officers to sell bills of exchange to private individuals, at a moderate premium, &c., &c., &c. In times of public emergency, the capacities of such an institution might be enlarged by legislative provisions."

The bank which gen. Jackson proposed, was to be organized, with the necessary officers, as a branch of the treasury department, to be based on the public and individual deposits, to remit the funds of the government, and to deal in bills of exchange. The organization, provided by the bill under consideration, is to possess every one of these attributes, and to perform other banking functions in addition, such as the issue of paper, which was not then contemplated. Yet, while the former plan, was boldly avowed to be a bank, this is denied to be one. Gen. Jackson, with all his popularity and energy of purpose, was not able to commend his plan to the favor of the country, and even his volonte de fer, (iron will,) as it was called by a foreign representative, on a memorable occasion, obeying the great law of republicanism, bent beneath the force of public opinion, and abandoned the scheme. Yet the same scheme is now reproduced, amid the confusion of the times, in an aggravated form, but without the name.

It is a remarkable circumstance, Mr. President, that the most ancient and celebrated banking institutions of Europe have grown up from precisely such beginnings as are contained in this bill. The bank of Venice, for example, the oldest and most celebrated bank in Europe, commenced as a fiscal institution. The republic, pressed by its foreign wars, was compelled to resort to a forced loan. In order to secure the payment of the interest on this loan, it set apart certain branches of the public revenue, and instituted a board of commissioners, called the chamber of loans, who were charged with the collection and management of those branches of the revenue, and the application of their proceeds to the punctual payment of the interest on the loan. In the transaction of the business confided to them, they had occasion sometimes, to buy and sell bills of exchange, as I have shown the officers of the Treasury, under the organization of this bill, would do. Having frequently surplus funds on hand, they began at length to employ them more extensively in the operation of buying and selling exchange, and under this power, actually advanced money on mercantile paper, or in other words, became a bank of discount. The credit and responsibility of the institution being established, the merchants of Venice began to make use of it for the safe-keeping of their funds, and so it became a bank of deposit also. Finally, a credit on the books of the institution for money deposited, being equivalent to cash, payments in the course of trade, came to be made by transfers of these credits from one to another, or by what are now called checks, which performed the office, and preceded the introduction of notes, and so the chamber of loans became also a bank of circulation. We see in this example, by what natural and easy gradations the most celebrated banking institution in Europe, that which has been the model of all the rest, grew out of the simple function of collecting and applying the public revenue, associating to itself a collateral and incidental action on the commerce and currency of the country, all of which functions, I have shown, are to be vested by the new financial scheme in the officers of the treasury department.

The same in every material respect, were the origin and progress of the bank of Genoa; which, next to that of Venice, was the oldest, and in its day the most accredited banking institution in Europe. In England, too, the mint, at one time, in being made the depository of the funds of individuals, as the secretary of the treasury proposes that our mint and its branches should be, became virtually a bank—"the great centre of money transactions and remittances for England and foreign nations"—till Charles the 1st, in 1640, impelled by his necessities, violated the private funds deposited there, and "happily," as Burke says, put an end to both its credit and use as a banking establishment.

The testimony of history then, as well as the nature of things, proves that the organization instituted by this bill, would work as a great government bank—buying and selling exchange—under that form, at least, discounting mercantile paper,—receiving deposits, public and private,—and circulating a paper money of its own. Now, I would appeal to every friend of the liberties of his country, and ask him if he would willingly see so formidable an union of the moneyed and political power consummated in the hands of the government. Will he put so potent an engine, an instrument so efficacious of operating on the hopes and fears of men, of enlisting their interests, of controlling their fortunes, into the hands of a department of the government, already armed with a patronage and power of fearful extent?

The honorable senator from New York, (Mr. Wright) in a portion of his remarks which seemed to be intended specially for the benefit of those of us who are still for employing the state banks as depositories, and whom he described as a very small fraction, said that the real and only alternative before the country is the sub-treasury scheme or a national bank. Now, sir, unless the observations I have made on the practical operation of the sub-treasury scheme are founded in the grossest delusion, that scheme, instead of being antagonistical to a national bank, is, in every respect, identical with it. It would be a national bank under the worst possible form. A national bank in the hands of the executive, controlled and managed exclusively by executive agents. If, then, the honorable senator will insist upon making up an issue, to which the ghost of that thrice-slain monster, the Bank of the United States must be a party, he must amend his pleadings according to the real state of the case, and submit to the country this question—will you have a great government bank in the hands and under the control of executive officers, or will you have an incorporated national bank, designed to be a business concern and not a political engine? When this issue shall be presented, if indeed, it ever shall be, let me tell the honorable senator that there are those whose opposition to a national bank is as true as his or that of any other man, who would pause long, before they would permit the terror of any alternative to drive them into the support of a scheme, like that of the honorable senator, which they believe to be fraught with the most serious danger to the liberties, and certain destruction to the best interests of their country. I shall hereafter endeavor to show that the true and only means of averting either an incorporated national bank or a great government bank is to sustain the state institutions, and to employ their agency, with such modifications and securities as experience may have shown to be either necessary or desirable.

I wish, however, for the present to pursue the remarks which the honorable senator, with "so much charity," to use his own expression, addressed to that small fraction of erring and obstinate brethren, sometimes "cycloped conservatives." The name, I believe, sir, has not been of their own choosing; but gentlemen who are well read in the history of parties will not fail to remember that the most odious and reproachful designations applied to them by their adversaries have become endeared by the persecutions of political intolerance, and those who at first felt injured and insulted by the application of a political nick-name, have at last proudly appropriated it, and come to glory in it as a memorial of their struggles and a symbol of their principles. Now, sir, I do not know that there is any thing in this name of conservative, as applied to American institutions, which an American patriot ought to wish to disown. It implies devotion to the existing institutions of his country—a desire to preserve and defend them—a willingness, and even zeal to reform, as the only effectual means of preserving—but an unconquerable resistance to schemes of wild innovation and destruction. If this is what is meant by a conservative, (and such is the true and proper import of the term,) then, sir, I proudly avow myself a conservative—a conservative of republican institutions, of republican principles, of republican practices, as illustrated and interpreted by the great champions of the republican faith.

But, sir, to pursue the remarks of the honorable senator, addressed to this small faction of his political brethren. He tells them that their plan has very few supporters in either house of congress; that there are two great parties in congress, one for the sub-treasury scheme, and the other for a national bank, and he sees, therefore, no prospect of success for any middle ground. He then assumes that the state of public sentiment among the people corresponds to this division of opinion in congress. I must say, with all my respect for the gentleman's knowledge and skill in the statistics of party, that this assumption is not warranted under the circumstances of the case, nor does it seem to me sound in principle. It implies that the organization and array of parties here is to give law to public opinion, and that public opinion is not to shape and control the action of parties here. Sir, I go for the voice of the people; and the people have spoken for themselves. They have not left us to infer their sentiments from any accidental or temporary relation of parties here. They have pronounced judgment on the gentleman's scheme; and I should like to know where the honorable gentleman finds, in these expressions of public opinion, any evidence that there is a great party in this country in favor of the sub-treasury project. Never before has any proposition been so signally rebuked and condemned by the voice of the people. I refer to these things, Mr. President, with no pleasure. I contributed my best exertions to the election of the present chief magistrate, honestly anticipating from his prudence, his abilities, and his patriotism, a wise and successful administration of the public affairs. No one has felt a more sincere desire for his success than I have done. The unfavorable manifestations of public sentiment, therefore, upon the first leading measure of his administration, (though I foresaw and foretold them, from the first moment that that measure was suggested,) have been to me the source of any thing rather than pleasure. They have now, however, become matters of public history; and as the senator from New York seems disposed to confine our view here for second-hand proofs of public opinion on the merits of the different financial measures which have been proposed, I must beg leave to invite his attention to those more majestic displays of public sentiment which have been presented on the great theatre of the nation. Let him look at the elections which have taken place in the several states, since this fatal measure was first broached in the official journal, and say how many of them have eventuated in favor of the administration. With one or two exceptions, they have all terminated against it; and mainly, there is reason to believe, on account of this very measure.

Where, then, does the honorable senator find the evidence that there is any great body of popular sentiment in this country in favor of his scheme? The evidence is all the other way, and of the most overwhelming force. So, as to the other great alternative of which the honorable senator speaks, (a national bank,) a large majority of the people have repeatedly declared against it, and without imputing to them a degree of fickleness, of which I, at least, do not suspect them, they must still be opposed to it. What plan, then, will they rally to, as a safe and practical substitute for the sub-treasury on the one hand, or a national bank on the other? It is the employment of the state banks, institutions intimately connected with their domestic interests, responsible to, and supervised by, their domestic authorities, and exempt from all danger of political combination, the employment of these institutions under regulations which shall, at the same time, secure their efficiency and guard against abuse. Such, I am firmly persuaded, would be, at this moment, the unbiased decision of a large majority of the American people. And even if we appeal to the criterion set up by the honorable senator from New York, the state of parties in congress, I think we may deduce from that, conclusions far more favorable to the state bank deposit system than he has drawn. If there be but a small party in congress, with whom the state bank deposit system is a first choice, he must admit that it is the second choice of a large majority. The sub-treasury party would, I presume, prefer it to a national bank, and the national bank party would prefer it to the sub-treasury. Now, sir, the honorable gentleman will permit me to refresh his early reading, by reminding him of an incident related by Plutarch. After the battle of Salamis, in which the power of the Persian monarch was crushed by the combined Grecian fleet, the different commanders of the squadron repaired to the altar of Neptune, and according to a custom of the country and the times, each one put on a ticket the names of those who had rendered the most important service in the action. Every officer put upon his ticket his own name first, but all put the name of Themistocles next. This has been held, in all future times, as conclusive proof of the superiority of Themistocles above all his competitors; and the state bank deposit system may adduce the same evidence of its merit in being the second choice of both of the parties which respectively advocate the sub-treasury and a national bank. The fractio, therefore, in congress, who still adhere to that system, however small they may appear in the eyes of the honorable senator, can see nothing in this state of things, which calls upon either their patriotism or their prudence to abandon a policy which they believe to be sanctioned by the sentiments, and demanded by the interests, of the great body of the people.

But, sir, to return from this digression, let us see what additions are made to the official as well as pecuniary patronage of the executive, by the provisions of this bill. When I had the honor of addressing the senate at the last session, I spoke of the bill then under consideration, as the "grain of mustard seed," which would grow up into a large tree and cover the land with its branches. But I was told by the honorable senator from New York and others, that the bill did not create a single new officer, and my friend from Connecticut, (Mr. Niles) complimented me, as well as I remember, for my vivid imagination, to the account of which alone he set down the apprehensions I had expressed. But what do we now see? In three short months, the tree, which has already grown up from this grain of mustard seed, has thrown out four large branches in the form of receivers general, each of which will have its dependent ramifications in the form of cashiers, tellers, clerks, &c. The treasurer also is to have his "assistants;" and an indefinite brood of clerks is provided for all the officers made depositaries of the public moneys under the bill, to assist in the discharge of the new duties devolved on them. Finally, a number of missionaries are to be appointed from time to time, at the discretion of the secretary of the treasury, to visit and inspect the various fiscal agencies created by the bill. Now, here is a cloud of new executive officers, at once, which bids defiance to calculation. But if their present number could be estimated, (as the senator from New York has attempted to do,) it would be altogether useless, for they must, from the nature of things, be constantly and rapidly multiplying. Would the honorable senator attempt to measure the rising cloud, which threatens to overspread and blacken the whole face of the heavens, by the speck, "no bigger than a man's hand," which has just appeared on the edge of the horizon? This is but the beginning; and we all know with what vigor and fruitfulness every thing grows on American soil. Receivers general are allowed by the bill, at present, only to Massachusetts, New York, South Carolina, and Missouri. But will not Maine, New Hampshire, Connecticut, demand their receivers general, as well as Massachusetts,—Virginia, North Carolina, and Georgia, as well as South Carolina,—Kentucky, Ohio, and Tennessee, as well as Missouri; and so in regard to all the other states that are now pretermitted in the bill. If we have receivers general, we must finally have payers general; for this is an integral part of the system in France, from which we borrow the scheme proposed by the bill. In adopting a system, it is fair to presume we mean to adopt its usual and ordinary concomitants. Indeed, an honorable member of the other house, who is well skilled in questions of finance, expressed the opinion to me, only the other day, that the functions of paying and receiving ought to be separated, so as to form checks on each other; and thus we shall have the French system, in both its branches, at once. On the question of introducing a new system of policy, we ought never to forget the old adage, which we derive from France also—c'est le premier pas qui coûte—it is the first step which is decisive, and that taken, all the rest follow.

The senator from New York (Mr. Wright) has likewise attempted an estimate of the expense of this new system. But this, also, in my opinion, is a vain thing. The first modest beginnings of a system furnish no standard by which its ultimate expense can be measured. The senator's estimate makes the annual expense, (exclusive of what may be called the outfit, in the cost of buildings, &c.) somewhere about $20,000, (twenty thousand dollars.) But this is greatly below the estimate of the secretary of the treasury, in his report at the last session; and in recommending a favorite scheme the author of it is rarely found to over-estimate its expense. That officer set down the annual expense at $60,000 (sixty thousand dollars.) This, in my opinion, is very far below the ultimate permanent expense. An able and experienced gentleman in my own state, practically versed in these questions and a zealous and decided advocate withal of the new system, in setting forth its advantages, and defending it from the objections which had been urged against it, met this very one of expense by giving it as his opinion, formed upon deliberate and careful reflection, that the annual expense would not exceed $600,000, (six hundred thousand dollars.) Now, sir, when I arrived here, at the extra session of congress, and read the estimate of the secretary of the treasury, I could not but suppose, at first, that there was an accidental mistake in his figures, by the omission of a cypher, and that he intended to have put down the expense at $600,000, (at six hundred thousand dollars,) instead of $60,000, (sixty thousand dollars.)

But, however, this may be, nothing can be more certain than that the expense of this system, when fully developed, must, from its complexity, and the number of officers it will call for, be very great. We have a standard to appeal to, on this question, which is worthy far more than any a priori reasonings. The system has been long established and fully tried in France, and we know its actual results there. On the other hand, in England the agency of banks has been extensively used in the collection and disbursement of the public revenue instead of the individual agencies which are employed in France, and are contemplated by this bill. It will be a good test therefore, of this question, to look at the relative expenses of the revenue system of France and England. I will read to the senate a comparative statement on the subject, which have taken from the work of a highly respectable American traveller, vouched by original authorities to which he refers. From this statement it appears that the cost of collecting the revenue in England, under the respective heads of taxation, as follows: customs, 7 per cent.—excise, 4 per cent.—recording and stamps, 7 per cent.—post office 11 per cent.—and direct taxes, 2 per cent.—averaging, upon the whole, 6 1-5 per cent. In France, under the same heads, the costs of collecting the revenue is as follows: customs, 38 per cent.—excise, 20 per cent.—recording and stamps, 9 per cent.—post office, 1 per cent.—direct taxes, 15 per cent.—averaging upon the whole, 24 2-5 per cent! I am well aware that divers circumstances are to be taken into consideration, in explaining this enormous difference of expense between the French and English fiscal systems; but one of the principal causes of that difference, (and it is so considered by the writer, to whom I have referred,) will, at last, be found in the fact of the extensive use of banking agency in the collection of the revenue in England, and the exclusive employment of individual agency, for that purpose, in France.

But it is not merely by the multiplication of officers and the increase of expenditure, that the influence of the executive branch of the government is fearfully extended by this bill. That influence is greatly augmented by certain new regulations it introduces in regard to the tenure of office—the compensation of officers, and the forms and usages of fiscal administration. In the first place, the treasurer, the receivers-general, and all the other officers, from the highest to the lowest, employed in the fiscal service, may be required at any time, at the discretion of the secretary of the treasury, to give new official bonds, in increased sums, to be fixed by the secretary of the treasury, “any law in reference to any of the official bonds of any of the said officers to the contrary notwithstanding;” and in default of giving such new bond, the officer would, of course, be deprived of his office. Now, it is evident, that under such a power possessed by the secretary of the treasury, all the officers connected with the operations of the treasury, would be converted into the trembling vassals of the executive. A direct removal from office is a measure of more than ordinary energy, and involves responsibility. Cases might exist in which the secretary of the treasury would be unwilling to take the responsibility of a direct removal from office, and yet would accomplish the same object by a vexatious requisition of a new bond in so large a sum, that the officer could not, or would not find sureties to the increased amount. Who does not see that, under such a regulation, the officers of the treasury would lose all sense of independence; and that those who could consent to hold office on such terms, must be prepared to become the passive and unresisting tools of power. Heretofore it has been the wise policy of our legislation to fix by law the sum in which official bonds are to be given, and to leave nothing in that respect, or as little as possible, to executive discretion. Again, it will be seen from an examination of the bill, that the compensation of several of the officers to be appointed under it, such as visiting agents, clerks, &c. is to be fixed by the secretary, at his discretion, and not by law. Here is another source of servile dependence on the one hand, and of increased executive influence on the other, which is not in harmony with the general spirit and maxims of our legislation.

My attention has also been attracted by a provision of the bill which seems to me to introduce a most dangerous innovation in the established forms and usages of the treasury. It has heretofore been a fixed principle of fiscal responsibility, that no money should be drawn from the treasury, but upon a warrant of the secretary drawn on the treasurer, countersigned by the comptroller, and recorded by the register, and upon that warrant, when it reaches the hands of the treasurer thus authenticated, the treasurer draws his draft on the depository of the public money for payment. These forms have always been held to be very important checks, and indispensable preliminaries to any money being drawn out of the treasury, or in other words, paid by the depository of the public moneys. The secretary draws his warrant upon the treasurer, subject to the checks before mentioned, and then the treasurer draws upon the depository who is to make the payment. But, in no instance, does the secretary draw directly upon the depository, because that would be to lose the security of the intermediate checks of the comptroller and the register. By the 10th section of this bill, however, in contravention of these established principles and checks, it is expressly provided, that “for the purpose of payments on the public account, it shall be lawful for the said secretary to draw upon any of the said depositories, as he may think most conducive to the public interest, or to the convenience of the public creditors or both.” Under this provision the secretary of the treasury could draw out all the money in the treasury, or, which is the same thing, in the hands of the depositories, without any check whatsoever. The effect of it, whether so intended or not, is to place the whole public treasure at his unchecked and absolute disposal.

Now, sir, is not the effect of these various provisions, and of the whole scope and tenor of this bill, to concentrate, at last, the entire control of the public moneys, in the hands of the president; for the secretary of the treasury, and all the other fiscal officers are but his agents, appointed by him, and removable at his pleasure? But the senator from New York, (Mr. Wright,) contends that the president would have no more control over the public moneys under the proposed system, than if they were deposited in banks—that the same legal formalities must be gone through to touch the public moneys, in the one case, as in the other. It may be true, that the president has no more legal control over the public money in the one case than in the other; but has he not a greater practical control. In the one case, the depositories of the public money would be his agents, subject to his authority, the creatures of his will, dependent upon his pleasure for their continuance in office, and made by the peculiar provisions of this bill, as I have already shown, especially and habitually sensible of that dependence. In possessing so complete a control over the keepers of the public money, he would possess virtually a control over the public money itself. But, in the case of the employment of banks, the depositories of the public money are institutions not created by the president—not dependent on him for their continued existence:—on the contrary, they hold their charters, and the advantages they confer, from a distinct authority, to which they are at all times responsible and are thus guarded against any undue influences from other quarters, which might warp them from their integrity and their duties.

In making these remarks, sir, I speak in no spirit of captious jealousy, as to the highest executive trust of the government, or of its actual incumbent: but I speak in the spirit of the constitution, which anticipates the danger, and supposes the possibility of the abuse of power, and inculcates the necessity of guarding against it. The system organized by this bill is one of the most thorough centralization. It rides over the institutions of the states, prostrates their credit and usefulness, brings patronage and power to the general government, concentrates them in the hands of the executive, to whom it gives an unlimited control over the public moneys, and through the banking operations to be founded on them, an extensive and paramount influence upon the moneyed concerns of the whole country. It is fitting that such a system should be borrowed from France, the country whose institutions exhibit the most unqualified example extant of centralization—under which the capital has swallowed up the provinces, and Paris has become synonymous with France. But it is equally fitting that such a system should be resisted, to the last extremity, in this land of republican freedom, by all who are attached to the rights of the states—by all who are opposed to the enlargement of federal and executive power—and, by all who watch with jealousy, and view with alarm, every tendency to consolidation.

I will now, Mr. President, follow the senator from New York, (Mr. Wright,) in the remarks which he made on the comparative safety of the two systems proposed, for keeping and disbursing the public moneys. Although experience, the only safe arbiter, has long since settled this question, the honorable senator argued it as if it were still open to doubt, and made, I am free to admit, an exceedingly ingenious and plausible argument. He instituted a parallel between the two systems, in regard to the great leading points on which their safety is supposed to depend, and in each instance brought out a substantial equality. First, as to officers, he said it would be fair to presume that the officers of the government and the officers of the banks would be equally trust-worthy. Then, as to sureties, he said both the banks and the government officers are equally required to give sureties, if deemed necessary. So, likewise, as to vaults, the government officers, he said, are to be provided with vaults, as well as the banks. The only particular, then, in which the banks, as he alleged, could be supposed to present a better guarantee for the safety of the public funds, is that their capital stock is pledged for the reimbursement of the public moneys committed to them; but this advantage in favor of the banks, he very adroitly balanced by what he represented to be the risk of mingling the government funds with those of trading corporations. Now all this is very fair and plausible on the surface. But what is the fact—what is the testimony of experience?

While the honorable gentleman was running this parallel in theory between the two systems, there was a document lying on the table of the other house, which had run the same parallel on the surer foundations of practice. I allude to a recent report of the secretary of the treasury, in answer to a call of that house, at the extra session, made on the motion of an honorable friend of mine, (Mr. Garland, of Virginia,) containing a list of all “the receivers, collectors, or depositories of the public money, who are in default to the government, with the amount of their respective defaults, &c.” What, sir, does this document, which I now have before me, show? That the whole amount of balances due from banks, which are deemed unavailable, is a little more than one million of dollars, (1,047,649); and these balances go back to a period long past, when the extraordinary embarrassments, consequent on the war, involved banks and individuals in difficulties, beyond any former or subsequent example. In relation to the banks, which have been recently employed as depositories, it appears that they have either paid up all they owed the government, or are in the course of paying it up as called for by the wants of the public service, without any apprehension of default on their part, or availing themselves of the indulgence of the act passed at the late session of congress, have either secured, or are expected to secure satisfactorily, the payment of the whole balances due from them, according to the terms of that act. Only eleven of them, it appears, out of near ninety employed as depositories, have even asked indulgence, under the act here referred to, and but a single one of them has been ordered to be sued. Now, sir, when we look to the list of individual collectors and receivers—what do we see? An aggregate default of about three millions! and though some of the more recent balances appearing on that list, may be reduced by future collections, yet from the long standing of most of them, there is no reason to believe that the aggregate amount of the entire list will be affected, in any sensible degree, by these partial recoveries. It is to be remarked too, that this list does not include disbursing officers, “whose indebtedness” is stated by the secretary “to be very great,” and the actual losses by whom I showed, during the late session of congress, from a report of Mr. Crawford, to have “greatly exceeded” a million and a half of dollars, from 1789 to 1819, and by this time, have grown up, in all probability, to another aggregate sum of three millions! Neither does this list include officers of the post office department, among whom it was shown by official documents, at the last annual session of congress that there were as many as eighteen hundred and thirty-two defaulters! It is to be observed also, that this list is confined to public agents, “who were out of office on the 12th day of October, 1837.”

Now, sir, if the honorable senator from New York had taken the trouble to look at this document, before he made his speech, he might have saved himself the labor of a great deal of superfluous ingenuity. In contrasting the ingenuity of his argument with the blunt contradiction of facts which this document presents, I was strongly reminded of an anecdote I have often heard of the late venerable bishop Madison, of Virginia. That excellent prelate was also a profound philosopher, and much addicted to philosophizing. On one occasion, he undertook to explain why the shade of a lamp, almost in contact with the flame of the candle beneath, was not, in any degree, heated by it. This he did by a learned dissertation on the laws of caloric, and all the other scientific data which could be brought to bear on the subject. Having completely satisfied himself and the admiring audience which surrounded him, of the truth of his theory, he could not avoid, in the consciousness of his triumph, putting his hand on the lamp shade, which had been the subject of his disquisition, when an exclamation of acute pain disclosed the fact that his hand had been severely burnt in the application. Nature, thus, contradicted the philosopher, and, so, stubborn facts will sometimes confute the most astute logician. I cannot but think that if the honorable senator from New York at the close of his very ingenious argument, had laid his hand upon this document, he must have felt his fingers, at least, a little scorched.

Has the honorable senator forgotten the emphatic testimony, deduced from a careful collation of facts, borne by the present secretary of the treasury, only three years ago, to the superior safety of banks as depositories of the public money? Let me then, refresh his recollection by reading to him and the senate, an extract from the able report of that officer, made to congress, in December 1834, on the system of keeping and disbursing the public money. “It is a singular fact,” says the secretary, in praise of this description of public debtors, the selected banks, that there is not now due on deposits, from the whole of them which have now stopped payment, from the establishment of the constitution to the present moment, a sum much beyond what is now due to the United States from one mercantile firm that stopped payment in 1825 or 1826, and of whom ample security was required and supposed to be taken under the responsibility of an oath. If we include the whole present dues to the government from discredited banks, at all times and of all kinds, whether as depositories or not and embrace even counterfeit bills and every other species of unavailable funds in the treasury, they will not exceed what is due from two such firms." He then continues, "if our former small losses by them, (the banks,) in keeping and paying over the public revenue, under circumstances so very adverse, are compared with our large losses either in collecting or disbursing that revenue, their present safety seems to be as great as is consistent with the usual operations of the paper system, or with the credit which must always be entrusted by government, in some way or other, to agents, of some kind in keeping the public money. In considering their safety, it should be constantly recollected that the owners and managers of banks, when properly regulated by legislative provisions in their charters, are, like other individuals, interested to transact business securely; are desirous of making and not losing money; and that these circumstances, with the preference, in case of failure, belonging to depositors and holders of their bills over the stockholders, united with the security, if not priority, given to the government, render them, in point of safety, generally, much superior to individual agents of the United States."

If there be any fact, incontestably established in our history, and by the experience of all other governments, it is the superior safety of banks as depositories over any individual custody. The reason of it is obvious. The more complex organization of banks, the number of their officers acting as mutual checks on each other, the daily supervision to which they are subjected, their forms of doing business, all, furnish securities, which can never be had in case of the isolated possession of money by an individual, whatever responsibilities he may be bound by. And if a loss of the moneys committed to them should occur either by accident, fraud, or violence, the capital of the bank stands pledged for the security of the depositor. This is, after all, the only kind of security that can be relied on with confidence. If any gentleman will take the trouble to read the notes and remarks annexed to the various cases of default, presented in the document from the house of representatives to which I have referred, he will see how utterly worthless and illusory is the personal security on which we have heretofore relied. The instances in which any thing has been obtained from sureties, to make good the default of their principal, are like angel's visits—"few and far between." The general return is, "the securities insolvent," "conveyed away their property," "not found," "residence not known," or some other equally unavailable return.

In England and France, as well as here, this species of security has been found either nominal or mischievous; and in France it has for many years been wholly given up. The only kind of security that is recognized there, is like that which the banks give in the responsibility of their stock. Every person who receives an appointment, connected with the collection or disbursement of the revenue, is required, before he enters on the duties of his office, to deposit with the government, as security, an amount of money, proportioned to the probable amount of the public treasure that will pass through his hands. This money is held by the government as a guarantee for the faithful administration of the trust conferred, and forms, at the same time, a part of its financial resources on which it pays an interest of 4 per cent. till restored to the officer on his satisfactorily acquitting himself of his responsibilities, or till it be otherwise forfeited by his default. The moneys thus deposited with the government, by public officers, as guarantees for the faithful performance of their duties, are denominated cautionnements, and amount to a very large sum. I happen to have in my possession, the report made by the French minister of finance, count Chabrol, to the king, in March, 1830, from which it appears that the cautionnements on the first day of January of that year, amounted to the enormous sum of frs. 226,483,978 (two hundred and twenty-six millions, four hundred and eighty-three thousand, nine hundred and seventy-three francs,) at a time when the whole revenue of the kingdom did not exceed frs. 900,000,000 (nine hundred millions of francs.) Now, sir, if gentlemen mean to introduce here the system of individual depositories of the public moneys, let them be warned by the experience of the country from which they borrow that system that it can be made safe only by the precautionary device of cautionnements, the effect of which would be to give to the millionaires of our cities the monopoly of all fiscal employments.

But, sir, great as is the danger of heavy pecuniary losses to the government under this system, I regard even that as a trifle compared with the extensive demoralization it would produce in the country—by the temptation held out to speculation, to private cupidity, to political corruption, in the large sums of public money lying idle in the hands of the public officers.

I have now, Mr. President, gone through my objections to this bill on account of what it contains. I object to it also, and not less earnestly, on account of what it does not contain. It contains no provision for the relief of the country. It "takes no thought" for the public. It looks only to the ease and comfort of the government. The most urgent want of the country, the highest interest of all, is a speedy restoration of specie payments by the banks. Now, too, is the critical and decisive moment. The banks have been, hitherto, diligently and steadily curtailing their discounts and circulation, with a view to that resumption, till they have brought their business within such safe limits, that they might now easily resume with a little encouragement. But if they are once again let loose from these salutary bounds,—if, despairing of a general resumption, and yielding to the strong temptations of irredeemable issues, they should again expand, all hope will be lost of recalling them to a specie standard, and the disastrous reign of an inconvertible paper currency will be indefinitely prolonged. Now, then, is the moment to join in this great work of effecting a restoration of specie payments. But does this bill do anything towards its accomplishment? On the contrary, it does every thing it can to retard and obstruct it. In the run it would create on the banks for specie, both by the demand it makes of it for the uses of the government, and by the general discredit which the high example of the government would stamp on bank paper, it throws new and insurmountable obstacles in the way of resumption.

But the honorable senator from New York says that, the resumption of specie payments by the banks is no concern of this government—that it is exclusively an affair of the states and of the banks themselves—and we, who urge the necessity of promoting by every proper and practicable means, the accomplishment of this great object, are reproached with using an argument, which, he tells us, belongs to the friends of a national bank. Now, sir, I beg leave to say to the honorable senator that both reason and experience prove, that the only effectual means of preventing a national bank is to bring about a resumption of specie payments by the state banks, and that nothing is more directly calculated to lead to the re-establishment of a bank of the United States, than the course of those who would do nothing towards effecting that resumption. Let the honorable senator look back to that most instructive period, rich in lessons for the present times—the former suspension of specie payments by the banks from 1814 to 1817—and he will see that it was the unwillingness or the inability of the state banks then to resume specie payments, which alone led to the establishment of a national bank. Let him read the official correspondence of Mr. Dallas—the numerous reports and communications of that able and patriotic man, worthy of him and of the country—and he will find throughout, an explicit recognition of, and unvarying testimony to, this great truth—that if the state banks could have been induced more promptly to resume specie payments at that time, there would have been no occasion for a national bank, and that that institution would not have existed. The true means of preventing its re-establishment now, is by the instrumentality of the state banks, under the lead and encouragement of the government, to restore to the country a sound, convertible currency.

This government can and ought to aid in this great work. Its vast revenue power, and its pervading action, co-extensive with the whole union, give it means and influences which the states do not possess. It holds, indeed, through that power, a lever of the greatest efficacy, for controlling the entire currency of the country. Through its collections and disbursements, it can hold out inducements of the most influential character to sway the course of the banks. In the mode of conducting its receipts and payments, it has in its power to set an example of the most persuasive influence towards the restoration of general confidence. In a disturbed state of the currency like the present, these are powers to be exercised in a spirit of liberality and benignity—not of menace, denunciation or vengeance. The occasion demands the language of encouragement and support—not of severity and sternness. Look at the communications of Mr. Dallas and Mr. Crawford with the banks during the former suspension of specie payments, and it will be seen in what spirit the influence of the government was then exerted, and effectually exerted, in the end, to accomplish a return to specie payments. The banks were not then outlawed by the official press—they were not then put under the ban of the government—they were not then pursued as conspirators, but were treated as institutions having themselves a stake in the common weal, and with which the common interests of the whole country were identified. It will be edifying, for a moment, to look back to the manner in which the government then conducted its relations with the banks; and I must say that, if the exertions of the banks, generally, since the recent suspension of specie payments, to prepare themselves for a resumption by a steady and persevering curtailment of their business and profits, be compared with the course of the banks on the former occasion, in taking advantage of the suspension to enlarge their issues to a most extravagant extent, and in obstinately refusing to apply the valuable public stocks held by them to acquiring the ability to resume, the banks now are entitled, at least, to as much liberality and favor as were shown to them then.

By the joint resolution of April, 1816, which has been so often referred to, it was made the duty of the secretary of the treasury to take such measures as he should deem necessary to effect a collection of the revenue in gold and silver, treasury notes, or the notes of specie paying banks. In the discharge of this duty, Mr. Dallas very soon opened a correspondence with the state banks, to induce them to return to specie payments. In a circular which he addressed to them on the 22d of July, 1816, he used this language:

"From the state banks, a sincere and effectual exertion, in the common cause of restoring the legal currency, is certainly expected and required; but in return they will merit and receive the confidence of the treasury and of the national bank; the transfer of the public funds from the state banks to the national bank and its branches, will be gradual, and the notes of the state banks will be freely circulated by the treasury and the national bank."

In a preceding part of the same letter, he says—"The present opportunity is embraced to repeat the assurances which have been uniformly given and maintained, that this department feels the fiscal interests of the government, and the successful operations of the Bank of the United States, to be intimately connected with the credit and prosperity of the state banks."

Here we see the language of the government towards the banks was that of encouragement and confidence. They were assured, in advance, of the friendship, and even of the support, of the government, if they would faithfully co-operate in the common cause of restoring the legal currency.

The communications of Mr. Crawford, the able and distinguished successor of Mr. Dallas, were in the same spirit. You, Mr. President, and those who acted with you in those difficult times, will recollect that, although the joint resolution of April, 1816, indicated the 20th of February following, as the day for a general resumption of specie payments, the banks determined, in a convention held by them for the purpose of deliberating on the subject, not to resume till the 1st of July, 1817.—In order to induce them to change that determination, Mr. Crawford made a formal proposition to them that if they would resume on the 20th of February, the public money then in their vaults should not be transferred, at all, to the Bank of the United States, (constituted by its charter the general depository of the national funds) and that between that day and the 1st of July, no portion of the public money should be drawn from them for any purpose whatever, unless the necessities of the public service imperiously required it. I beg leave to read to the Senate the following extracts from his circular to the banks of 20th December, 1816 submitting that proposition:

"The means of the treasury to aid the operations of the banks in effecting a revolution in the state of the currency, so imperiously necessary to the public interest, are considered ample, and the strongest disposition exists to apply them, so as to produce the most beneficial results."

"In making the above proposition to the state banks, the strongest reliance is placed in their disposition to join in the effort necessary to relieve the community from the evils to which it has been subjected, by the disordered state of the circulation medium. It is confidently believed that the interests of the banks and of the community are not in opposition to each other, and that any sacrifice which the effort may cost them, will be compensated by the advantages and facilities which it is in the power of the treasury to afford them."

"The deep interest which the treasury has in the support of bank credit, and the connection it has with the Bank of the United States, would, independent of the known disposition of that institution to conciliate the state banks, be sufficient to protect them against an illiberal policy on its part."

In this communication, it will be perceived, that Mr. Crawford felt and avowed that the means the treasury, to aid in the restoration of specie payments were ample. He freely proffered that aid to the state banks—he not only made them the most liberal propositions for their own advantage, but he gave them a specific pledge of protection and support against any illiberal policy on the part of the Bank of the United States. An appeal thus urged to both the interests and patriotism of the state banks, could not fail to be effectual. It accomplished its object. The banks changed their original determination, and did resume specie payments on the 20th of February, 1817.

Now, sir, can any one doubt that if the same spirit had actuated the treasury department in its relations with the banks recently: if, especially, when a majority of the banks, represented in the bank convention, assembled in New York, in November last, manifested a strong desire to fix an early day for the resumption of specie payments, and were prevented from doing so only by the influence of a powerful and overshadowing institution—if, I say, sir, the treasury department had shown, on that occasion, the same dispositions which animated Mr. Crawford, in 1816, and had come forward and given assurances of support to that portion of the banks, who were anxious to return to specie payments, against the "illiberal policy" of the Bank of the United States, can there be a doubt that at this moment, we should be in sight of a fixed period for the termination of the present calamitous and disordered state of the currency. But, unfortunately, the policy has been to stand entirely aloof from the banks, after having contributed, it is admitted on all hands, by the measures of the government, in some one or other of its branches, to the embarrassments by which they were overthrown. No aid, no encouragement has been given—not even a voice of cheering has been uttered amid the general distress. On the contrary, odium and prejudice have been extensively invoked through the press, at least, to render more complete that want of confidence, which is the sole obstacle to the re-establishment of both the credit and ability of the banks. And now, in the sequel, comes this fatal sub-treasury bill to deal them the last blow in their prostrate condition. The great interests of the country, connected with the restoration of the credit of the banks, and of the currency which they supply, have been overlooked or unappreciated; and the whole object seems to have been to devise some plan by which the government could, in future, get along in the smoothest way—by which it could be relieved from those responsibilities, and protected from that "shower of imputations" in the discharge of its duties which the honorable senator from New York, (Mr. Wright,) so pathetically deprecates.

What, then, I would ask, are governments instituted for, if it is not to meet difficulties in the public cause—to meet and overcome them—to encounter responsibilities—to endure a shower of imputations, yea, "the pelling of the pitiless storm," if duty to the country demand it. And an able man and a patriot need not repine at these trials of his virtue and talents. The ultimate gratitude of his country will ever be in proportion to the temporary injustice he may sustain by the bitterness of enemies or the persecutions of faction. How enviable, at this moment, the fame of Mr. Crawford, than whom no man, in his day, encountered more responsibilities by the bold and fearless manner in which he met the duties of his station, or sustained more unfounded imputations. But truth has triumphed over prejudice and error, and he now lives, and will forever live, in the grateful memory of his country. This desire to avoid difficulties and their attendant responsibilities, founded, as I think I have shown it to be, in mistake as to the true interests of public men, is the source of still greater calamities to the country. It is the natural parent, strange as it may seem at first sight, of all schemes of strong government; and is not unsuitably avowed by the honorable senator from New York, as a consideration in favor of a measure, the effect of which, in my humble judgment, would be to render this republican government of ours one of the strongest on the face of the earth. On this subject, sir, I beg leave to read to the senate the remarks of the profoundest observer, perhaps, of human affairs, that ever lived. They are full of instruction, and cannot be too well weighed by public men. In speaking of the national assembly of France, Burke makes use of these words:

"Their purpose every where seems to have been to evade and slip aside from difficulty. This it has been the glory of the great masters, in all the arts, to confront and overcome; and when they had overcome the first difficulty, to turn it into an instrument for new conquests over new difficulties." "This amicable conflict with difficulty obliges us to an intimate acquaintance with our object, and compels us to consider it in all its relations. It will not suffer us to be superficial. It is the want of nerves for such a task; it is the fondness for short cuts and fallacious facilities, that has, in so many parts of the world, created governments with arbitrary powers." "It is this unwillingness to wrestle with difficulty which has obliged the national assembly of France to commence their schemes of reform with abolition and total destruction."

The disposition to evade difficulty, the policy of short cuts, we are told by this great master of political wisdom, has, in every part of the world, "created governments with arbitrary powers," and was what in France led the national assembly "to commence their schemes of reform with abolition and total destruction." Now, sir, if this had been specially written for our warning, and with express reference to the question before us, it could not have been more apposite or more instructive.—Every summary invention, in a free country, suggested by the ease of government, however intended, will be found, at last, to carry with it the deepest dangers to the liberties and happiness of the people. The honorable senator from New York, too, should remember that it was to him who should untie, and not to him who should cut the Gordian knot, that the ancient oracle promised the glories of empire. The first is the achievement of skill and industry, and its fruits are peace, liberty and happiness. The second is the achievement of power, and its result is the establishment of power. Let the honorable senator from New York untie the knot, by leading the banks to a resumption of specie payments, (as I am sure, by proper means, he could easily do,) and not cut it by the sub-treasury scheme, and I will be among the first to award him the civic wreath. With Mr. Jefferson, in his memorable letter to Mr. Madison, while the federal constitution was under consideration, I say, "I am no friend to strong government. It is always oppressive. It puts the governors at their ease, but at the expense of the people." Here lies the fatal objection to the sub-treasury scheme. It puts the "governors at their ease," but is dangerous and "oppressive," to the people.

What system of policy, then, it will be asked, would I pursue? The same great authority, whose words I have already quoted, says, "a good patriot and a true politician will always consider how to make the most of the existing materials of his country." This is the foundation principle on which I would build. Experience has shown, in the language used by the present secretary of the treasury, in 1834, that banks are the most "responsible, safe, convenient and economical" fiscal agents for the government. The state banks are institutions now existing. I would "make the most" of them for the public service. There is no national banking institution in existence; and the condition of the country, already surcharged with banks, the state of public opinion, the known sentiments and pledges of those charged with the public administration, all conspire to render it very unlikely that there will be any such institution at least for years to come. I say farther—in my humble opinion, there ought to be no such institution; first, because there is no constitutional authority to create it, and secondly, because its political dangers, in any form in which it has heretofore existed, have been found to more than counterbalance its supposed advantages in other respects. Then, as to the sub-treasury scheme, it is a novelty utterly unknown to our laws and usages, which could not be brought into existence without violating all the habitudes of our people, deranging the operations of business, and hazarding the most cherished principles of our political institutions. What, then, ought to be done? Recur to the "existing materials of the country," the state banks,—"make the most" of them for the convenience of the government; as well as for the general good—reform their abuses, correct their defects and adopt every precaution which may be necessary to ensure their fidelity and efficiency.

These institutions, it is true, have recently, in common with every other interest in the country and with the whole commercial world, been subjected to serious embarrassments. All agree, however, though differing as to the particular causes which produced them, that those embarrassments have been the result of very peculiar and extraordinary circumstances. The banks, too, which were employed as the depositories and fiscal agents of the government, have, for the most part, amid circumstances of the greatest difficulty, actually discharged all their engagements to the government, enormously heavy, as they were, in consequence of the large surplus revenue; or the few who have not yet done so, have satisfactorily secured the comparatively small balances due from them, to be paid at short periods, according to an indulgence voluntarily granted to them by Congress. The past, therefore, candidly considered, furnishes no ground against the renewed employment of the state banks as fiscal agents of the government. Experience may have, and doubtless, has, disclosed defects and errors in the particular plan upon which they have been heretofore employed. Correct, then, those errors—supply those defects—but do not reject their employment altogether. This, sir, is the general principle on which I have bottomed the proposition I have submitted as a substitute for the bill reported by the honorable senator from New York, and I will now proceed to explain, in detail, those provisions of the substitute which distinguish it from the state bank deposit system as heretofore organized.

It is now generally acknowledged that one of the principal circumstances which contributed to embarrass the operations of the late deposit system, was the large number of banks employed as depositories,—amounting, in the end, I believe, to near ninety. This increase of number, in part, was rendered necessary by that provision in the act of June, 1836, which required that, where the amount of public deposits, in any bank, exceeds three-fourths of its capital actually paid in, the surplus should be transferred to some other bank. In the execution of the act, however, (from considerations which I am not able to explain,) there was a still farther increase in the number of depositories, no called for by the requirements of this provision.—It is obvious how the whole play of the machinery must have been weakened and obstructed by this needless complexity of its parts. I am satisfied that twenty banks, judiciously selected and properly located, would be competent to do the whole business of the treasury department, with much less danger of embarrassment to the banks, and a far more easy and effectual supervision on the part of the secretary. The substitute, therefore, provides that the number of banks to be employed as public depositories, shall, in no case, exceed twenty-five, to be chosen from among the most solid and respectable banks in the respective states, and their location, as well as number, to be determined solely with reference to the wants and convenience of the treasury in conducting its fiscal operations.

The substitute also proposes an important change in the mode of selecting the deposit banks. Heretofore they were chosen by the secretary of the treasury, at his will and pleasure alone. This sole agency of the executive will, in designating the depositories of the public money, exposed the late system to a suspicion of favoritism and a want of confidence in general, which greatly impaired its moral force, and admitted a possibility of abuses, which, it is certainly proper, should be guarded against. It was this which caused it to be characterized as the pet-bank system. I propose to divest it of this character by subjecting the selection of the secretary of the treasury, in every case, to the supervision and control of congress. If the selection be made during the session of congress, it is to be immediately submitted for the approval of the two houses—if, during the recess, it is to be laid before them at the commencement of the next session, to be in like manner confirmed or annulled by them. The effect of this provision will be to bring every thing, relating to the public moneys, under the direct and efficient control of the representatives of the people and the states, and in so delicate and important a matter, to leave as little as possible to executive discretion.

Another leading provision in the substitute is one which requires the deposit banks to have weekly settlements with the banks, in their vicinity, with which they have business transactions, and to call for balances in specie, whenever and to whatever extent it may be necessary to check over-issues and to preserve the soundness of the currency. In the adoption of this practice by the late Bank of the United States, consisted its boasted power and influence as a regulator of the currency. There is no reason why the same salutary control should not be exercised by the deposit banks, and with even greater effect, inasmuch as their aggregate capital and presumed amount of transactions with other banks, would, no doubt, exceed those of the late national bank. It will be perceived from the terms of this provision in the substitute, that it is not contemplated to enjoin on the deposit banks a fixed and inexorable requisition of balances from the other banks in specie, under all circumstances whatever; for considering the large balances that would be habitually accumulated by them against the other banks in the process of collecting the public revenue, such a requisition would be destructive in many cases, to institutions of unquestionable soundness. It is contemplated, therefore, that this power should be exercised under proper safe-guards, and only to the extent that may be necessary to restrain imprudences or excesses, endangering the general currency. It was to this extent only, as I have shown in a previous part of these remarks, that the power was exercised by the late Bank of the United States.

The substitute likewise makes it the duty of the secretary of the treasury to use his influence to bring about an arrangement, (as no doubt is entertained he could do,) among the several deposit banks to receive and credit as cash the notes of each other in payment of the public revenue, wherever so tendered. The effect of this arrangement would be to put the notes of the deposit banks practically on the same footing as the branch notes of the late Bank of the United States—everywhere receivable in payment of public dues, and enjoying, consequently, a general credit and circulation throughout the nation. It would give to the country, to a great extent, the advantages of a uniform paper currency, as the preceding provision would secure to it a sound one; and the two together, in supplying, practically, the benefits promised by a national bank, would supersede the strongest arguments now urged in favor of such an institution.

In regard to the kinds of money, in which the public revenue is to be collected, the substitute adopts, with slight modifications, the provision of the currency bill of the last session of congress.—It declares that the public dues, of every description, for lands as well as customs, shall be received in gold or silver, or treasury notes, or such notes of specie-paying banks, (under certain restrictions intended to promote the suppression of small notes,) as the deposit banks, subject to the supervision and control of the secretary of the treasury, shall agree to credit to the United States as cash. It will be perceived that in the proposition now submitted, I have postponed for one year the exclusion of the notes of banks which issue bills or notes under five dollars. It is known that many of the states authorize notes under that denomination; and some, who have heretofore prohibited them, will, it is supposed, authorize the issuing of them under existing circumstances, and for a limited period. It is evident that the use of this description of notes, in supplying the place of, and consequently diminishing the demand for, specie in small dealings, would tend materially to facilitate the resumption of specie payments by the banks. This consideration has induced me, under the peculiar circumstances of the times, to adjourn for one year the period for excluding the notes of banks issuing bills or notes under five dollars; and the same consideration has prevailed with me, for the present, to limit the farther exclusion of bank notes to the issues of such banks as shall, after the expiration of two years, continue to issue bills or notes under ten dollars. In doing this, under the exigencies of the times, I wish to be understood as not abandoning my original opinion, (which remain unchanged,) in favor of extending the prohibition of small notes ultimately to all under the denomination of twenty dollars.

Finally, the substitute, in furtherance of the great policy of fixing a period to the present disastrous reign of irredeemable paper, provides that after the last day of July next, the notes of no bank which shall not then have bona fide resumed specie payments, shall, at any time thereafter, be received in payment of the public dues. This, in connection with the liberal provisions made by the substitute, in other respects, for re-establishing the credit of convertible bank paper, will, I am persuaded, bring about a general resumption of specie payments at the time designated. The mere fixation of a day by congress will exercise a powerful moral influence; and not the less so, as the day fixed corresponds with that indicated by a majority of the banks in the bank convention held in New York in November last.

These, Mr. President, are the leading provisions of the measure I have submitted, which distinguish it from the system heretofore adopted for the employment of state banks as depositories of the public money. In many respects, they make of it a new system, obviating some of the strongest objections which have been hitherto urged against it, providing new guards against abuses and containing new provisions for extending its usefulness and efficiency. Under an able and not unfriendly direction, I feel every confidence that it would meet both the wants of the government and the wishes of the country.

I shall, doubtless, be asked what arrangement I propose in regard to the banks discounting on the public deposits. There is no absolute interdiction of their doing so, in the measure I propose, (for to this, I think, I shall be able to show there are insuperable obstacles,) but it carefully withdraws the stimulus to the use of that power which has heretofore been applied, and it moreover furnishes a positive security, of an important character, against the excessive use of it. It will be recollected by the senate that the law of June, 1836, which organized the late deposit system, (besides requiring of the banks very important and onerous services,) required them to pay an interest of two per cent. on all the public deposits in their possession exceeding one-fourth of their capital actually paid in. Now, this not merely authorized, but compelled the banks to discount on the public moneys, whether they willed it or not, in order to enable them to pay the interest charged. It was a stimulus administered by the government to the use of the power. This stimulus, this compulsion rather, I propose to withdraw by repealing that clause of the law of 1836, which charged the banks interest on the public moneys; for the important services to be rendered by them as fiscal agents of the government, are the fair and proper equivalent of any legitimate advantage to be incidentally derived by them from the custody of the public moneys.

In the limitation of the number of deposit banks to twenty-five, as proposed by the measure I have had the honor to submit, there is an important security against the public deposits being made the basis of bank discounts, to any great extent. It must not be forgotten that the charters of all the state banks fix a general limit beyond which they are not permitted to extend their discounts. That limit is, I believe, ordinarily twice, or twice and a half, the amount of their capitals paid in. As the public depositee, under the measure I propose, would be confined to twenty-five banks, it is evident that they could not be used, to any great extent, (relatively to their amount,) by those banks to enlarge their discounts, before they would encounter an impassable barrier in the limit of their charters. This, it is well known, occurred in several cases, (particularly in New York,) under the operation of the late system, notwithstanding the greater number of banks then employed as depositories; and in those cases, authority was given to the banks which had thus exhausted their chartered power of discounting on the public deposits, to turn over the surplus, on which they could no longer discount under the limitations of their charters, to other banks, that they might discount upon them. To any arrangements of this sort for multiplying bank discounts on the public deposits, the measure I have submitted would oppose an insuperable obstacle, as it inflexibly fixes, under all circumstances whatever, the number of banks to be employed as depositories of the public moneys; and in fixing that number at twenty-five, the salutary charter limitation upon the power of discounting, would, as I have just shown, soon be brought into action to prevent excess by them.

I think, therefore, Mr. President, that under the provisions of the substitute I have proposed for the consideration of the senate, there would be no danger of any unreasonable extension of discounts on the public deposits. I know, however, there are gentlemen of great intelligence and patriotism, who are for an absolute prohibition of the banks discounting, to any extent, however moderate, on the public deposits, and who favor, as the means of carrying out that prohibition, a system of special deposits. The high respect I entertain for the opinions of those gentlemen has induced me to consider their suggestion, with more than ordinary anxiety to come to the same conclusions; but after thorough examination and reflection, according to the best lights of my understanding, I am satisfied that no system of special deposits, however specious in theory, could be worked out in practice, without involving consequences which they themselves, (or at least, a large majority of them,) would promptly repudiate. In the first place, it is demonstrable, I humbly conceive, that any system of special deposits, to be practically and efficient, must lead to a collection of the revenue, directly or indirectly, in specie; and this they oppose as earnestly as I do. The government must always hold itself ready to pay its creditors in the lawful currency of the country, if demanded. This the banks are bound to do, on behalf of the government, under the general deposit system. But if you adopt the special deposit system and collect the revenue, at the same time, in bank notes, the banks would be bound to pay out to the public creditor only the identical notes deposited with them; for this is the fundamental and immutable idea of a special deposit. How, then, would such a system work? The public creditor would present his warrant to a deposit bank—the bank would offer him, in payment, first this note and then that, which had been special deposited with it; but none of these notes suiting the convenience of the creditor, and the bank being bound to pay no other, the public claimant would go unpaid, and the engagements of the government be dishonored. To avoid the danger of such a result, the government, if it adopted a system of special deposits, would be driven, of necessity, to a collection of the revenue in gold and silver; or, otherwise receiving the notes of specie-paying banks pro forma, collect the specie for them from the banks by which they were issued, and place that specie on special deposit. But where would be the difference, in the practical effects on the banks and the business and interests of the community connected with them, between collecting the revenue, in the first instance, in gold and silver, and collecting it in the notes of specie-paying banks, to be converted into gold and silver by demand upon the banks? The honorable senator from New York (Mr. Wright) expressed the opinion, that the latter mode of operation would be the harshest; and when it is considered that this periodical conversion of bank notes would be in large masses, and attended, consequently, with periodical and distressing contractions of the currency, I cannot but agree with him. At all events, there are but these two modes of working out a special deposit system in practice, and neither the one nor other, it seems to me, can be made acceptable to those who oppose the sub-treasury scheme, on account of its tendency to create two currencies in the country—gold and silver for the government—paper for the people.

There are subsidiary objections to this special deposit system, which, although not of so much weight as that which I have just stated, cannot be overlooked in a just and comprehensive estimate of it. If you adopt it, you renounce, at once, all means of engaging the interests and enlisting the co-operation of the banks to carry out any of those reforms in the paper currency, which have heretofore been so favorite an object of the policy of the country. You must also pay them, and pay them, too, no inconsiderable sum for their services to the government, and thus abandon one of the strong grounds (that of economy,) on which bank agency has heretofore been preferred to individual agency, in conducting the operations of the treasury.

But, to take up the subject in a more enlarged view, is there any valid reason why banks should not be permitted to discount, to a moderate extent, on average balances of public money in their possession, as well as on individual deposits? Wherever banks exist, to receive deposits, public or private, is a regular branch of their business? and to discount upon the average balances of those deposits, which experience shows are not likely to be drawn out by the depositors, in as legitimate and acknowledged an operation of banking as to discount upon their capitals. Is it not for the interest of all that this should be done—that no portion of the national capital should be annihilated by being locked up from use, but that the whole should be made tributary, in some way or other, to the invigoration and support of the national industry? No just distinction can be shown, in this respect, between public and private deposits. Accordingly, in all countries where banks exist, and where the public moneys are deposited in those institutions, deposits of that kind have been invariably recognized, within proper limits, as a perfectly legitimate source of discounts and accommodation to the community. It is admitted that it has been uniformly the case in this country, in regard to the public funds both of the general government and of the states, from the adoption of the constitution down to the present day. What new light, then, has broken in upon us, that we are, all at once, grown so much wiser than our fathers? In England, the practice is, and has been invariably the same; and here I take upon me to confront a statement which I have repeatedly seen made to the contrary—to wit, that the balances of the public moneys in the hands of the Bank of England were not discounted upon, but were regularly and habitually applied to the purchase of exchequer bills, on behalf of the government. The fact is otherwise—the Bank of England has the use of these balances, for banking purposes; and this use of them is so well understood and avowed that in some instances where the balances have risen to a very great amount (as, for a series of years after 1806, they did to between £11,000,000 and £12,000,000, equal to near $60,000,000 of our money,) the bank has been required to pay a special compensation to the government for that use. But the ordinary balances of public money in the Bank of England range from 4,000,000 to 5,000,000 pounds sterling—about twenty millions of dollars of our money—the use of which is permitted to the bank without any compensation. In like manner, the balances of public money in France, which are occasionally transferred to the Bank of France, are permitted to be used as a source of extended discounts, and I am informed by an enlightened correspondent in that country were actually so used to the great relief of industry and trade, during the late commercial crisis.

Shall a less beneficent use be made of the public moneys, not called for by the necessities of the government, in this republic of ours, than in the monarchies of Europe? Shall we alone, of all the great family of modern civilized communities, revert to the barbarous practice of hoarding (and that, too, in specie) the occasional surpluses, which, from the nature of our revenue system, can neither be foreseen nor guarded against? A most able and eloquent friend in the other house (Mr. Legare) has justly characterised the process of taxation as a species of confiscation. It is so, sir. Is it not incumbent upon us, then, when by so harsh a process, we have undesignedly levied upon the people more than is necessary for the wants of the government, to mitigate the exaction as much as possible by restoring the overplus to their use through the channels of business and commerce. Why should the government play the dog in the manger, neither using its idle hoards itself, nor permitting any body else to use them. Efforts have been made to render the practice of discounting upon the public deposits odious, by representing it as a thing for the benefit of the banks alone. But is it so? Does not every class of the community experience the benefit, and none more so than the great agricultural class, the price of whose products depends mainly on the facilities of sound credit, and the abundance of active capital diffused among the merchants—the more immediate customers of the banks?

It has been sometimes said, also, that the practice of discounting on the public deposits adds to the fluctuations of the currency. But the reverse is demonstrably true. When a large amount of revenue is collected by the government, and is neither disbursed in the public service, nor returned to the community through the medium of discounts, a sudden and distressing contraction of the currency necessarily ensues. If, however, that portion of the public money, not required for the public service, is permitted to be used in the way of discounts for short periods, by the banks, the circulation, through the double process of government disbursements and bank issues, is maintained at an uniform level, without sensible contraction or expansion. The banks being enabled to foresee at what period the funds issued by them will be required for occasions of public expenditure, call them in as they are wanted for disbursement—what is drawn in by the hand of the banks, is immediately let out by the hand of the government—and thus the current of circulation is kept steady and full.

These truths have, until lately, been universally felt and acknowledged; and by none more emphatically, or with greater weight of authority than the distinguished individual "in whose footsteps" the present administration was expected to tread. It is, doubtless, recollected by the senate, that, on the occasion of the removal of the deposits from the Bank of the United States, president Jackson, in the able and memorable paper which he presented to his cabinet, stated that the funds thus removed were not to be "annihilated"—that they "would be again issued for the benefit of trade" by the institutions to which they were transferred. This was, then, considered a trait of liberal, beneficent, and statesmanlike policy, on which the chief magistrate and his act were triumphantly sustained and vindicated by his friends before the people. The same distinguished individual, in his very last message to congress, declared "it was contrary to the genius of our free institutions to lock up in vaults the treasure of the nation." Now, the highest ambition of statesmanship seems to be to contrive these selfsame "vaults," in which the funds of the nation are to be sent to their "long repose," as "dead men's bones;" for once there, all that remain, beyond the wants of the government, are to be buried, annihilated, destroyed, to every purpose of useful existence. What has produced these sudden and singular revolutions of policy and doctrine? Is it because an extraordinary and accidental state of things, the result of peculiar and anomalous causes, has involved the banks, individuals, and the government, in temporary embarrassment? Then I say nothing is more unsafe than for statesmen to found general and permanent rules of policy on isolated and exceptional cases. We must look to the habitual and ordinary course of human affairs, collect from them the average results of experience and observation, and guide our action by those results. Because the Commonwealth's Bank of Massachusetts has failed, because it suits the purpose even of grave senators to use it daily as a stalking-horse on this floor, are we to be "frighted from our propriety," and, therefore, distrust and denounce the whole banking system of the country? Are we to take advantage of temporary and factitious excitements, to get up and foster a popular prejudice against banks as a fund for political speculation, at the expense of all the "sober realities of life" and the practical, pervading, home-bred, interests of the country.

As I said, on a former occasion, Mr. President, I stand here as no advocate of the banks. I have not the slightest interest in, nor connection with, them, direct or indirect, present or prospective. I am as sensible as any man of the dangers and abuses to which they are liable, and I will go, hand in hand, with any man in devising securities against the one, and applying correctives to the other. But as a practical legislator and patriot, I am bound to look to the actual interests of society; and in that view, I cannot fail to see that any violent shock given to the established system of business and credit in the country must produce a wide-spread scene of confusion and distress, involving, in its destructive visitation, every class of the community.

In offering the measure I have submitted to the senate, I have discharged what I consider to be my duty to the country. That country is now in a state of suffering and distress, aggravated by deep anxieties and apprehensions in regard to the future. The measure I propose would, I firmly believe, give relief for the present and hope for the future. It could not fail to restore confidence, and in doing that, to revive the languishing energies of trade, to quicken the labors and the hopes of the husbandman, the manufacturer, and the mechanic, to raise enterprise again upon its feet, and above all, to put an end to that unnatural and suicidal war, which, for the last eighteen months, has grown up between the government of the country; and its business and industry. In presenting such a measure, I cannot but regret that I shall be deprived of the support of many members of this body with whom I have lately stood, side by side, in upholding and defending the principles on which it rests. My consolation, however, is that I stand now where I stood then. On the other hand, the measure they bring forward and patronize is one which, three years ago, we all united in opposing, and which was then denounced, in the name of the administration and its friends, as a "dangerous enlargement of executive power, and putting into its hands the means of corruption." This measure cannot have changed its character by mere efflux of time; and thinking of it now as I thought of it then, I still oppose it.

In taking this course, I know full well, Mr. President, I am to incur the anathemas of party. But I can never forget that I have a country to serve, as well as a party to obey. "Thine Rome demands our help;" and for one she shall have mine, according to the humble measure of my abilities and the best lights of my understanding. The zealots of both parties may denounce and condemn me, as they have heretofore denounced and condemned me; but sustained by the consciousness of upright intentions and a faithful devotion to the interests of my country, I shall hold my course unflinching; and even with the terror before my eyes of sinking into that small minority of which the honorable senator from New York, (Mr. Wright,) so charitably warned us, I shall yet, animated by sense of duty, "find in my soul one drop of patience."

TWENTY-FIFTH CONGRESS.

SECOND SESSION—SENATE.

March 9. After several petitions had been presented and referred and a number of reports made, The senate held a short executive session.

The resolution offered by Mr. Wright, calling for information with a view to equalize the compensation of clerks in the departments, was taken up, and agreed to.

The bill making appropriations for the revolutionary and other pensioners for the year 1838 was considered, ordered to be engrossed, and by consent, read a third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. Tipton, the committee on the public lands were instructed to allow the state of Indiana to re-locate certain lands for the purposes of internal improvement.

The bill supplementary to the act to amend the judiciary system of the United States was taken up, farther considered, and again laid on the table.

On motion of Mr. White, the senate reconsidered the vote adopting the resolution offered by Mr. Niles, calling for information relative to the conduct of the Metropolis bank of this district as a fiscal agent.

On motion of Mr. Tallmadge, this resolution was modified so as to make the enquiries still more particular and complete, and it was then readopted.

Mr. Rives presented the proceedings of a meeting in Virginia relative to the late duel. Laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

The senate resumed the consideration of the sub-treasury bill.

Mr. Bayard concluded his remarks in opposition to the bill.

Mr. Morris spoke on the subject generally, being opposed to the bill in its present form, but in favor of it with certain modifications.

On motion of Mr. Calhoun, who expressed his desire to speak to-morrow,

The senate adjourned.

March 10. The following petitions, &c. were presented, and referred.

By Mr. McKean: A memorial from the commissioners of the Girard estate on behalf of the city of Philadelphia, setting forth "that the city of Philadelphia, under the will of the late Stephen Girard, is the owner of a large tract of land in the state of Louisiana, held under a Spanish grant," and praying congress to pass an act authorizing the ascertainment of the validity of the title as against the United States, by proceeding in such court as congress may select. Referred to the judiciary committee.

By Mr. Buchanan: From a citizen of Philadelphia, on the subject of the currency, proposing a plan for a national bank, the stock to be owned by the different States, in the proportion of their delegation in the house of representatives; the drafts to be endorsed by the respective states, and become the currency of the country; the capital at first to be $70,000,000, afterwards to be increased to $150,000,000, and then to increase at the rate of two per cent. per annum. Mr. B. said the plan was ingenious, though he was not convinced of its expediency. Ordered to be printed.

A number of private bills were ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. Davis, on leave, introduced a bill authorizing the purchase, by the United States, of a piece of land within the limits of the navy yard, at Charlestown, Massachusetts. Read twice and referred.

The senate resumed the consideration of the sub-treasury bill.

Mr. Calhoun rose and spoke nearly two hours in reply to the speech of Mr. Clay, delivered on the 19th ult.—chiefly in defence of his own political course and consistency, and incidentally on the character and merits of the questions on which he had been called upon to act during his public career.

Mr. Clay rejoined at considerable length in support of the positions taken, and the opinions expressed by him in the speech referred to, in regard to Mr. Calhoun's political course.

Mr. Preston made some remarks, in reply to Mr. Clay, on the subject of nullification, and in defence of the course of South Carolina in that regard.

Mr. Clay and Mr. Calhoun continued the debate in alternate reply and rejoinder until half past 5 o'clock; when, on motion of Mr. Webster,

The senate adjourned.

March 12. A message was received from the president of the United States, through Mr. A. Van Buren, his private secretary.

After several petitions, &c. had been presented,

Mr. Crittenden rose, he said, to present to the senate certain resolutions of the legislature of Kentucky, condemnatory of the course of the late and present administrations in relation to the currency, and especially of the sub-treasury bill, and he would accompany the performance of this duty, with a few remarks.

These resolutions, said Mr. C. express the opinions of the state of Kentucky on the course of measures pursued for several years past by the general government, on the present derangement of the currency and distresses of the country, and they take particular notice of the great measure now before congress and the public, called the sub-treasury system, and against this they express their decided opposition, and the decided and earnest desire of that state to prevent its passage. I have been indulged by the senate with an opportunity on a former occasion to express my sentiments on this subject, and I shall not now repeat them; but on this occasion it becomes me to express, what I do with the utmost cordiality, my entire sympathy and accordance with the sentiments here expressed, one and all, of the state which I in part represent, and with them I would prevent the passage of this measure as one not only injurious and dangerous to the institutions of the country, but deeply dangerous to the spirit of liberty.

Mr. President, if we look at the intrinsic merit or demerit of this measure, it resolves itself into elements of high and momentous import. But if the intrinsic propriety of it is questionable in itself, I beg leave to call the attention of the senate to a principle involved in carrying forward this measure; and it is the principle of that sort of deference which we owe to the public will, and which lies at the foundation of all our institutions. By this I do not mean every accidental flash and flourish of the public mind, but I mean its deliberate judgment and opinion, brought to bear on the conduct and opinions of the public servants; and I beg the senate to give their attention to this state of the case; and I ask every fair and candid man, have not the people signified that the law and constitution of the country are invaded? The subject of this measure has long engaged the public discussion, feeling, and judgment, and has long excluded from the public contemplation almost every thing else, as unworthy of their regard. What has been the result of this inquiry, and what the verdict of this great nation on this great question? Was there ever a decision more decided on any question in the history of this government? And in this estimate I do not take into the account the expressed opinions of private assemblies, the private remonstrances against this measure presented to this body, not even the voluminous protest against it from nearly 9,000 legal voters of New York city; but I speak of the solemn acts of the legislative assemblies of whole states; and I ask those who profess a deference for the public will, how they can neglect this loud, solemn, and imperative voice of remonstrance?

What are the states that have felt it their duty, by the emergency of this great question, to pronounce the decision of their respective people against this measure? Here, first in wealth, resources, and population, comes the great state of New York; she is against it. Pennsylvania, slow, majestic, and considerate, in announcing her opinions, is also advancing to the rescue or the country from this measure. And here is little Rhode Island, with all her business, talents, and sagacity. New Jersey, Ohio, and Tennessee, have also come forward; and now I see in this bright array the state of Kentucky. Are all these to be neglected? Are they entitled to no deference in this strong expression of their opinions, even when they speak in the national councils? How stands the case in the other house? There 121 representatives have been instructed by their respective legislatures to vote against this measure, composing nearly one-half of the whole house. And let me call your attention to those states that have not sent such instructions, but which, from their known sentiments, undoubtedly concur in those instructions. Here is Maryland, in our immediate neighborhood; and what are her sentiments? They are against the measure, and every one knows it; and if they have not been expressed, it is simply because she supposes that all the world knows them already. She is on the side of the protestants. And Indiana, let her two senators speak for her; one of whom is a friend of the administration and is yet against this measure. She, too, is among the protestants. Old Massachusetts, she also is here, and speaks in a voice that needs no aid of mine. Vermont is in the same ranks, and little Delaware, not least in talent and intelligence. Add these to the states that have actually protested against this measure, and it makes 154 representatives in the other house, being a majority of 66 in the whole.

Here, sir, is no argument. These are facts worth a thousand arguments. And supposing this measure were intrinsically ever so wise, can it be right to force it on an unwilling people? Are we to do the people good against their will? It is the tyrant's example. All usurpations of power have ever been made and exercised under the pretence of doing good against the common will and the common judgment. But it is a sentiment utterly abhorrent to the genius of this government.

And, now, what have you to oppose to this mass of evidence, that this measure is contrary to the will and judgment of the people? Where are the states that are in favor of it? On that side is a powerful administration, with a long career of power before it; and this administration is staked on this measure as the very point on which its existence is turned. To be or not to be, is the question which it has involved in the success or failure of this measure. It has exerted its power and influence to bring over the country; and after all what states are in favor of it? It has been said that kings seldom won in vain; and this may be said of our presidents.

This occasion called forth the exercise of courting and wooing, and yet what has been the result? South Carolina is the only state that has come forward to express her opinion in favor of the measure. Attempts have been made in other states, but nowhere else have resolutions of approbation been carried. Here and there an officeholder takes his cap in his hand and huzzas for the sub-treasury; but is this any evidence of the public will and judgment in its favor?

We have all this evidence, not from excited public meetings, but from legislative bodies, speaking in deliberate and solemn council. And yet you are going on recklessly to force this measure upon the country. Sir, you have no right so to force it; the nation claims the right of judgment, and unless we have the right to act against the known will of the people, we have no right to force even a good measure upon them.

Do you indulge the idle hope that the people will acquiesce in this measure matured and carried into effect, to which in its incipency they manifest so great aversion? No, sir, no, sir. If the hills and valleys of the country are already reverberating with the voice of remonstrance and opposition, pass this bill, and it is no longer a question of relief and expediency, but a question of liberty. This measure will be regarded as an insult added to the ruin of their business, the derangement of the currency, and the infliction of great and general distress; and, under such an insult, they will never be silent.

Sir, you already know my judgment and opinion of this measure as injurious and dangerous to the public prosperity and the public liberty. But, as passed also in opposition to the public will, it rises far higher in its malignant aspect, and involves a principle deep and momentous, on which the government itself is founded. You are disregarding thus the public voice, strong and decided, though the influence and patronage of the government are operating every where against it, being able to obtain but the voice of one state in its favor, while there is a majority of 66 against it in the representation of the other house.

The resolutions were read, laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

On motion of Mr. Lyon, a call was made on the secretary of the treasury for information as to present circumstances, and the course proper to be pursued in relation to public lands in the south of Wisconsin and the north of Illinois.

A number of bills were reported, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. King reported from committee, without amendment, the bill authorizing tonnage duty on vessels entering Baltimore harbor through the ice; which was considered, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The following bills were read a third time, and passed:

For the relief of B. H. Maher, of Jas. Baker, of R. Peebles and J. Graham, of Isaac Bronson, of the heirs of Wm. Jones, of the heirs of T. Carter, of I. Shubrick, for establishing an additional land district in Alabama, for the relief of the legal representatives of John Brooks, for the relief of Walter Loomis and Abel Gale.

Sub-Treasury Scheme.

The senate resumed the consideration of the sub-treasury bill.

Mr. Webster spoke at large in opposition to this measure, as a novelty in legislation and in practice; in vindication of the credit system, as the great source of equal and individual wealth and general prosperity; on the advantage and necessity of a sound currency; and the constitutional duty of the government to furnish and regulate such a currency; on the tendency and necessary effects of the pending measure, and added much to his former argument, affirming the power of congress to regulate the currency, especially as connected with their power over commerce and the intercourse between the states. Mr. W. had spoken four hours, without completing his argument—the greatest, it is believed, he has ever, on any occasion, delivered—when he yielded the floor for a motion for adjournment, and the senate adjourned.

March 13. After a number of petitions had been presented and referred, and several bills had been ordered to a second reading, the following, among other bills, was introduced on leave.

By Mr. Trotter: Supplementary to the various acts relating to the appointment of commissioners for the adjustment of claims under the treaty of 1830 with the Choctaw Indians. [Explained by Messrs. Trotter, Linn, and Grundy.]

The bills for the relief of the legal representatives of Daniel Duvall, authorizing tonnage duty on vessels entering the port of Baltimore through the ice, were severally read a third time, and passed.

A number of bills, which will be noticed on their final passage, were ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

On motion of Mr. Clay, of Alabama, a call was made on the secretary of state for information relative to the number of suits on the docket, and various other matters relating to the circuit and district courts of the United States.

The senate then again proceeded to the consideration of the sub-treasury bill.

Mr. Webster resumed the floor and addressed the senate about two hours and a half, in continuation and conclusion of his speech against the bill—particularly in favor of the constitutional power and duty of congress to regulate the currency—in reply to Mr. Calhoun, and on the origin, character, and purposes of the constitution.

Mr. Robbins having indicated his desire to speak on the subject,

The senate adjourned, after an executive session.

March 14. A number of petitions were presented, after which

Mr. Norvell offered a resolution, which lies over one day, declaring it as the sense of the senate that no one concerned in a duel ought afterwards to be appointed to any public office under the United States.

The following bills were read a third time and passed:

To repeal certain provisions of the tariff act of 1832; to authorize Charles Day, and James R. Butts to import, duty free, materials for two iron steamboats; for the relief of the sureties of James Manning.

The vote ordering to a third reading the bill making appropriations for the construction of certain roads in Wisconsin was reconsidered; the bill was discussed by Messrs. Lyon, King, Linn, Davis, Tipton, Hubbard, Walker, and Sevier, chiefly on the ground that some of the routes had not been duly examined; amended, verbally, and informally passed over at the request of Mr. Buchanan.

Mr. Morris, on leave introduced a bill to divide the territory of Wisconsin, and to establish the territory of Iowa. Read twice and referred.

Several bills from the house were read twice and referred.

The senate proceeded to the farther consideration of the sub-treasury bill. Mr. Robbins spoke about an hour and a half in opposition to the bill.

Mr. Benton followed in favor of the bill, in opposition to all banks and banking, and in vindication of the present prosperous condition of the country. Before he had concluded, he gave way to a motion to adjourn, and

The senate adjourned.

March 15. The Vice President presented a communication from the secretary of the treasury, in pursuance of a senate resolution of the 9th inst. with copies of the correspondence, &c. relating to the Metropolis bank of this city as a fiscal agent of the government. Laid on the table.

The following petitions, &c. were presented:

By Mr. Buchanan: the proceedings of a meeting in Philadelphia, in favor of the sub-treasury bill. Read, laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

[Mr. Buchanan, in presenting these proceedings, said he had but a single remark to make, and that was, that from all the accounts which he had received this had been an immense meeting; and, although a small, but highly respectable, minority of the democratic party of the city and county of Philadelphia were opposed to the independent treasury bill, yet he felt no hesitation in saying that a very large majority of that party were decidedly friendly to the measure.]

By Mr. Tipton: from a number of citizens of Brooklyn, New York, against the sub-treasury, and in favor of a sound and uniform currency and a national bank. Laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

A message was received from the house of representatives, through Mr. Franklin, their clerk, announcing the death of the honorable Timothy Jarvis Carter, a member of that body, and informing the senate that the house would attend his funeral in the representatives' hall, at 12 o'clock on Saturday next. Whereupon

Mr. Ruggles rose, and addressed the senate as follows:

Mr. President: The message from the house of representatives just read, communicating the melancholy intelligence of the death of the hon. Timothy J. Carter, a representative from the state of Maine, imposes on me the duty—which I cannot perform without the deepest emotion—of moving the customary resolutions of respect for the memory of the deceased. He died last evening, at the hour of ten, at his lodgings in this city, after much severe, but patient suffering, at peace with all, at variance with none.

I know that occasions of this kind have usually been improved to pronounce eulogies on the character of deceased members; but the painful emotions which have been awakened by the last sad adieu of an esteemed friend and colleague, but poorly qualify me to speak at this time, and in this place, of his many virtues, his purity of heart, the engaging mildness of his disposition, the unusual excellence of the character he maintained in all his domestic and social relations. It is but to say, what all who knew him, as I have known him, would say, that his whole life afforded constant exemplification of the strictest moral rectitude, in the upright, faithful, conscientious performance of every duty connected with his station in society.

Though yet scarcely past the morning of life, he had received many gratifying proofs of the estimation in which his talents and probity were held by the people and the councils of his state.

As a representative, he has been devotedly faithful to his trust, and fully justified the confidence reposed in his virtue and patriotism. He sought not high political distinction. He was unambitious of renown; but guided his footsteps by that calm and steady light which shines all along the pathway of duty and usefulness.

He inherited his virtues from a highly respectable parentage, and has left a wide circle of attached relatives and friends to mourn his exit; three of whom, under the ready impulses of fraternal affection, obeyed the earliest summons to his sick bed. Alas! it was but to witness, with poignant grief, the closing scene in the brief drama of human existence.

He was a husband and a father. But how can I presume here to speak of the agonized feelings of her, who, while she caught his latest sigh, felt that, as in life, so almost also in death, his destinies were her own!

With the deceased life's fleeting shadow has passed by, and eternity has opened its broad portals. Nothing now remains but the tears of relatives, the regrets and sympathies of friends, and the moral influence of his example for all.

The senate, on motion of Mr. Ruggles, resolved unanimously to wear crape thirty days in testimony of their respect for the deceased, and to attend his funeral at the time and place appointed.

On motion of Mr. Hubbard, it was resolved that, when the senate adjourn, they adjourn to meet on Saturday next.

The senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Thursday, March 8. Mr. Briggs moved to suspend the rules for the purpose of enabling him to offer an amendment to rule 63, which provides that "no appropriation shall be reported in the general appropriation bills, or be in order as an amendment thereto for any expenditure not previously authorized by law;" which said amendment is as follows: "unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress, and for the usual contingencies for carrying on the several departments of the government." The motion to suspend was lost.

A number of reports were made, after which, on motion of Mr. Mercer, it was Resolved, That the committee on the public buildings be instructed to ascertain the practicability and cost of providing within the capitol a suitable hall for the accommodation of the house of representatives; and if such a hall cannot be obtained, to suggest such alterations of the present hall as they may deem expedient for the transaction of the public business.

The Speaker laid before the house a letter from the secretary of the treasury, transmitting a report in obedience to a resolution of the House of the 5th instant, calling for information relative to the agents appointed for the payment of pensions.

The hour being announced for taking up the orders of the day—

Mr. Fairfield, of Maine, rose, and asked if the executive message with regard to the northeastern boundary were not first in order?

Mr. Cambreleng rose at nearly the same moment, and was about to move the postponement of this subject, when Mr. Fairfield claimed the floor; which being awarded him by the chair, he proceeded to reply to so much of the argument of Mr. Evans as animadverted upon the conduct of the late and present administrations with regard to the northeastern boundary, but still sustaining the main ground of Mr. E's argument as to the interests of Maine in the matter. [Both these speeches will, in due time, be laid before our readers.] He was in favor of the bill proposed by Mr. Evans, and hoped the committee on foreign affairs would be instructed to report it. Mr. Cambreleng demanded the previous question. The Chair decided that the main question would be on the engrossment and third reading of the bill itself. Mr. Cambreleng then modified his motion, and moved to postpone the whole subject till the 8th day of April. Mr. Evans and Mr. Lincoln rose simultaneously, and requested Mr. Cambreleng to withdraw this proposition, in order to enable them to make some observations upon the pending proposition. Mr. Cambreleng could not consent to do so. Mr. Evans suggested that if the object was to put off this subject for the session, without any definite action upon the question, it would be as well for the gentleman from New York (Mr. Cambreleng) so to arrange his plans, as not to permit the people of Maine to know them. Mr. Cambreleng placed the reasons of his motion upon the ground of the necessity of passing the appropriation bills promptly. If there was any mode by which the bill could be committed to the committee on foreign affairs, he would withdraw his motion, in order to permit such a disposition of it.

The Chair said, that if, by general consent, the bill should be referred to the committee on foreign affairs, the main question would then be upon the commitment of the president's message on the subject under discussion.

There being no objection to the reference of the bill, it was so referred.

Mr. Cambreleng then demanded the previous question on the commitment of the executive message.

The vote on receiving the previous question stood 45 ayes to 56 noes—no quorum; and, on motion of Mr. Cambreleng the house adjourned.

Friday, March 9. After a number of reports had been received,

Mr. Briggs asked leave to move that the house now take up the amendment moved by him to the 63d rule of the house, (concerning appropriation bills;) objection being made, he moved a suspension of the rules, that his motion might be received, but the house refused to suspend.

Mr. Chambers, of Kentucky, once more asked leave to offer his resolution changing the hour of meeting, but it was objected to; and he then moved to suspend the rules, and demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and, being taken, stood as follows: yeas 59, nays 95.

Mr. Howard moved that the house now proceed to consider the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing vote of the two houses respecting the amendment to the neutrality bill, which was agreed to.

Mr. H. then stated and explained the compromise which had taken place in the committee of conference, and the result to which they had arrived. A debate then arose, in which Messrs. Howard, Fillmore, Cushing, Haynes, Tillinghast, Adams, Halsey, and Corwin participated, when Mr. McKim moved the previous question.

The motion was seconded by the house: yeas 78, noes 44.

The previous question was then put, and carried; and the main question, viz. on agreeing to the report of the committee of conference, was decided in the affirmative by yeas and nays, as follows: yeas 103, nays 51. So the house concurred with the committee in their report.

The Chair thereupon announced that, the house having received official intimation that the senate had previously concurred in the same report, the bill was passed.

The house then passed to the order of the day, which was the consideration of private bills; and the question being on a motion of Mr. W. Thompson to reconsider the vote in favor of the bill for the relief of the heirs of the late Robert Fulton.

Mr. Thompson stated at large the reasons of his motion, and the former debate on the Fulton bill was renewed with equal earnestness as when that bill was before the house previously to its passage. The motion for reconsideration was strenuously resisted, and the merits of Fulton pressed and eulogized by Messrs. McClelland, Whittlesey, of Conn. and Chambers. The reconsideration of the bill was advocated with equal spirit by Messrs. Randolph and Craig. Mr. Duncan, having obtained the floor, signified his desire to address the house, but wishing another occasion to be afforded him for that purpose, moved an adjournment. This motion prevailed: yeas 79, noes 64.

So the house adjourned, without taking the question.

Saturday, March 10. Among the reports made this morning was one by Mr. Thomas from the committee on the judiciary, the bill from the senate to change the times of holding the circuit courts of the United States in the ninth circuit, with an amendment thereto.

The said amendment was concurred in, and the bill read a third time, and passed.

The modified resolution of Mr. Johnson, from Maryland, which was the unfinished business of the morning hour, being in order, and Mr. Johnson being absent,

Mr. Whittlesey, of Ohio, moved that it be postponed till Monday; which motion prevailed, nem. con.

On motion of Mr. Garland, of Virginia, the house went into committee of the whole, (Mr. McKay in the chair,) and took up the bill of the house "to restore circuit jurisdiction to the district courts of the western district of Virginia."

Mr. Beirne moved to strike out the first section of the bill, on the ground that this was a proposition to repeal a portion of an act passed last March, entitled "an act to amend the judicial system of the United States," and that the people of that section of the state of Virginia had not desired such a repeal.

Mr. Garland supported the bill upon precisely the opposite ground, and appealed to the delegation from western Virginia to sustain him in the position he assumed.

Mr. Johnson, of Virginia, sustained the bill, and argued the necessity of the proposed change, as did Mr. Craig, and Mr. Hopkins, and Mr. Morgan, and Mr. Stuart, of the same state.

Mr. Beirne reiterated the opinion that the people of Virginia were not in favor of this bill, and, in proof of this, that they had not memorialized congress upon the subject. He said it was a movement of a portion of the bar of western Virginia. He insisted upon his motion to strike out the first section of the bill.

Mr. Craig said he had presented memorials upon this subject, and showed that the immediate constituents of the gentleman last up were interested to keep the courts as they were, while in this particular they formed an exception to the rest of western Virginia.

Mr. Garland said that he had also presented some memorials upon that subject; and he and others of his colleagues demonstrated the errors into which Mr. Beirne had fallen in relation to the matter.

Mr. Hopkins said he had also presented memorials from his constituents for the adoption of this measure, and dwelt with some particularity upon the necessity for the proposed change. There had been various petitions of the kind, and many private letters, urging the passage of the bill.

The question being propounded, on the motion of Mr. Beirne, to strike out the first section of the bill, the vote stood—yeas 11; nays 50.

Mr. Garland, of Virginia, moved that the committee rise and report that there was no quorum; which motion prevailed.

Mr. Cushman moved a call of the house; which was ordered, and the clerk proceeded to call the roll. And after the absentees had been called, it was found that 123 answered to their names. On motion, the house then adjourned at half-past one o'clock.

Monday, March 12. Petitions, &c. upon various subjects were presented by Messrs. Mercer, Hopkins, and Morgan, of Virginia; McKim, Thomas, Worthington, and Jenifer, of Maryland; Milligan, of Delaware; M. Morris, Potts, Davies, Henry, McKennan, Paynter, Plumer, Potter, Beatty, Wagener, Sergeant, Ogle, Toland, Klingensmith, Sheffer, and Biddle, of Pennsylvania; Halsted, Randolph, Ayer, and Yorke, of New Jersey; Bronson, Peck, Clark, Birdsall, DeGraff, Gallup, Russell, Grant, Sibley, Hoffman, Curtis, Marvin, Fillmore, Mitchell, McClelland, Parker, Moore, Vanderveer, Kemble, Andrews, Jones, Pratt, Titus, Loomis, Brodhead, Edwards, Noble, Palmer, Spencer, Cambreleng, and Patterson, of New York; Bond, of Ohio; S. W. Morris, of Pennsylvania; Fletcher and Allen, of Vermont; Haley, Whittlesey, and Ingham, of Connecticut; Cranston and Tillinghast, of Rhode Island; Phillips, Cushing, Briggs, Reed, Lincoln, Calhoun, Borden, and Adams, of Massachusetts; Cushman and Williams, of New Hampshire; Fairfield, Noyes, Anderson, Evans, and Davey, of Maine.

At this point, Mr. Whittlesey moved a call of the House, (it having been ascertained that no quorum was in attendance.) The motion prevailed.

The clerk proceeded to call the house; and had proceeded but a short way upon the roll, when, on motion, the call was suspended, and petitions were then presented by Messrs. Mason, Johnson, and Taliaferro, of Virginia; Montgomery, of North Carolina; Griffin and Clowney, of South Carolina; Southgate, of Kentucky; Stone, Turney, Polk, Maury, Shields, and C. H. Williams, of Tennessee; Whittlesey, Allen, Goode, Shepler, and Webster, of Ohio; Herod, Graham, and Dunn, of Indiana; Casey, of Illinois; Lewis, Lyon, and Chapman, of Alabama; Miller and Harrison, of Missouri; Yell, of Arkansas; Cray, of Michigan; and Downing, of Florida.

Petitions, &c. upon slavery, Texas, &c.

A number of memorials of this class were presented by Messrs. M. Morris, Potts, McKennan, Potter, Beatty, Wagener, Sergeant, Ogle, Halstead, Peck, Clark, Russell, Grant, Sibley, Marvin, Mitchell, Vanderveer, Kemble, and Patterson, of New York; Allen, of Vermont; Tillinghast, of Rhode Island; Phillips, Cushing, Briggs, Lincoln, Calhoun, Borden, and Adams, of Massachusetts; Anderson, Evans, and Davee, of Maine; and Whittlesey, of Ohio; which were disposed of in the usual mode, by laying them on the table, some under the rule, others on motion.

Petitions against duelling, &c.

Several gentlemen presented memorials upon this subject; which were referred to the select committee now in session.

A number of memorials in favor of the passage of the bill making compensation for losses prior to 1800 by French spoliations were presented, and referred to the committee to whom that bill has been referred.

Mr. Henry, of Pennsylvania, presented a joint resolution of the legislature of Pennsylvania, instructing their senators and requesting their representatives in congress to vote and use their influence for the postponement of the sub-treasury bill, or any other acts of a similar character; and also resolutions accompanying the same from the senate of Pennsylvania, on the same subject. On motion, referred to the committee of the whole on the state of the union, to which the same subject is referred, and that they be printed.

Mr. Pratt, of New York, presented the resolutions of the assembly of the state of New York, requesting their senators and representatives in congress to oppose the passage of the bill now before congress to impose additional duties, &c. called the sub-treasury bill.

Several memorials, very numerous signed, remonstrating against the passage of the sub-treasury bill, and others in favor of establishing a national bank, were presented by several gentlemen; which were severally referred to a committee of the whole, to which had been committed the sub-treasury bill, reported by the committee of ways and means.

Mr. Fillmore presented a memorial, adopted by a county-meeting held at Buffalo, on the 12th of February last, in relation to the burning of the Caroline, and the murder of our citizens on board.

On presenting it, he remarked that the memorial gives a full history of that unexampled outrage upon the lives and property of our citizens. It has the sanction of a very large and respectable meeting, and I doubt not that it is substantially correct. From this, it appears that this ill-fated boat belonged to a citizen of Buffalo; that, on the 29th of December last, she was cleared at the custom-house in Buffalo, with a view of running her as a ferry boat between Black Rock and Schlosser, and between Schlosser and Navy Island, then occupied by the Canadian rebels or patriots. She sailed under the American flag, and no other. She arrived at Schlosser that day, and made two trips from thence to Navy Island, carrying at one time provisions, and at another a six-pound cannon, for those on the island; but she was neither owned nor controlled by any one on the island.

About five o'clock that evening she was moored at the wharf at Schlosser, on the American shore, within sight of Chippewa, on the Canadian side. Several persons not being able to obtain lodgings at the small tavern at that place, applied for, and obtained permission to lodge on the boat. From the best information, the whole number on the boat was 33, all unarmed, except one pocket pistol, which was unloaded, and without ammunition to load it. According to custom, a watch was placed on deck about 8 o'clock, and these American citizens retired to rest, under the protection of the flag of our country, little suspecting that that flag would afford no shield to Canadian aggression, and no protection to midnight murder and assassination.

Between 12 and 1 o'clock at night, while our peaceful and unarmed citizens on board this boat were sleeping with unsuspecting security, within our own waters, five Canadian boats, filled with armed men, stole upon their slumbers like midnight assassins, and commenced an indiscriminate slaughter of unarmed and unoffending citizens, with the savage and demoniac cry of "give no quarter." Without weapons for defence, or time for flight, several were killed; the exact number perhaps can never be ascertained. The Canadian report says six, and ours nine; and this vessel, with the dead on board, except one, who fell upon the dock, was then towed into the current above the falls, set on fire, and abandoned to its fate. It shied, for a few moments, its lurid glare upon our shores, and lighted the way of these assassins back to their own homes, and then plunged into that unfathomable abyss, from which nothing but the fragments of its wreck have ever emerged.

I am unwilling to say or do any thing which may tend to embarrass the diplomatic negotiations that I trust have already been instituted by this government, peaceably to obtain satisfaction for this outrage. Common charity induced us all to believe, at first, that it was the unauthorized act of individuals, which would be instantly disavowed by the Canadian officers and government. But I regret to say it appears, as well from this memorial as from common fame, that this expedition was planned in the Canadian camp at Chippewa, under the immediate supervision and direction of colonel McNabb, the commanding officer at that place, and after those engaged in it had returned and reported that cold-blooded murder, committed within our own undisputed territory, the act was approved in general orders by the commanding officer, and subsequently received the approbation of the lieutenant governor of Upper Canada, and the legislature of that province have recently presented a sword to lieutenant Drew, who commanded the expedition, in honor of the murderous exploit.

What the British government will say to this, remains yet to be heard. Charity and the friendly relations existing between this government and that, induced me to hope that this act will be disavowed by that government, and that satisfaction, so far as it can be made, will be immediately proffered.

It is proper that I should state that the deep and universal feeling of indignation which this outrage has called forth in that community is entirely distinct from, and independent of, that excitement which has been so universally condemned, as an improper interference in the Canadian rebellion. That our citizens should have felt a deep sympathy in what they considered the struggles of the oppressed against the tyranny of their oppressors, cannot be matter of surprise to the descendants of the whigs of '76. It was natural—it was inevitable; and the only thing which the true patriot has to regret is, that this feeling, springing from the most noble and generous emotions of the human breast, should ever for a moment have gained such an ascendancy over the mind of any true American, as to induce him to violate the sacred laws of neutrality, by which he endangers the peace and prosperity of many millions of human beings, and, possibly, the great cause of freedom itself. It is doubly painful to see that this noble and generous spirit of chivalry has degenerated apparently into a base and lawless spirit of plunder and robbery, which is spending its fury in private depredations and public robberies of our arsenals and magazines, disgraceful to our country, and highly criminal in those concerned. I desire for myself, and for those whose memorial I present, to disclaim all countenance of these acts.

The memorialists pray that our navy and army may be placed on a proper footing, and that our fortifications may be placed in a proper state of defence, and particularly, that the city of Buffalo and the Niagara frontier, now in a perfectly defenceless state, may be immediately fortified, and that the government demand and obtain redress for this outrage.

I move that so much of the memorial as relates to the defence of the country be referred to the committee on military affairs; and so much as relates to the violation of our national honor, and redress therefor, to the committee on foreign affairs; and that the same be printed.

Mr. Adams hoped that the gentleman would move the reference of the memorial to a select committee, it being on a most important subject. He was proceeding to give some reasons for this suggestion, when

The Speaker arrested the debate, and said, that if the memorial should give rise to discussion, it must lie over.

Mr. Fillmore then modified his motion, and proposed to refer the memorial to a select committee.

Mr. Howard moved its reference to the committee on foreign affairs, which motion, having precedence, was first put, and the vote stood ayes 61, noes 37. No quorum.

The Chair requested members to vote on one or the other side. Another count resulted as follows: ayes 63; noes 41. No quorum.

Mr. Petrikin moved a call of the house and demanded the yeas and nays on this motion.

Mr. McKennan hoped that his colleague would withdraw the call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. Petrikin said he could not. He wished to see where the 10 o'clock men were.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and a call of the house was ordered. Yeas 102, nays 46.

One name having been called, Mr. Petrikin moved that the further progress of the call be suspended, which motion prevailed.

The motion of Mr. Howard then passed without a division.

Mr. Fillmore then moved the house to take up and consider the following resolution offered by him on a former day.

"Resolved, that the president be requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to communicate to this house any information possessed by him, respecting the capture and destruction of the steamboat Caroline, at Schlosser, during the night of the 29th December last, and the murder of citizens of the United States on board, and all the particulars thereof, not heretofore communicated; and especially to inform the house whether said capture was authorized, commanded or sanctioned, or has been avowed by the British authorities or officers, or any of them; and also whether steps have been taken by him to obtain satisfaction from the government of Great Britain on account of said outrage; and to communicate to the house all correspondence or communication relative thereto, which have passed between the government of the United States, or any of the public authorities of either."

Objection being made,

Mr. Fillmore moved the suspension of the rule. Lost; two-thirds, not voting for the motion.

Other memorials upon this subject were offered by several members, and were all similarly disposed of.

Mr. Adams presented a memorial praying congress to rescind the resolution of December 1, 1837, and accompanying it, a memorial praying congress to cause the declaration of independence to be expunged from the journal of the old congress; which he moved to refer together to a select committee.

Mr. Campbell, of S. C. rose and said, that he represented upon that floor a constituency which—

The Speaker told him that no petition was debateable on the day it was offered. Mr. Cushman moved to lay it on the table; which motion prevailed.

Several resolutions of minor importance were offered and appropriately referred.

The Speaker laid before the house a letter from the secretary of the navy, inclosing a statement in compliance with a resolution of the house of the 26th ult. showing the names of all officers and non-commissioned officers, in the naval service and marine corps, disabled while in the line of their duty.

Also, a letter from the navy department, transmitting the report of commodore Stewart and Dallas, and captain Bolton, relative to proposed improvements of the navy yard at Pensacola.

Also, in reply to a resolution of the 7th instant, a report in relation to the compensation of revenue officers in the year 1837.

Also, a message from the president of the United States, transmitting a report of the secretary of state, relative to an application made by the minister of France, in behalf of captain Beziers, for remuneration for services in saving the captain and crew of an American vessel wrecked in the bay of Cadiz, in the year 1835. To which the president adds: "I am happy to evince my high sense of the humane and intrepid conduct of captain Beziers, by presenting his case to congress, to whom it belongs to determine upon the expediency of granting his request."

Also, a message from the president of the United States, transmitting a report from the secretary of state in reply to a resolution of the 5th instant, respecting the present state of the campaign in Florida, and disposition of the Indians to treat for peace.

On motion the house, at 4 o'clock, adjourned.

Tuesday, March 13. The following were among the reports made from committees this day:

By Mr. Jenifery from the committee for the District of Columbia, a bill for the suppression of gaming in the District of Columbia.

By Mr. Petrikin, from the same committee, a bill to incorporate certain banks in the District of Columbia.

By Mr. Ingham, from the committee on naval affairs, a bill for the augmentation of the United States marine corps.

On motion of Mr. Cambreleng, the house took up and adopted the following amendment to the 63d rule of the house, as offered and modified by Mr. Briggs:

Add to the 63d rule,

"Unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress, and for the contingencies for carrying on the several departments, of the government."

Mr. Garland, of Virginia, moved for leave to introduce a motion to discharge the committee of the whole from the further consideration of the bill (under consideration on Saturday last) in relation to the jurisdiction of the district courts of western Virginia.

Mr. Everett, desirous to reach the resolution next in order on the speaker's table, objected.

Mr. Garland moved a suspension of the rule, which motion prevailed, and the bill was taken up and ordered to be engrossed and read a third time this day.

Mr. Johnson, of Maryland, rose, and proceeded with his remarks in support of his resolution, partially discussed upon former days, and made some further progress. [This debate will be given hereafter, when completed.]

The pending motion being the previous question on the motion of Mr. Howard, on the motion to refer the message of the president of the United States and accompanying documents upon the subject of the northeastern boundary and the imprisonment of Mr. Greely, of Maine, to the committee on foreign affairs; that motion was put and prevailed, and the proposed reference was ordered.

Several bills from the senate received their first and second readings, and were severally committed.

The Speaker laid before the house a communication from the secretary of war, transmitting a report of the chief engineer in reply to the resolution of the house of representatives of the 5th instant, requiring information as to the amount of money expended for the improvement of the Missouri river.

Also, a communication from the war department, enclosing a copy of the report of the survey recently made of the harbor of Linn, Massachusetts, in obedience to the resolution of the house of representatives of the 9th instant.

On motion of Mr. Cambreleg, the house resolved itself into committee of the whole on the state of the union, (Mr. Casey in the chair,) and again took up the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill, and the amendments offered thereto by Messrs. Cambreleg and Bell.

An amendment offered by Mr. Cambreleg, providing for the appropriation of the proceeds of old furniture at the president's house to the purchase of new, was agreed to.

Mr. M. Morris, of Pennsylvania, moved to strike out from line 423 of the bill the word "thirty," and to insert, in lieu thereof, the word "twenty."

As a member of the committee upon expenditures in the department of state, Mr. M. had had occasion to look into these matters, and had ascertained that the payments, under this head, had, from 1829 to 1837, inclusive, been five hundred dollars, annually, less than the sums appropriated; and that that aggregate balance was yet in the hands of the department, applicable to that object. He could see no reason, therefore, why this reduction should not be made.

Mr. Cambreleg made some explanations and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. Reed proposed to amend the bill by adding $52,040 for the erection, rebuilding, and completion of light-houses in New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Connecticut, New York.

Mr. Dawson thought that this proposition did not come under the title of the bill under consideration. There was as much need for such appropriations on the southern as on the northern Atlantic coast, which, in the proper time, he should move for.

Mr. Reed explained, showing that the amendment he proposed, was intended to carry out more perfectly one of the provisions actually contained in the bill under consideration.

The amendment was rejected by the committee.

Mr. Howard moved to amend the bill by adding $4,000 for the outfit of a new charge d'affaires to Peru; the present charge being about to return home.

Mr. *Petrik*in opposed, and Mr. McKim supported this proposition; the latter upon the ground of its mercantile necessity. He was in favor even of having a minister there of the highest grade.

After some brief remarks, in opposition to the amendment, from Mr. Bell, and some explanations on the part of Messrs. McKim, *Petrik*in, and Howard, the amendment was adopted.

Mr. Rariden moved to amend by striking out the words "twenty-five thousand," and inserting the words "— thousand;" for the purpose of so far increasing the contingent fund of the house as to cover the expenses of supplying members of congress with certain documents, &c., ordered at the present session to be furnished them.

Mr. Cambreleg was of opinion that this amendment was not in order, under the rules of the house; there was a bill before the house, already, providing for the same object as that intended to be reached by the proposed amendment.

The Chair decided the amendment to be out of order under the 43d rule of the house.

Mr. Rariden took an appeal from this decision: and the question was, "Shall it stand as the opinion of the house?"

Mr. McKay made some remarks, by way of showing that, if the proposed amendment should be adopted, the object of the mover could not be attained; inasmuch as no part of the contingent fund of the house could be appropriated as intended, without a violation of a rule already existing, prohibiting such application.

Mr. Rariden would so far further amend the bill as to make such an application of a portion of the contingent fund as he had proposed. In the mean time, he was desirous to have the sense of the house upon his appeal.

Mr. Bell suggested that the appeal be withdrawn with the amendment for the present, and introduced hereafter, when there was a fuller attendance. Mr. Rariden acceded to this suggestion.

Mr. Cambreleg moved an amendment, appropriating the sum of $20,000 for the completion of public buildings in the territory of Wisconsin.

Mr. Bell objected to this amendment, on the ground of its being a bad precedent. The former appropriation of $20,000 for this purpose was understood to have been intended as final, for the completion of the public buildings in Wisconsin. He was opposed to the whole system, which seemed to be becoming a common one.

Mr. Cambreleg showed the necessity of making the appropriation now asked for, by way of completing what had been begun, and carried on to some extent.

Mr. Snyder, of Illinois, suggested that in case of the occurrence of the contemplated division of the territory into East and West Wisconsin, the present buildings would be so located as to render them inutile.

Mr. Bronson maintained that their location was such as to obviate this objection; being the centre of what, under the contemplated division, would be Wisconsin proper.

Mr. Bell insisted upon his former objection, urging that the sum originally appropriated was intended to be final: a view which Mr. Bronson opposed.

The amendment was rejected.

Some other comparatively unimportant amendments were then acted on: after which,

Mr. Bell moved to strike out the section of the bill appropriating $3,600 for the payment of clerks in the treasury department, under the act of 23d June, 1836, upon the ground that the same amount of clerical force was not now needed in that department as was needed in 1836. He wanted the appropriation to be specific as to the number of clerks, the sum to be paid to each, and as to the particular service performed.

Before completing all he had to say on this subject, he moved that the committee rise; which motion prevailing, and the speaker having resumed the chair,

The bill, passed to be engrossed this morning, in relation to the jurisdiction of the United States courts in western Virginia, was taken up and passed, and then,

On motion, the house (at 4 o'clock) adjourned.

Wednesday, March 14. Mr. Paynter, on leave, presented a memorial on the subject of duelling, which was referred to the select committee.

Messrs. Fairfield and M. Morris gave notice of their wish to offer similar memorials; but the house, after two counts, refused by yeas and nays to suspend the rule, to allow of their presentation out of the regular order of business: Yeas 92, nays 54, not two-thirds.

On motion of Mr. Holsey, of Georgia, his colleague, Mr. Jackson, was excused from serving on the select committee on the reduction of pensions, that gentleman being a member already of two committees. The motion prevailed.

Mr. Johnson, of Maryland, proceeded with his argument in support of his resolution in relation to an appropriation of the public lands for public schools until the expiration of the hour appropriated to morning business.

Mr. Martin, of Alabama, from the committee on the judiciary, reported, with amendments, the bill changing the time of holding the circuit courts in the ninth judicial circuit of the United States.

[It annexes Alabama to the sixth circuit.]

Mr. Haynes considered it due to judge Wayne to inquire why the committee proposed such a change in the circuit court as would greatly increase the official labor of that gentleman by sending him into Alabama, when there was already a judge of the United States residing there.

Mr. Thomas, in reply, went into a full explanation and defence of the amendment proposed, showing that its result would be to obviate the complaints which had long been made respecting the neglect of the eastern judicial district of Louisiana. He stated very minutely the amount of court duty performed by each of the judges, and showed that even with the increased duty occasioned by the amendment, judge Wayne would still have less to do than any of his brethren, judge Barbour only excepted; while judge McKinley would be relieved from a task too onerous to be performed by any judge. It was impracticable now to go into a general reorganization of the whole of the districts, since the time was so near when Florida, Wisconsin, and perhaps Iowa, would become states of the union, that no arrangement could be made which did not look to that event; and if the districts should be so organized at this time, the plan would work unequally and unjustly in the meanwhile.

Mr. Haynes farther urged his inquiries in behalf of judge Wayne; and Messrs. Thomas, Pope, and Johnson, of Louisiana, replied, insisting on the expediency of the proposed arrangement.

The question being put, the amendment was agreed to; the bill ordered to its third reading, read a third time, and passed.

A message was received from the president of the United States, enclosing a communication from the secretary of state on the subject of a canal across the isthmus of Darien.

Several bills of minor importance were offered; after which reports of committees were received.

A bill from the senate to allow two citizens of Georgia to import iron steamboats suitable to the navigation of rivers, having been twice read,

It was, on motion of Mr. Adams, sent to the committee on manufactures.

The house then went into committee of the whole on the state of the union, (Mr. Casey in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill.

The house having resumed, in committee of the whole, the annual general appropriation bill,

Mr. Bell's amendment proposing to strike out the clause providing for the deposit bank clerks in the department of the treasury was opposed by Mr. Cambreleg and McKay, on the ground that the duties of these clerks were just as onerous, and even more so, than before the banks had stopped payment, and a letter was read from the secretary, stating that the department could not get on without their services. Mr. McKay stated that, as these clerks were regularly appointed by law, and the secretary had power to pay them out of the contingent fund of the department, they would still be employed, though the appropriation should be stricken out.

Mr. Bell thereupon withdrew his amendment, but referred with censure to a practice very prevalent in the departments, as well under former as the present administration, of retaining clerks whose official duties were very inconsiderable, their chief occupation being to write in defence of the measures of government.

On motion of Mr. Cambreleg, the appropriation for the United States district courts was augmented from $330,000 to $350,000, in anticipation of the increase of business on the frontier under the late law to preserve neutrality.

An item of $2,000 was inserted to repair the roof of the mint at Charlotte, South Carolina.

The residue of the sitting was occupied in the discussion of a motion of Mr. McKay, of North Carolina, to strike out the item of $4,000 for the salaries of our consuls at Paris and London. In this debate, Messrs. McKay, Cambreleg, Haynes, Bronson, Mercer, Howard, Shepperd, of North Carolina, and Adams, took part.

The ground of the objection was that no salaries were appropriated by law to any consuls but those of the Barbary states; and a rule of the house forbade the introduction of any item into an appropriation bill for expenditures not warranted by previous law, save for public works begun, and in a course of completion, and for the contingent expenses of the different departments of the government.

The appropriation was defended on the ground that the officers now called "consuls" at London and Paris used formerly to be known by the title of "agents of claims" at those capitals; but as we had no longer any claims which needed their presence there, they had by degrees grown, in fact, into consuls, performing all the duties of the consulate; and in their last appropriation bill their designation had been altered to that of consuls, which they really were; that the salary was fully earned, and indispensable to their remaining at their posts; that their case did not come within the rule, the office of consul existing under the law of nations, and not by municipal law; and their salary having, in fact, been provided for in the law of last session. That the president had the power of appointing informal agents, and assigning to them their allowance, as had been done by president Washington, and Mr. Adams, in particular, insisted that the constitutional power to the president to appoint foreign ministers and consuls involved in it, as an incidental power, the right to fix the power they should receive; although congress, and particularly the house of representatives, had a check upon the exercise of that power, by its salary of assenting to or refusing to pay the salary; and he said that this principle was recognized in the language of the act of 1810, which provided that the president should not pay to the diplomatic agents, there enumerated, compensations exceeding the sums specified in the act; implying that he might, as a part of the power belonging to his office, both appoint (with the assent of the senate) and fix the allowance of those officers; but that the house would not agree to pay over the specific sum by them specified.

Mr. McKay protested against this as a monstrous proposition; and Mr. Mercer declined, also, to yield it his assent.

Before any decision was had, the committee rose, and the house adjourned.

Thursday, March 15. As soon as the house was organized this morning,

Mr. Evans, of Maine, addressed the the chair in the following words:

Mr. Speaker, these badges of mourning which we still wear denote that death has lately been in the midst of us. Again his arrow has flown; and again has the fatal shaft been sent, with unerring aim, into a small, and already broken, rank. It is my melancholy office to announce that, since the last adjournment of the house of representatives, Timothy Jarvis Carter, then one of its members, from the state of Maine, has surrendered up to the Being who gave it a life upon which many anxious hopes depended, and for whose preservation many an ardent prayer had gone up to the Father of all spirits. He died last evening, at 10 o'clock, at his lodgings in this city, after a sickness of not very protracted duration, but of great and excruciating intensity of suffering and agony. The ways of a righteous Providence are inscrutable, and while we bow in submission, we are yet oppressed with deep and solemn awe.

Our deceased friend and colleague was a native of the state and the district which, so lately, he represented in this branch of congress; and he, therefore, brought with him the confidence, largely bestowed, of those who had known him from his earliest years. Well did he deserve it. His character for probity, integrity, uprightness, morality, was free from spot or blemish. His principles were well founded. Loving the country of his birth, and its institutions, with all his heart, he pursued with fidelity such measures as his judgment deemed best calculated to promote the welfare of the one and the durability of the other. He was a lawyer by profession, faithful, just, discriminating, attentive, humane, in its practice.

Of manners, mild, courteous, affable; and a temper kind, conciliating, patient, he won respect and attachment, even from those who differed with him in matters of opinion; and probably there lives not a human being who has a single resentment, or one unkind recollection, to bury in his grave. He has gone, in the strength of his manhood, and the maturity of his intellect, the road that all must once pass.

"—calcanda, semel, via Lethi."

The ties that bound him to life are severed forever, as all human ties must be severed.

"Lingenda tellus, et domus, et amans
Uxor; neque harum, quas colis, arborum
Te, præter invisas cupressos
Ulla, brevem dominum sequetur."

Although, when his eyes opened for the last time upon the earth and the sky, they fell not upon his own native hills; though the sod which shall cover him will not freshen in the same influences which clothe them in verdure and beauty; though he died far from his home, the companions and the brothers of his childhood were with him—the sharer of his joys, the solace of his griefs, stood by him; and the hand which could best do it assuaged the bitter pains of parting life. The last earthly sounds which fell upon his ear were tones of sympathy, and kindness, and affection, and support—tones which ceased not, even when they vainly strove to pierce the cold and leaden ear of death. Tears shall flow copiously, and deep sighs be heaved over his lifeless form; tears not more scalding, sighs not deeper drawn, because mingled with any bitter recollections—any unavailing regrets.

If human means could have availed—if devoted fraternal sympathy and care—if constant, abiding, self-sacrificing affection, triumphing over exhausted nature and bearing up a feeble frame, unconscious of weariness, through long and painful vigils, could have saved his life, he would long have been spared to the friends who now deplore his death, and to the state and to the country which he served. To that stricken bosom we proffer—alas! how little will it avail!—our sincere sympathy and condolence. He has gone from this place of earthly honors and human distinction, to a seat in that "house which is not made with hands, eternal in the heavens."

As a token of our regard for his many virtues, and of our respect for his memory, I move the adoption of the resolutions which I now submit.

Mr. Evans then offered the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the members and officers of this house will attend the funeral of Timothy J. Carter, deceased, late a member of this house, from the state of Maine, at 12 o'clock, on Saturday, the 17th inst.

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to take order for superintending the funeral of Timothy J. Carter, deceased.

Resolved, That the members and officers of this house will testify their respect for the memory of Timothy J. Carter by wearing crape on the left arm for thirty days.

Resolved, That when this house adjourn to-day, it will adjourn to meet on Saturday, the 17th inst. These resolutions were unanimously agreed to.

The following members were appointed to compose the committee of arrangements, viz.

Messrs. Evans, of Maine, McKennan, of Pennsylvania, Whittlesey, of Connecticut, Pickens, of South Carolina, Pope, of Kentucky, Hamer, of Ohio, Gray, of New York. And then the house adjourned to Saturday.

CHRONICLE.

A Patriot and a soldier dead.—We learn from the Plattsburg Whig, that the venerable Benjamin Mooers, a patriot of the revolution, died at Plattsburg on the 20th ult. in the 80th year of his age. He was born in Haverhill, Mass. in 1758, entered the army a volunteer at the age of 18, was at Ticonderoga in 1776. In 1777 he was ensign in the 1st congress regiment, or "Congress' own," as it was called, made up mostly of Canadian refugees, and commanded by col. Moses Hazen. Ensign Mooers soon became lieutenant and adjutant. He was at the surrender of Burgoyne, the siege of Yorktown, and the surrender of Cornwallis. In 1783 he and eight of his comrades of the same regiment, left the head quarters at Newburg, proceeded to lake Champlain, then a wilderness, and settled on the Point aux Roches, eight miles from the present site of Plattsburg, and he has resided in that county ever since, being 55 years. He has held various high trusts, was a major gen. of militia, and commanded at the siege of Plattsburg. He had suffered amputation some years since from a fungus tumor on the arm, but the disease re-appeared. He was a man of elevated principles, a devoted patriot, a sincere believer in religion, a practical farmer, and a beloved citizen in every relation of life. He was at one time a candidate for lieut. governor of the state.

Brazil.—Rio Janeiro papers to the 17th of January, have been received at New York. All was quiet at the capital, and the restoration of tranquillity in Bahia and Rio Grande, were anticipated with confidence.

The French prince de Joinville had gone on a visit to the mines—the French ships of war awaiting his return. From Brazil the prince would come to the United States.

Phoenix Bank.—An investigation of the charges against this institution, made at the instance of the board of trade of New York, was commenced in that city on Tuesday the 13th inst. A portion of the testimony has been published, but we deem it prudent not to notice it until the commissioners make their report.

Mayorality of New York.—On Monday evening last, the whigs of New York nominated Aeron Clark as a candidate for re-election to the mayorality. The "conservatives" have nominated Richard Riker for the same office. The friends of the national administration have not yet fixed upon a candidate.

From Mexico. The schr. Levin Jones, arrived at this port, sailed from Vera Cruz on the 20th ult. Two French brigs of war had arrived, and the remainder of a squadron, fourteen in all, were expected, to enforce the French claims, a part of which had been admitted. Fortifications had been commenced to protect the town in case of bombardment, which was expected. No American vessels were in port; the United States sloop of war Vandalia was spoken on the 20th ultimo, bound in. —N. O. Bulletin.

Death of Judge Wingate. We learn from the Portsmouth Journal, that Paine Wingate died at Stratham, N. H. on Wednesday last, aged 99. The Journal says: "He was a senator in the first congress, and was probably the last survivor of that body. He was a graduate of Harvard College, and when he graduated was the youngest of his class. He has been for several years (since the death of Dr. Holyoke) the eldest graduate of that institution. He was appointed judge of the supreme court in New Hampshire in 1798, and held the office till 1809, being then 70 years of age. Mr. Wingate was originally a congregational clergyman, having preached for some time for the north church in Portsmouth, and was, we learn, settled at North Hampton. He was a highly esteemed man by his own generation, and has been venerated by the new race which has grown up around him. His wife, a sister of honorable Timothy Pickering, survives him at the advanced age of 90.

Louisiana. The governor has returned the bank bill to the senate with his objections. A strange scene occurred immediately afterwards. After the veto had been read, the governor discovered that he had made some error in his message, and despatched a letter to the senate, requesting its correction. After a warm debate the senate declined. Two days after, (viz: on the 5th inst.,) the vetoed bill passed the senate by a constitutional majority—the vote being 19 to 3.

Boston Banks.—The twenty-five associated banks have reduced their loans within the last two months, $2,827,540—circulation reduced, $639,217—specie on hand, $1,153,100. Increase the last month $13,763.

Massachusetts Banks.—The obvious proposition that a refusal of specie payments forfeits the charters of the banks, was agreed to in the Massachusetts legislature the other day, by a vote of 265 to 61. The Boston Sentinel remarks, "whether this doctrine will meet the concurrence of the senate, remains to be proved." What next? Is black, black—or white, white?

The Ohio river is now open.—it broke up on Saturday night about nine o'clock. On Sunday evening, several boats, with full freights and passengers, arrived from Pittsburgh. Yesterday our wharf presented a scene of bustle and animation that would cheer the most desponding in these times of pecuniary embarrassment. For buoyancy of spirit and enterprise, under all circumstances, whether adverse or prosperous, give us the western steamboat men and the forwarding merchants.

[Wheeling Times.]

Hops. The inspector general of hops in the state of Massachusetts, reports the inspection the past year, of 3364 bags of hops of all sorts, weighing 623,648 lbs. and valued at $33,418 88. Since the year 1806, the inspection has been 76,860 bags of all sorts, weighing 16,467,182 lbs. Valued at (13 1-5 cts. per lb.) $2,169,429 83. The inspector adds that hops of Massachusetts inspection, generally brings, in the market, from one to two cents per pound more than those of the inspection of any other state. Most, if not all, orders coming from Europe, or elsewhere, expressly require hops of Massachusetts inspection.

Liabilities of those who take newspapers. The laws declare that any person to whom a periodical is sent is responsible for payment if he receives the paper or makes use of it, if he has never subscribed for it or has ordered it to be stopped. His duty in such a case is not to take the paper from the office or person with whom the paper is left, or to notify the publisher that he does not wish it.

If papers are sent to a post office, store, or tavern, or other place of deposit, and are not taken by the person to whom they are sent, the postmaster, store, or tavern keeper, &c., is responsible until he returns the paper or gives notice to the publisher that they are lying dead in the office.

Insurrection at Trinidad. Extract of a letter dated Trinidad de Cuba, January 17, received by Messrs. Topliff, of the Boston Exchange reading room, per brig Adelaide, at that port: "It is some days since we were in great consternation by the revolting of some negroes, who set fire to two plantations—one, Mr. J. W. Baker's—and killed several men. They set fire to all his houses, which, being fire proof, were but slightly injured; destroyed his steam mill, carts, and all the utensils. They are now concealed in the high mountains, about 100 in number; but are closely pursued by our troops. Mr. Baker had a horse shot from under him, but he succeeded in arresting several of the rebels. The destruction is now over, and not likely to occur again."

Captain McLoon states that when he left, all the American merchants in the place were putting their property on board the shipping. It was reported that Mr. Baker had lost 2,000 hogsheads molasses, and had all his standing cane destroyed, and that the negroes were headed by a white Spaniard.

NILES' NATIONAL REGISTER.

FIFTH SERIES. No. 4.—VOL. IV.]

WASHINGTON CITY, MARCH 24, 1888.

[VOL. LIV.—WHOLE No. 1,882.]

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

PRINTED AND PUBLISHED, EVERY SATURDAY, BY WILLIAM OGDEN NILES, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

✂ The hon. George M. Keim, elected a member of congress from Pennsylvania, to supply the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Mr. Muhlenberg, appeared, was qualified and took his seat on Saturday last.

✂ The remains of the hon. Timothy J. Carter were interred on Saturday last, after the usual ceremonies in the hall of the house of representatives. The president and vice president of the United States, the heads of departments, the members of both houses of congress, and a large body of citizens and strangers attended the funeral.

OVERTON CARR, esq., doorkeeper of the house of representatives, died on the 19th inst. On Thursday last the house adjourned at 4 o'clock for the purpose of attending his funeral. Mr. Carr was an old and faithful servant, and was warmly esteemed by a numerous body of friends.

DR. NATHANIEL BOWDITCH, the most learned and astute mathematician in this country, died in Boston on the 16th inst., in the 65th year of his age. His translation of the Mecanique Celeste, with annotations, is left unfinished.

THE HON. JOHN M. PATTON, of the house of representatives, has been elected a member of the executive council of Virginia, in the place of Mr. McFarland. We do not know whether Mr. Patton has decided to accept this distinguished mark of the respect and confidence of his native state; but we express the common sentiment when we say, that there is not in the house of representatives a more able and efficient member, or one whose absence will be more deeply felt or sincerely deplored.

MISSISSIPPI. The Vicksburg Sentinel of the 1st inst. states that the governor has ordered a new election for two members of congress, to serve during the remainder of the 25th congress. The election to be held on the 23d and 24th of April. The Gallatin Star nominates general A. G. Brown of Copia, and Roger Barton of Marshall, and from this it is inferred by the Sentinel that Messrs. Claiborne and Gholson, are withdrawn from the course. Messrs. Prentiss and Word are up for re-election.

THE PHOENIX BANK investigation closed on Saturday last, and the committee have returned to Albany. The facts disclosed have elicited much comment, and form a curious chapter in the history of modern banking. We will publish the report of the committee, and such portions of the testimony as will enable our readers to understand the whole matter.

FROM THE ARMY—OFFICIAL. Information has been received at the war department from Fort Jupiter, Florida, as late as the 7th March, which states that, up to that time, more than three hundred Indians and one hundred and fifty Seminole negroes had come in. From information derived from them, it was believed that Sam Jones and his party were lying concealed on the islands of the Everglades. Alligator and his party on the west of the O-kee-cho-bee, and Co-a-co-o-choe, with his band in the swamps of the St. Lucie. It was also reported there, that many of the Mickasukies were making their way in small parties of two, three, and four, back to the Wahoo and Withlacoochee. It is evident that they will not fight again if they can avoid it; their sole object being to get out of the way of the whites, and procure the means of subsistence. It is believed that nearly all their cattle have been destroyed, and most of their horses captured. Abraham says that there are not more than fifteen or twenty negroes left in the nation.

In order to search the Everglades, and if possible to find and dislodge the Indians from the islands, six companies of artillery under colonel Bankhead have been sent from Indian river to Key Biscayne, where they are to take boats and proceed by New river into the Everglades. Major Lauderdale, with two hundred Tennesseans, and a company of the 2d artillery, under lieutenant Anderson, are already on New river, having marched from Fort Jupiter on the 2d instant. Lieutenant Powell, of the navy, is to co-operate in this movement, which will give colonel Bankhead a moving force of nearly six hundred men. [Globe.]

Letters had been received at Charleston, S. C. which state that Capt. Higgins and William Redding, of the steamboat Alabama, while on a gunning excursion on the 5th inst. on New river, about twenty-five miles north of Key Biscayne, were killed by a party of Indians. Col. Pierce made an attempt to discover the Indians, but failed to do so.

Extract of a letter received in Savannah from an officer of the army, dated

"FORT MELLON, (E. F.) Feb. 10, 1888.

Report says that Coacocochhe (Wild Cat) is now on an island in the most extensive lake yet discovered in Florida. (Cheechoobee.) It is so distant from the shore as not to be visible. Here he has collected his women and children. Two hundred head of cattle were taken on the 28th of January by the army. The Indians appear determined to fight to the last: so the war is no nearer its termination. to all appearances, than when it first began."

NEW HAMPSHIRE. Mr. Hill has been re-elected governor of this state by a majority of two or three thousand votes. The following are the returns from 185 towns:

For Isaac Hill,	24896
Jas. Wilson, jr.,	23267

1109

The result in the legislature is doubtful—but, it is said that the senate will be administration, by a majority of two or three, and that the lower house will be comprised of a majority of whigs. We will give the particulars in our next.

GEN. SCOTT, who was confined at Albany for several days, by indisposition, produced by fatigue and exposure, arrived at New York on Wednesday last on his way to Washington. The whole frontier was quiet and no danger was apprehended of a renewal of hostilities by the patriots.

The following resolution, introduced by the hon. J. McDonell, has passed the senate of Michigan. It is a just and well deserved compliment.

Resolved, by the senate of Michigan, that the vigilant and energetic conduct of major general Scott, of the United States army, in sustaining the neutrality of the United States, and preserving the peace of the northern and northwestern frontier is deserving of the highest approbation; and that however the people of Michigan may sympathize with those struggling for the advancement of human liberty, yet the supremacy of the laws of the union, and the preservation of the faith of treaties is by them esteemed a paramount duty.

FOREIGN NEWS.

LATE FROM ENGLAND. The packet ship Roscoe, captain Delano, has arrived from Liverpool bringing London papers to the 23d and Liverpool papers to the 24th of February.

The abandonment of Navy Island has led the British public to suppose the Canada war at an end, and the newspapers are discussing other topics.

The common council of London have passed resolutions conferring the freedom of the city of London on the American minister, Mr. Stevenson.

Mr. Grote's motion for the ballot in the house of commons, received 200 votes against 317. Of the two hundred votes for the ballot, only one was given by a tory, sir George Sinclair; the rest were of the party who support the present government. Among the 317 votes against the ballot, there were not more than 63 whigs, of whom 18 were members of the government, and of the remainder half a dozen have been by no means uniform supporters of the administration.

Thus it appears that the British ministry are backed in their resistance to the ballot by only about 45 or 50 of their own party, and lord John Russell is voting and speaking against four-fifths of his own supporters. The party in favor of the ballot in England is an increasing one.

In the house of commons on February the 20th, Mr. Hume moved for "copies of all the letters between Mr. Hume, Mr. Roebuck, and any other members of parliament with M. Papineau, Mr. Mackenzie, Dr. Duncombe, and any other individuals who have held public situations in the provinces of Upper and Lower Canada, which have been seized in those provinces or otherwise come into the possession of government.

Sir G. Grey said that no such papers were in the hands of the government, and no return could be made. Mr. Hume replied that journals supposed to be in the confidence of the government had spoken of such papers, that these statements had led to erroneous impressions, that he felt it due to himself to make such a motion, and that if any correspondence was intercepted with his name to it he was anxious that it should be produced. Sir G. Grey again said that the return must be nil, but Mr. Hume pressed the motion and it was agreed to.

In the house of lords on the 22d of February, lord Brougham said he held in his hand a petition, which gave him very great pleasure and some pride to present, signed by between 5,000 and 6,000 (and might have been signed by 50,000 or 60,000 if time had been given,) chiefly of the principal merchants of the town and port of Liverpool against negro slavery, or in other words the apprentice system. When he recollected that the merchants of that town appeared as petitioners at their lordship's bar against regulating the space between decks of the slave trader, on the ground that such regulation would ruin them, and afterwards heard at the bar against abolishing the trade of negro slavery, on the ground that such abolition would ruin them, it was most delightful to find that their views had so altered, and their minds become now so enlightened as to cause them to approach their lordships with one voice, without a dissentient voice, praying the house to put an entire end to slavery.—(hear.)—The noble and learned lord then gave notice that he should move for a copy of any despatch which had been sent out to the governor of Guiana touching an act which goes to revive the slave trade on a large scale, and the order in council issued by her majesty on the 5th of July; and named Friday week for his taking the sense of the house on the issue and expediency of recalling that order.

Rochdale flannel market. Monday. We have to report the same monotonous state of this market as we have had occasion to do for the last few weeks, viz: not much doing, with prices stationary, and no immediate prospect of amendment. In the wool trade little passing different from last week, except the turn perhaps in favor of the purchaser.

FRANCE. London, Feb. 23. The Paris papers of Wednesday have reached us by our usual express. Their principal contents relate to the financial and commercial changes which are at this moment in agitation (if not in contemplation) before the French chambers, namely, the augmentation of the duties on hempen and flaxen yarn.

The French commercial men now seek to ruin our distilleries, by offering to make it a condition that the duties on linen yarn shall not be increased provided our government will consent to reduce the present duties on brandy.

The responsible editor of La Mode, a Carlist journal, was sentenced on Tuesday to pay a fine of 4,000 francs, and to be imprisoned for six months, for having personally attacked the king in that print.

SPAIN. Cadiz papers of the 9th of February, state that the captain general had received a despatch from the captain general of Andalusia, confirming the complete route of the faction between Beaza and Ubeda, and requesting the commandant of Cadiz to forward a duplicate of the despatches to the governor of Gibraltar. The despatch states that more than 3,000 prisoners were taken, besides a great quantity of arms, ammunition and other effects.

The intelligence from Madrid comes down to the 12th of February. The Carlist chief Jaba, who arrived in the district of Pena Aguilera, near Toledo, in the middle of January, with thirteen men, found himself in three weeks at the head of one thousand. A despatch from general Sanz states that on the 5th of February he attacked the united bands of Barilla, Tallada and Patillos, with success.

KENTUCKY RESOLUTIONS.

Joint resolutions in relation to the currency, and the administration of the general government.

1. Resolved, That the general assembly of the commonwealth of Kentucky have seen with deep regret the derangement in the currency and domestic exchanges, the general prostration of the commercial and manufacturing business, the reduction in the price of agricultural products of the people of this state, in common with the people of the United States, which occurred on the suspension of the banks to pay specie during the last spring, and which still continues, to the great distress of the country.

2. Resolved, That this deplorable state of things has been, in the opinion of this general assembly, mainly produced by improvident, rash, and arbitrary acts and proceedings of the executive branch of the federal government, commencing with the veto of the bill to recharter the late bank of the United States, followed by the removal of the deposits of the public money, contrary to law, from its assigned custody, and terminating in the treasury order, exacting specie in all payments for the public lands, which was issued not only without constitutional or legal authority, but in disregard of the known opinion of the legislative branch of the general government.

3. Resolved, That the general assembly have seen with surprise and regret that the present executive of the United States, instead of manifesting becoming sympathy with a suffering people, and recommending measures to relieve them, and restore that prosperity of which they have been wantonly deprived by the administration of his predecessor and himself, has exhibited, in his late messages to congress, a cold indifference to the lamentable condition of the country, and a solicitude only to supply the wants of the treasury, and to protect the interests of the official corps.

4. Resolved, That the system of sub-treasuries, proposed by the president of the United States, is a dangerous innovation, tending to augment the executive power to an alarming extent, to the engrossment by the executive of the United States, of all the paper emissions; to place in its possession, or under its control, a great portion of the specie of the country; to abuse, waste, and corruption; and, finally, to the consummation of that perilous union of the purse and sword in the hands and under the power of one man, at the imminent hazard of the purity and the very existence of our free institutions.

5. Resolved, That the people and their government are one and indivisible, and that any attempt to separate them, in interests, in currency, or in fortune, can only proceed from insensibility or infidelity to the duties of the relation in which they stand to each other.

6. Resolved, That the general assembly have seen, with great satisfaction, that a measure fraught with such fatal danger as the experiment of sub-treasuries, was defeated at the late session of congress by the vote of the immediate representatives of the people; and protesting, as the general assembly now do, solemnly against it if it shall again be proposed, they request their senators and representatives of the state of Kentucky, in congress, to continue to oppose its adoption with the utmost of their zeal and ability.

7. Resolved, That the general assembly have seen with painful regret that the executive of the United States, profiting neither by his own experience nor that of his predecessors, appears resolved to persevere in a series of experiments and untried expedients, fatal to the prosperity and dangerous to the liberties of the people.

8. Resolved, That it is the duty of the general government to secure a general medium of circulation, of uniform value, throughout the United States; and that the state of Kentucky has a deep interest in the faithful performance of that duty.

9. Resolved, That all experience has attested that the agency of a well-regulated bank of the United States, administered by a corporation blending public and private interests, and under public and private control, is best adapted to furnish and maintain a sound currency, to facilitate and render uniform domestic exchanges, and to inspire general confidence.

10. Resolved, That the administration of the general government, of late years, has been characterized by wasteful extravagance, inasmuch that the expenditures of the government have risen in the short space of eight years, from about thirteen millions to the enormous sum of thirty-two millions of dollars.

11. Resolved, That the general assembly have beheld with surprise and just alarm the abuse, encroachments, and usurpations of the executive department of the general government, since the election of the late president of the United States, in the universal proscription of all who do not conform to the creed of the dominant party; in a new and fearful version of the power of dismission from office; in the illegal and arbitrary removal of the public deposits; in the suppression of bills which had passed both houses of congress, thereby preventing the exercise of the constitutional check upon the veto power; in the promulgation of an edict, by which an unconstitutional discrimination was made between payments by a common people into the public treasury, and finally in procuring, through its influence and partisans, the violation of a public record, the common property of the present generation and of posterity, the faithful preservation of which was solemnly enjoined by the constitution of the United States.

12. Resolved, That the executive department of the general government ought to be subjected to just restraints, and brought back to its constitutional limit; that economy, retrenchment, and reduction in the expenditure of the public treasure should be enforced, and that every consideration of safety, of interest, and pride of national character, demands a thorough reform in the administration of the general government.

13. Resolved, That the governor of this commonwealth be requested to transmit a copy of the preceding resolutions to each of the governors of the several states of the union, with a request to lay them before the legislatures of their respective state; and also a copy to each of the senators and representatives of the state of Kentucky in the congress of the United States, to be laid before the respective houses.

Resolutions concerning the iron and coal trade.

1. Resolved by the general assembly of the commonwealth of Kentucky, That the town of Greenupburg, in Greenup county, Kentucky, is a suitable and proper position for a national foundry; and that there are many advantages united at that point, peculiar to the place and its localities, as a site for national purposes, not to be found in connexion with any position elsewhere in the western states.

2. Resolved, That many of the locks and dams now being erected on the Kentucky, Licking, and Green rivers, as parts and portions of the system of internal improvements adopted by the state, would, in the opinion of the general assembly, be suitable and convenient positions for a national foundry.

3. Resolved, as the opinion of the general assembly, That the general government ought to cause the positions referred to in the foregoing resolutions to be examined by competent agents and engineers before any position is selected by congress as the site of a national foundry on the western waters.

4. Resolved, That the senators and representatives in congress from the state of Kentucky be requested to lay copies of the foregoing report and resolutions before the houses of which they are members respectively, and before the president of the United States and heads of departments, and to use their influence at such time, and in such manner, as they may deem most proper to carry the same into full effect.

5. Resolved, That the governor be requested to forward copies of the foregoing resolutions to each of the senators and members of congress from this state.

THE NEUTRALITY BILL.

The following is the "neutrality bill" as it was passed on the 10th inst. The Globe says it was approved by the president on the same day, and instructions immediately forwarded from the departments to the civil and military officers on the Canada frontier, to enforce the execution of it by all the means in their power. It is expected that our fellow citizens in that part of the country will, at once, submit to the law, and return peaceably to their homes.

An act supplementary to an act entitled "An act in addition to the act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States, and to repeal the acts therein mentioned," approved twentieth of April, eighteen hundred and eighteen.

Be it enacted by the senate and house of representatives of the United States of America in congress assembled, That the several collectors, naval officers, surveyors, inspectors of customs, the marshals, and deputy marshals of the United States, and every other officer who may be specially empowered for the purpose by the president of the United States, shall be, and they are hereby respectively authorized, and required to seize and detain any vessel or any arms or munitions of war which may be provided or prepared for any military expedition or enterprise against the territory or dominions of any foreign prince or state, or of any colony, district or people continuous with the United States, and with whom they are at peace, contrary to the sixth section of the act passed on the twentieth of April, eighteen hundred and eighteen, entitled "An act in addition to the act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States, and to repeal the acts therein mentioned," and retain possession of the same until the decision of the president be had thereon, or until the same shall be released as hereinafter directed.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the several officers mentioned in the foregoing section shall be, and they are hereby respectively authorized and required to seize any vessel or vehicle, and all arms or munitions of war, about to pass the frontier of the United States for any place within any foreign state or colony, continuous with the United States, where the character of the vessel or vehicle, and the quantity of arms and munitions, or other circumstances shall furnish probable cause to believe that the said vessel or vehicle, arms, or munitions of war are intended to be employed by the owner or owners thereof, or any other person or persons, with his or their privacy, in carrying on any military expedition or operations within the territory or dominions of any foreign prince or state, or any colony, district, or people continuous with the United States, and with whom the United States are at peace, and detain the same until the decision of the president be had for the restoration of the same, or until such property shall be discharged by the judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction; Provided, that nothing in this act contained be so construed as to extend to, or interfere with any trade in arms or munitions of war, conducted in vessels by sea with any port or place whatsoever, or with any other trade which might have been lawfully carried on before the passage of this act, under the law of nations and the provisions of the act hereby amended.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the officer making any seizure under this act, to make application, with due diligence, to the district judge of the district court of the United States within which such seizure may be made, for a warrant to justify the detention of the property so seized; which warrant shall be granted on oath or affirmation, showing that there is probable cause to believe that the property so seized is intended to be used in a manner contrary to the provisions of this act; and if said judge shall refuse to issue such warrant, or application therefor shall not be made by the officer making such seizure within a reasonable time, not exceeding ten days thereafter, the said property shall forthwith be restored to the owner. But if the said judge shall be satisfied that the seizure was justified under the provisions of this act, and issue his warrant accordingly, then the same shall be detained by the officer so seizing said property, until the president shall order it to be restored to the owner or claimant, or until it shall be discharged in due course of law, on the petition of the claimant, as hereinafter provided.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the owner or claimant of any property seized under this act, may file his petition in the circuit or district court of the United States in the district where such seizure was made, setting forth the facts in the case, and thereupon such court shall proceed, with all convenient despatch, after causing due notice to be given to the district attorney and officer making such seizure, to decide upon the said case, and order restoration of the property, unless it shall appear that the seizure was authorized by this act; and the circuit and district courts shall have jurisdiction, and are hereby vested with full power and authority, to try and determine all cases which may arise under this act, and all issues in fact arising under it, shall be decided by a jury in the manner now provided by law.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That whenever the officer making any seizure under this act shall have applied for and obtained a warrant for the detention of the property, or the claimant shall have filed a petition for its restoration, and failed to obtain it, and the property so seized shall have been in the custody of the officer for the term of three calendar months from the date of such seizure, it shall and may be lawful for the claimant or owner to file with the officer a bond to the amount of double the value of the property so seized and detained, with at least two sureties, to be approved by the judge of the circuit or district court, with a condition that the property when restored, shall not be used or employed by the owner or owners thereof, or by any other person or persons with his or their privity, in carrying on any military expedition or operations within the territory or dominions of any foreign prince or state, or any colony, district, or people, conterminous with the United States, with whom the United States are at peace; and thereupon the said officer shall restore such property to the owner or claimant thus giving bond: Provided, That such restoration shall not prevent seizure from being again made, in case there may exist fresh cause to apprehend a new violation of any of the provisions of this act.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That every person apprehended and committed for trial, for any offence against the act hereby amended, shall, when admitted to bail for his appearance, give such additional security as the judge admitting him to bail may require, not to violate, nor to aid in violating, any of the provisions of the act hereby amended.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That whenever the president of the United States shall have reason to believe that the provisions of this act have been, or are likely to be violated, that offences have been, or are likely to be, committed against the provisions of the act hereby amended, within any judicial district, it shall be lawful for him, in his discretion, to direct the judge, marshal, and district attorney, of each district, to attend at such place within the district, and for such a time, as he may designate, for the purpose of the more speedy and convenient arrest and examination of persons charged with the violation of the act hereby amended; and it shall be the duty of every such judge, or other officer, when any such requisition shall be received by him, to attend at the place and for the time therein designated.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the president of the United States, or each person as he may empower for that purpose, to employ such part of the land or naval forces of the United States, or of the militia, as shall be necessary to prevent the violation, and to enforce the due execution, of this act, and the act hereby amended.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That this act, shall continue in force for the period of two years, and no longer.

Vice president of the United States, and President of the senate.

Approved, March 10th, 1838.

M. VAN BUREN.

THE FREEDOM OF ELECTIONS.

The following is a copy of the bill introduced in the house of representatives, on the 5th of this month, by Mr. Bell, of Tennessee, and now depending in that body:

A bill to secure the freedom of elections.

Whereas complaints are made that officers of the United States, or persons holding offices or employments under the authority of the same, other than the heads of the chief executive departments, or such officers as stand in the relation of constitutional advisers of the president, have been removed from office, or dismissed from their employment, upon political grounds, or for opinion's sake; and whereas such a practice is manifestly a violation of the freedom of elections; an attack upon the public liberty, and a high misdemeanor: and

Whereas complaints are also made that officers of the United States, or persons holding offices or employments under the authority of the same, are in the habit of intermeddling in elections, both state and federal, otherwise than by giving their votes: and whereas such a practice is a violation of the freedom of elections, and a gross abuse, which ought to be discountenanced by the appointing power, and prohibited by law: and

Whereas complaints are also made that, pending the late election of president and vice president of the United States, offices and employments were distributed and conferred, in many instances, under circumstances affording a strong presumption of corruption, or that they were conferred as the inducements to, or the reward of, influence employed or to be employed in said election; and whereas such a practice in the administration of the patronage of the government will speedily destroy the purity and freedom of the elective franchise, and undermine the free system of government now happily established in these United States: therefore, to prevent the recurrence of any practices which may give rise to similar complaints in future,

Be it enacted, &c. That, from and after the first day of July next, no officer, agent, or contractor, or other person holding any office or employment of trust or profit under the constitution and laws of the United States, shall, by the contribution of money or other valuable thing, or by the use of the franking privilege, or the abuse of any other official privilege or function, or by threats and menaces, or in any other manner, intermeddle with the election of any member or members of either house of congress, or of the president or vice president of the United States, or of the governor or other officer of any state, or of any member or members of the legislature of any state; and every such officer or other person offending therein shall be held to be guilty of a high misdemeanor; and, upon conviction in any court of the United States having jurisdiction thereof, shall pay a fine not exceeding one thousand dollars; and any officer other than the president, vice president, and judges of the courts of the United States, so convicted, shall be thereupon removed from office, and shall be ever after incapable of holding any office or place of trust under the authority of the United States: provided, that nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to interfere with the right of suffrage, as secured by the constitution: and provided, further, that nothing herein contained shall so operate as to prevent the president, or the head of any department who is vested by law with the power of appointing inferior officers, from removing from office, at any time, any incumbent who the president or the head of a department, as the case may be, shall be satisfied has intermeddled in any election, state or federal.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the first day of July next, no officer who, by the constitution and laws of the United States, is authorized to appoint, or nominate and appoint, any officer or agent of the government, shall, by himself, or by any other person or persons in his behalf, give or procure to be given, or promise to give or procure to be given, any office, place, or employment to any person or persons whatsoever, with intent to corrupt or bribe him or them, or upon agreement that such person or persons to whom, or for whose use, or on whose behalf such gift or promise shall be made, shall exert his or their influence in any election, or by himself or themselves, or by any other person or persons, at his or their solicitation, endeavor to secure the election of any person or persons to represent any state, or any district in any state, in congress, or of any person to be president or vice president of the United States, or of any person to be governor or other officer of any state, or of any person or persons to be a member or members of the legislature of any state; and every such officer offending therein shall be held guilty of a high misdemeanor, and, upon conviction in any court of the United States having jurisdiction thereof, shall pay a fine not exceeding five thousand dollars; and any officer, other than the president or the judges of the courts of the United States, so convicted, shall be thereupon removed from office, and shall be incapable ever after of holding any office or place of trust under the authority of the United States; and every person who shall receive or accept, by himself, or by any other person or persons, in trust, for or in behalf of such person, any office, place, or employment, with the intent aforesaid, shall be held to be guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction in any court of the United States having jurisdiction thereof, shall pay a fine not exceeding one thousand dollars, be removed or dismissed from such office, place, or employment, and shall be incapable ever after of holding any office or place of trust under the authority of the United States.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the several fines imposed by this act shall, when collected, be paid into the treasury, as other moneys belonging to the United States.

FLORIDA WAR.

The following, among other, papers relating to the war in Florida, were transmitted to the house of representatives on Monday the 12th inst.

Head Quarters, Army of the South,

Fort Jupiter, Feb. 11, 1838.

Sir: I reported to the adjutant general on the 9th inst. the operations of this division of the army south of this post to that date, and the arrangement which I had entered into with the chiefs Tuskegee and Hallek Hago. The arrangement is, that they are to come in with their families and people, and are to await the decision of the president whether they shall remain in the country or not. I promised to recommend that they be permitted to remain, and that a portion of this territory be assigned to them as their residence.

Before presenting my views on that subject, and redeeming my pledge to the Indians, it may be proper for me to state my own position in regard to the question of emigration, so that in what I shall say in relation to the Seminoles, my views in regard to the general principle may not be mistaken. Believing, as I do, that the Indians cannot, under our constitution, have a separate political existence within an independent state of this union, without the consent of the state, I believe that it is due to the states in which they are congregated in large bodies, to remove them whenever they are pressed upon by the white population, and their lands become necessary to the agricultural wants of the community. And I hold that congress, and not the Indians, are to determine the proper time for their removal. We, in our federal capacity, owe the Indians protection; not that protection secured to our own citizens by the equal operation of our laws, for that, in their condition, would be merely nominal protection; but we owe them, in their individual and collective capacity, that protection which the parent owes to the child, or the guardian to the ward; and to secure them that protection, we must place them beyond the operation of state laws. With the fullest conviction, therefore, not only of the policy, but of the justice and humanity of the measure, I am in favor of their entire emigration; and I have supported that policy under four successive administrations. But I believe we should not apply the principle until the white population are in contact with, or intermingled among them. The state of things at which I consider their removal imperative, actually existed when the tribes inhabiting Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Missouri, Mississippi, and South Alabama, were sent to the west: that state of things actually exists in relation to the Cherokees in Tennessee, North Alabama, and Georgia; and, regardless of the opposition made to the measure, they should be at once removed.

In regard to the Seminoles, we have committed the error of attempting to remove them when their lands were not required for agricultural purposes; when they were not in the way of the white inhabitants; and when the greater portion of their country was an unexplored wilderness, of the interior of which we were as ignorant as of the interior of China. We exhibit, in our present contest, the first instance, perhaps, since the commencement of authentic history, of a nation employing an army to explore a country, (for we can do little more than explore it,) or attempting to remove a band of savages from one unexplored wilderness to another.

As a soldier, it is my duty, I am aware, not to comment upon the policy of the government, but to carry it out in accordance with my instructions. I have endeavored faithfully to do so; but the prospect of terminating the war in any reasonable time is any thing but flattering. My decided opinion is, that unless immediate emigration be abandoned, the war will continue for years to come, and at constantly accumulating expense. Is it not then well worthy the serious consideration of an enlightened government, whether, even if the wilderness we are traversing could be inhabited by the white man, (which is not the fact,) the object we are contending for would be worth the cost? I certainly do not think it would; indeed, I do not consider the country south of Chickasaw Hatchee worth the medicines we shall expend in driving the Indians from it.

If I were permitted, and it is with great diffidence I venture to make the suggestion, I would allow them to remain, and would assign them the country west of the Kissimmee, Okeechobee, and Panai Okee, and east of Peace creek, south, to the extreme of Florida. That would satisfy them; and they might hold it on the express condition that they should forfeit their right to it, if they should either commit depredations upon the white inhabitants, or pass the boundaries assigned to them without the written permission of the military commander or agent.

By placing an agency and authorizing trading-houses on Charlotte's harbor, they could be soon concentrated; and stationing a competent military force there and at Tampa Bay, they might be readily controlled, and, if necessary, removed from the country, should they become troublesome, or fail to fulfil their engagements. I respectfully recommend the measure to your consideration and that of the president, as the only means of terminating, immediately, a most disastrous war, and leaving the troops disposable for other service. I desire a decision as soon as your convenience will permit, as, by the middle of April, at farthest, the troops must be withdrawn from all the posts in the interior, to preserve their lives.

Should it be determined to remove the Indians by force, and to continue the war until they submit unconditionally, I desire that the communication be confidential, and that the matter be considered confidential at Washington, in order that I may have information of it before it can be communicated by letter-writers to others; for there can be but little doubt of their flying to the swamps again and renewing the war, should the decision be to remove them.

If it be determined that the Indians now in Florida remain, it would be better that those who are at New Orleans and Charleston, with the exception of one or two of the chiefs, be sent to the west; their force would thus be divided and weakened, and many of the relations of those sent west might soon be induced to follow.

This communication will be delivered to you by my aid-de-camp, lieutenant Linnard, a highly valuable officer, whom I earnestly recommend to your favorable consideration and attention.

I have the honor to be, most respectfully, your obedient servant,

TH. S. JESUP,

Major General commanding.

The Hon. J. R. POINSETT,
Secretary of War, Washington city.

Wascissa, Feb. 12, 1838.

Dear Sir: The enclosed was sealed yesterday for the mail; last night, however, we had a repetition of the scenes previously detailed to you; confidence had begun to be restored, and but a few days since we had induced our frontier settlers to return to their habitations. They have been, however, again alarmed from them, and, as the assailed point is but a mile or a mile and a half from my house, it was again all night a garrison for the refugees. Indeed, sir, you cannot estimate correctly all my feelings on such occasions. Almost alone, with a few scattered hamlets around, (col. Murat and myself,) we witness ourselves insulted; our neighbors driven from their settlements; their homes in some instances burnt and families murdered; with no other ability, as private citizens, than to stand to our arms and houses, and protect those who seek our protection. We can do no more; we do our duty in performing so much; in maintaining our positions, which, in the present state of the contest, have become military ones. But we are mortified that we can do no more, or that such has been and continues to be the disposition for the defence of this frontier, that we can only stand by our arms, and say our house and scalps are once more safe; but without the power to pursue the enemy, or to search for him. Without this can be done by the presence of a regularly organized force, and for the war, I apprehend, seriously apprehend, Jefferson county will present the scenes which have been played with so much suffering in Alachua. It was as much as we could do, at the late attack, to induce the people of this immediate vicinity to remain at their homes. What will be the result of this I cannot say; I fear, however, they will quit and leave the plantations to stand the brunt. Fortunately for us, some marines passed by here yesterday; we have despatched a courier to bring them back, and shall station them for a time at the house assailed last night. But, sir, we cannot close this war without more harmony and concert of action, and the presence, on the whole frontier assailed, of an organized force, mounted in part, and ready to act promptly. They must, in fact, be always in the stirrup, beating the bush, and searching for these vagabond Indians. The war has assumed a most serious character, but has been, and continues to be, mistaken by all who have the management of it. Another year's blundering, and middle Florida becomes what eastern Florida is. We will stand our ground; but this will not end the contest by catching and making examples of the disturbers of our peace.

Yours,

J. GADSDEN.

In the "Globe" of 12th the instant we find the following reply of the secretary of war to the above letter of general Jesup:

Copy of a letter from the secretary of war to major general Jessup, dated

Department of War, March 1, 1838.

Sir: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your communication of the 11th of February, which was delivered to me by your aid-de-camp, lieutenant Linnard. The subject of it is one of deep interest, and I have given to it the most diligent and respectful consideration.

In the present stage of our relations with the Indians residing within the states and territories east of the Mississippi, including the Seminoles, it is useless to recur to the principles and motives which induced the government to determine their removal to the west. The acts of the executive and the laws of congress evince a determination to carry out the measure, and it is to be regarded as the settled policy of the country. In pursuance of this policy, the treaty of Paynes' Landing was made with the Seminoles, and the character of the officer employed on the part of the government is a guaranty of the perfectly fair manner in which that negotiation was conducted and concluded. Whether the government ought not to have waited until the Seminoles were pressed upon by the white population, and their lands become necessary to the agricultural wants of the community, is not a question for the executive now to consider. The treaty has been ratified, and is the law of the land, and the constitutional duty of the president requires that he should cause it to be executed. I cannot, therefore, authorize any arrangement with the Seminoles by which they will be permitted to remain, or assign them any portion of the territory of Florida as their future residence.

The department indulged the hope that, with the extensive means placed at your disposal, the war, by a vigorous effort, might be brought to a close this campaign. If, however, you are of opinion that, from the nature of the country, and the character of the enemy, such a result is impracticable, and that it is advisable to make a temporary arrangement with the Seminoles, by which the safety of the settlements and the posts will be secured throughout the summer, you are at liberty to do so. In that event, you will establish posts at Tampa, and on the eastern shore, and wherever else they are, in your opinion, necessary to preserve the peace of the country; and I would suggest the propriety of leaving colonel Zadock Taylor, of the first infantry, in command of them. In removing north with your forces, you may make similar arrangements with the other bands. I deem it, however, of great importance that every exertion should be made to chastise the marauding Indians who have committed depredations upon the inhabitants of the people of middle Florida. I beg you will address yourself to James Gadsden for information on this subject, and you may, if you think proper, yield to his suggestion of leaving a battalion for the protection of the people of that neighborhood. It is hoped, however, that you will be able to put it out of the power of these Indians to do any further mischief. They ought to be captured or destroyed. As soon as, in your opinion, it can be done with safety, you will reduce your force of mounted men from Georgia, Alabama, and Tennessee.

Very respectfully,

Your most obedient servant,

J. R. POINSETT.

Maj. gen. THOS. S. JESUP,
Com'g army of the south, Fort Jupiter, Florida.

AFFAIR OF THE CAROLINE.

The following correspondence between the secretary of state of the United States and the British minister at Washington was communicated by Sir Francis Head, to the legislature of Upper Canada, on the 8d instant:

Washington, Feb. 6, 1838.

Sir: With reference to the letter, which, by direction of the president, you addressed to me on the 5th and 19th ultimo, respecting the capture and destruction of the steamboat "Caroline" by a Canadian force on the American side of the Niagara river, within the jurisdiction of the state of New York, I have now the honor to communicate to you the copy of a letter which I have received upon that subject from Sir Francis Head, lieutenant governor of the province of Upper Canada, with divers reports and depositions annexed.

The piratical character of the steamboat "Caroline," and the necessity of self-defence and self-preservation under which her majesty's subjects acted in destroying that vessel, would seem to be sufficiently established.

At the time when the event happened, the ordinary laws of the United States were not enforced within the frontier district of the state of New York. The authority of the law was overborne publicly by piratical violence; through such violence her majesty's subjects in Upper Canada had already severely suffered, and they were threatened with still farther injury and outrage. This extraordinary state of things appears, naturally and necessarily, to have impelled them to consult their own security by pursuing and destroying the vessel of their piratical enemy, wheresoever they might find her.

I avail myself of this occasion, &c. &c.

H. S. FOX.

The Hon. JOHN FORSYTH.

Department of State,
Washington, Feb. 13, 1838.

Sir: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your note of the 6th instant, communicating a copy of a letter from Sir Francis Head, lieutenant governor of the province of Upper Canada, respecting the capture and destruction of the steamboat "Caroline" by a Canadian force on the American side of the Niagara river within the jurisdiction of the state of New York, together with the reports and depositions thereto annexed.

The statement of the facts which these papers present is at variance with the information communicated to this government respecting that transaction: but it is not intended to enter at present upon an examination of the details of the case, as steps have been taken to obtain the fullest evidence that can be had of the particulars of the outrage; upon the receipt of which it will be made the subject of a formal complaint to the British government for redress. Even admitting that the documents transmitted with your note contain a correct statement of the occurrence, they furnish no justification of the aggression committed upon the territory of the United States—an aggression which was the more unexpected, as Sir Francis Head, in his speech at the opening of the parliament of Upper Canada, had expressed his confidence in the disposition of this government to restrain its citizens from taking part in the conflict which was raging in that province; and added, that having communicated with the government of the state of New York, and with yourself, he was then waiting for replies. It is not necessary to remind you that his expectations have been met by the adoption of measures on the part of the United States, as prompt and vigorous as they have been successful in repressing every attempt of the inhabitants of the frontier states to interfere unlawfully in that contest. The most serious obstacle thrown in the way of those measures was the burning of the Caroline, which, while it was of no service to her Britannic majesty's cause in Canada, had the natural effect of increasing the excitement on the border, which this government was endeavoring to allay.

I avail myself of this occasion, &c.

JOHN FORSYTH.

H. S. Fox, Esq. &c. &c.

Washington, Feb. 16, 1838.

Sir: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 13th instant, relating to the question of the capture and destruction of the piratical steamboat Caroline.

Although I cannot acquiesce in the view which the United States government are disposed to take of the facts connected with that transaction, yet, as this legation is not the final authority competent to decide the question on the part of Great Britain, and as you inform me that a representation will, in due time, be addressed to her majesty's government in England, I consider it most consistent with my duty to avoid entering at present into any controversy upon the subject. It will remain for her majesty's government at home, when the whole evidence of the case shall have been produced, to form such deliberate resolution thereupon as reason, honor, and justice shall dictate.

I avail myself of this occasion to renew to you, &c. &c.

H. S. FOX.

The Hon. JOHN FORSYTH.

ADDRESS FROM HENRY A. WISE, OF VA.

TO MY CONSTITUENTS.

I was second to Mr. Graves, in his late duel with Mr. Cilley. Its catastrophe has brought upon me much odium and reproach. Your representative is accountable to you for his personal as well as his political conduct; for by it he is worthy of you, or you are dishonored. I owe you an explanation, then, and I make it most cheerfully, because I know that you would gladly receive my vindication.

Judge me, then; you have the right. For what? Murder? No. All the false witnesses who pander for passion or prejudice could not convince you that I am a murderer. For dishonor? Worse than murder! The certificate of Mr. Cilley's second will assure you that he took not the least exception to my course. For participating in a duel, then—my own or that of another—at all? For that you should judge me. That is my offence. I admit it; and all I can dare ask is, that you will judge me fairly, according to that public sentiment which prevails among yourselves.

Why act as second for another, where there was no obligation to act? There was an obligation. I never acted as second for a friend but with two motives: first, to be in a position to reconcile his difference, if I could; second, to guard his honor and his life, if I could not. I felt bound to do this for a friend in this instance. I especially have been so situated as to compel me to admit this obligation; for, as I have often told you, my protection, in the discharge of my duties to you here, has depended upon my own trusty weapon, and a trusty friend, upon whom I have been daily liable to call to discharge the same obligation to me. Mr. Graves is one upon whom I would have called; and I felt obliged to do for him, what I would have called on him to do for me.

But, though competent to guard his honor and his life, was I competent to reconcile his difference? It is said that I myself was hostile to his antagonist. If so, I may have been incompetent. But I solemnly deny that I was hostile to Mr. Cilley. God knows whether I did not feel far more sympathy for him than many who pretend to deplore his fate. There had been a slight misunderstanding between us in debate, which passed off with the moment, and left not the trace of animosity behind. True, there was never, before or after that occasion, any intimacy between us, because we were never acquainted; but I was purely and proudly conscious of no malice towards that man, or I never could have consented to bear him a challenge. But, hostile to him or not, and though hostility might have prompted to incite another to seek his life—dark, and deep, and deadly hate must that have been! yet, my conduct proves that I did earnestly endeavor to prevent the shedding of his blood, by reconciling his difference with my friend; and the history of the tragedy proves, that not only I, but two other gentlemen, of known character and standing, who were never accused of hostility to him, and who might have overruled me by their voices and influence, could not reconcile that difference, or prevent its result. That history I now submit to you as I shall detail it, under the solemn sanction of an oath, to a committee of congress now investigating the causes which led to Mr. Cilley's death. The report of that committee I will send you as soon as it is made and printed. This statement supplies what the joint statement of Mr. Jones and myself omits, and that which it could not contain, because he could not vouch for what I alone, or others than himself, knew. And I send this in advance of the report of the committee, to arrest, in the midst of extraordinary excitement, that torrent of defamation which is now pouring from the vials of the wrath of those who would delight to destroy my reputation and usefulness as a public servant. I send it to suspend your judgment until I can be fully heard; to prevent you from blushing for me, until I am put to shame by the truth; and to stay your condemnation until I am fairly convicted by credible evidence.

HENRY A. WISE.

STATEMENT.

The hon. Jonathan Cilley, late a member of the house of representatives, fell in a duel with the hon. Wm. J. Graves, fairly fought between the hours of 3 p. m. and 4 p. m., Saturday, the 24th day of February, 1838, the challenge of which he freely accepted, and the terms of which, as to time, place, weapons, and distance, he himself, or his friends for him, prescribed.

As to the causes which led to this duel I am not the most competent witness. I presume that the hon. Wm. J. Graves himself can inform the committee better than any one else, from the nature of the case, of the facts and influences which operated on him to call Mr. Cilley to the field.

I was wholly ignorant of the fact that Mr. Graves bore, or was about to bear, a note from col. Webb to Mr. Cilley. I never saw that note until the 26th of February, two days after the duel. On the 21st of February, Mr. Graves informed me that he had borne a note to Mr. Cilley from col. Webb, calling for explanation. I rebuked him for having done so, upon the ground that his own previous relations with col. Webb did not justify the latter in imposing upon him such an office and its responsibilities. He replied, that Mr. Cilley had taken time to give him an answer, and we separated after a very short interview.

Afterwards, Mr. Graves called me out from my seat in the house, and informed me that he had seen Mr. Cilley again, and then, for the first time, detailed to me what Mr. Cilley had said in substance, verbally, during their interviews: That, "in declining to receive the note, he hoped it would not be thought disrespectful to him, (Mr. Graves); that he declined on the ground that he could not consent to be involved in personal difficulties with conductors of public journals for what he had thought proper to say in debate upon the floor; and that he did not decline upon any personal objections to col. Webb as a gentleman." Mr. Graves asked whether I thought that answer satisfactory? I replied that it certainly was satisfactory; that the reasons for declining to receive the note were very proper; that no more could be asked; and that all he had to do was, to return the note to col. Webb, with this answer of Mr. Cilley. He said Mr. Cilley's answer was verbal, merely; that to prevent any error in stating it to col. Webb, and to avoid all controversy with Mr. Cilley, in regard to its substance or terms, he would get him to put it in writing. And he left me, as I thought, for the purpose of obtaining from Mr. Cilley a written answer. I returned to my seat, and neither saw nor heard any of the interviews between Mr. Cilley and Mr. Graves, nor do I know when or where they occurred, or what transpired at them, except what I have been since told by Mr. Graves.

On the morning of the 22d, Mr. Graves informed me that he had called on Mr. Cilley, and requested him to put his answer in writing; that Mr. Cilley had requested him first to address him, (Mr. Cilley) a note, inquiring of him what he had said; that he had written to him a note, (the first in their correspondence,) and handed it to him in person; and that for answer, he had received the first note of Mr. Cilley, which he then exhibited to me. Mr. Graves was highly incensed at the tenor of this note, and I confess that it greatly surprised me, after what Mr. Graves told me he had said verbally in their interviews. Mr. Graves regarded the note—

First, as denying what he had alleged to his friends Mr. Cilley had said to him in conversation.

Secondly, as contemptuous and insulting to col. Webb, whose note he had borne.

Thirdly, as placing Mr. Graves himself in the humiliating attitude of supplication to him, (Mr. Cilley) to relieve him, (Mr. Graves) from "an unpleasant situation."

Fourthly, as saying, in effect, "I do not recognize col. Webb to be a gentleman, sir, but I respect you as one;" thereby inviting Mr. Graves to substitute himself for col. Webb.

Such was the construction which Mr. Graves put upon that letter, and I could not see, and cannot now, what other construction he could have put upon it, taken in connection with the conversations which he averred had passed previously between them; it seemed wholly irreconcilable with, and contradictory to, what had passed between them verbally. But, upon due consideration, he determined to offer Mr. Cilley again an opportunity to explain. He prepared his second letter, and sent it to Mr. Cilley by the honorable Mr. Menefee, as he has since informed me; I know nothing of what passed between Mr. Cilley and Mr. Menefee.

During the sitting of the house on the 22d, between the hours of 3 p. m. and 4 p. m., I think, Mr. Graves came to me with Mr. Cilley's reply, in which he denied the right of Mr. Graves to propound the question in his second note, and requested me to bear to Mr. Cilley a challenge which he had already written, and which he placed in my hands. I expressed my reluctance to be the bearer, told him I would confer with him again upon the subject, and returned to my seat to attend to the discussion of the bill in relation to the disturbances on the Canadian frontier; I addressed the house that evening, soon after which the house adjourned.

Mr. Graves walked with me from the capitol to my boarding house. I then repeated my objections to be the bearer of his challenge, and insisted that I would not bear it that evening; that I wanted time for reflection; that I could not do that service, under any circumstances, except for an intimate friend, who would make a like sacrifice, and incur a like responsibility for me; that I regarded him as such a friend, who had in fact shown every disposition to stand by me upon trying occasions; but I hoped that something might yet be done to avoid the alternative he had chosen; and that I must be permitted to delay the delivery of it until the next day, if I delivered it at all. I prevailed on him to wait until the next morning, when he called upon me again; said that nothing had occurred to change his determination; took the challenge and changed its phraseology; (I have not a copy of the first he put into my hands, nor do I recollect its terms;) and insisted that I should deliver it before the house met, on the 22d of February. I was prevailed on to do so; and accordingly, a few minutes before 12 m. on Friday the 22d, I called at Mr. Cilley's boarding house, and handed him the paper.

When I went into the sitting room at Mr. Birth's I met a gentleman whom I took to be Mr. Williams, the senator from Maine. We conversed a few minutes, and in a short time Mr. Pierce, the senator from New Hampshire, came in, followed by Mr. Cilley. Directly after saluting these gentlemen, Mr. Williams first, and Mr. Pierce soon after him, retired into an adjoining room, leaving Mr. Cilley and myself alone. I informed him that I bore him a note from Mr. Graves. He said, "I will receive it, sir." I handed him the challenge; he read it, and said, "Mr. Pierce, or some other friend, sir, will hand Mr. Graves my answer." I bowed and we parted. I went immediately to the house, and in the evening, after its adjournment, Mr. Jones came to my room, and handed Mr. Cilley's acceptance to Mr. Graves, as described in our joint statement. Mr. Graves, expecting to have a fight with pistols, had come to my room to examine a pair I had, and see whether they would suit him. He had not been practised in the use of any weapon, he told me, and desired me to have my pistols put in order to go out with him the next morning, and instruct him how to use them.

Soon after, Mr. Jones furnished me with the terms of the meeting. I left my room with Mr. Menefee, who had come in just as Mr. Jones and I were parting, about 6 p. m. I think, to show the terms to some of Mr. Graves's friends, and to submit to them whether they should be accepted. They were condemned as barbarous, and such as might properly be declined; but it was thought that they were intended to intimidate; that the distance was so great as, in some measure, to mitigate the severity of the weapon, and, therefore, I was advised that they should be accepted. Indeed, it was thought that the acceptance of such terms might avoid the duel altogether, inasmuch as the plain object of such propositions was either to make the duel fatal, or to deter Mr. Graves from accepting them; and if the latter was the object, the party proposing was most likely to fly from the terms himself.

I consented to accept the terms reluctantly, and before I did accept them, I endeavored to ascertain whether they could be complied with, by procuring a weapon within the appointed time. I rode to four different places to inquire whether a fit weapon could be got, and after a vain search for several hours, I went to Mr. Jones's room, and handed him my first note, about 9 o'clock, p. m. In that note I was particular to name that there should be but one ball to lessen the chances of a fatal shot, by confining the parties to the "downward horizontal position," until the word "fire," thus shortening the time in which they could take aim; and not knowing where to get a rifle or whether one could be got, the main object of the note was to gain time. I wished to gain time, not only to procure a fit rifle, but to afford an opportunity, if possible, to prevent the meeting. Indeed, I remarked to Mr. Jones verbally, that I knew of no person to whom I could apply with certainty of getting a tried weapon in the city of Washington, and I expected to be obliged to send to Philadelphia for one. He seemed to intimate that the time could not be postponed for that purpose: said that there must be fit weapons here, and asked if I could not procure one from the arsenal? I replied, that I should not risk an untried rifle, and told him that I would be obliged if he could inform me where a fit rifle could be got. I fixed upon the hour of 11 a. m. the next day, as the latest period when I would inform Mr. Jones whether Mr. Graves could be ready. I informed Mr. Graves of what I had done, and retired to rest.

About 2 o'clock at night, Mr. Menefee came to my room, awoke me out of sleep, and informed me that Mr. Graves's friends had procured for him a rifle, but, he said, it was in exceedingly bad order. The owner of it has since told me that it had not been used for more than eighteen months, and it was very rusty. I directed Mr. Menefee to have it cleaned as early as possible, and that it must be tried in the morning before Mr. Graves' life was hazarded on it.

Early the next morning, I went to the room of the hon. Mr. Hawes, where, according to appointment with Mr. Menefee the night previous, I expected to meet Mr. Graves. Not finding Mr. Graves there, I returned to Miss Queen's, my own boarding house, to breakfast, and found on my table, about 8 o'clock a. m. the note of Mr. Jones, informing me that he would be at Dr. Reilly's until 11 o'clock, a. m. on the 24th.

At ten o'clock, a. m. I went to Dr. Reilly's, and wrote Mr. Jones a note that Mr. Graves could not be ready by 12 m., and that I would inform him by 12 1-2 m. when he could be ready. I was still anxious to delay the meeting, and desirous to throw obstacles in the way of it for that day. At about 10 1-2 a. m. I found Mr. Graves at the arsenal, where he went to have the rifle cleaned, and I saw him try it several times at a mark. He was exceedingly awkward, shot badly, and I by no means liked the rifle he had. I feared very much the consequences of going out with him under such a total want of preparation, and skill, and was still more than ever anxious for delay, as were his other friends. But on my return to my room, about 11 1-2 a. m. I found two notes from Mr. Jones, a rifle, a powder flask, with powder and ball in it, lying on my table.

The first note, dated 10 1-2 a. m. in reply to mine of 10 a. m., stated that Mr. Jones had "the pleasure to inform" me that he had "an excellent rifle, in good order, which was at the service of Mr. Graves." The second note, which had not been delayed for an answer to the first, dated half an hour only after the first, tendered to me, "for the use of Mr. Graves the rifle referred to," and there were the rifle and its appendages. These notes and that rifle hastened the meeting. I dared delay no longer, without danger of a taunt for cowardice. Mr. Graves should have gone upon the ground, after this, under every disadvantage; but he should not have used the rifle sent him, because, though "an excellent rifle, in good order," Mr. Cilley had, of course, preferred another to it; and if Mr. Graves had missed with it, and been killed, I would have been justly chargeable with his death. The meeting was then to be had as soon as Mr. Graves' rifle could be cleaned, as a surgeon could be got, and as the parties could reach a field out of the District of Columbia. I saw Mr. Jones immediately, and we agreed upon 3 o'clock, p. m. as said in our joint statement.

I returned to Mr. Hawes' room, where Mr. Graves was, and informed him of the appointment. He then selected the hon. John J. Crittenden, of the senate, and the hon. R. H. Menefee, of the house, as the friends whom I was to consult. Mr. Graves retired, and whilst the rifle was being cleaned, I then submitted to Mr. Crittenden and Mr. Menefee the question, distinctly—what should be done in case the parties missed? We were all sure that Mr. Graves would miss often.

I understood positively from Mr. Graves, that he would not be satisfied with any admission short of what Mr. Cilley had made to him, verbally, in their interviews. Our object, then, was to adopt or suggest some form, or explanation, or admission, which should be as easy as possible for Mr. Cilley to make, and which should satisfy Mr. Graves. This was our study, and we unanimously decided that immediately after the first fire I should propose to Mr. Cilley, or his second, that he should assign some such reason, or make some such disclaimer, for declining to receive col. Webb's note from Mr. Graves, as he had made to Mr. Graves in their private conversation. Mr. Crittenden and Mr. Menefee wrote down what they thought Mr. Graves should be satisfied with. The one wrote:

"That in declining to receive from Mr. Graves the note from colonel Webb, Mr. Cilley was not influenced by considerations affecting the honor of col. Webb."

The other wrote:

"Mr. Cilley states that he did not decline to receive colonel Webb's communication from Mr. Graves in consequence of any personal exception to colonel Webb as a gentleman or a man of honor."

To these I added another form of admission, which should be accepted as satisfactory:

"Mr. Cilley declined to receive the communication from colonel Webb, at the hands of Mr. Graves, upon the ground that he, Mr. Cilley, did not hold himself answerable to colonel Webb for words spoken in debate, on the floor of the house of representatives."

These, or any admission approaching in substance to these, were to be considered satisfactory. I carried the written propositions with me, in my pocket, on the ground. The reason why Mr. Graves would not be satisfied with anything short of these, was because he alleged that Mr. Cilley had made both these admissions to him verbally.

As to what "transpired on the field," &c. &c., I must refer generally to the statement published by Mr. Jones and myself. But, as that statement is only of what occurred within our joint knowledge, besides the correspondence given upon information of others, I have a few particulars within my own knowledge to add.

The distance appointed was eighty yards. It is my firm belief that the distance stepped off by Mr. Jones and myself, which we did "pari passu," was nearer one hundred yards than eighty. The ground was measured before the choice of positions, and I believe that we both stepped with a view of preventing the parties from hitting each other. The choice of position fell to me by lot. The giving of the word fell to Mr. Jones.

I kept my eye upon Mr. Cilley; it was my duty to see that he obeyed the rules. At the first exchange of shots, I thought that he fired, though perfectly fair, too hurriedly, and his ball did not reach Mr. Graves, because he did not raise his rifle sufficiently high. Mr. Graves fired after Mr. Cilley.

As the rifle was put into Mr. Cilley's hands the second time, I saw, though I could not hear, Mr. Jones giving him directions, as I thought, to be more deliberate. I had heard that he was a fine marksman, and I was extremely uneasy for the result. The word was given; Mr. Graves' rifle went off quickly, and, as he told me afterwards, accidentally, and into the ground. Mr. Cilley drew up very deliberately, aimed, I feared, a deadly shot, and fired. I thought he had hit Mr. Graves. I went to him, and inquired why he shot so quick? He said that he must have another shot; that Mr. Menefee had told him not to put his finger upon the guard, but the trigger was too easy, and that he would next time shoot his own way. His rifle had gone off accidentally, owing to his taking his finger off the guard, and insisted upon another shot.

It was very apparent to me that Mr. Cilley had shot at the life of Mr. Graves. If, when Mr. Graves' rifle went off, without harm to him, he had discharged in the air, or reserved his fire, the fight would have been at an end; he would not again have jeopardized Mr. Graves' life, and would have saved his own. Mr. Graves was not, however, touched by his ball, and I again withdrew the challenge, as before, for explanation.

It was between the second and third exchange of shots, and after the rifles were ordered to be again loaded for the third fire, the challenge having been renewed, that I proposed to Mr. Jones that Mr. Cilley should say that, "in declining to receive col. Webb's note, he meant no disrespect to Mr. Graves, either directly or indirectly." In making this proposition I went beyond my instructions; but, as I understood Mr. Jones, Mr. Cilley would not say those words alone nor without adding words which did away the effect of the word "indirectly," and which left the parties exactly where they were when they came upon the ground.

The statement of Mr. Jones and myself contains substantially all the propositions which I remember to have been made on the field for settling the difference. But here it is proper to remark, that when first the friends assembled at my instance, much was said by them upon both sides. A debate was likely to ensue, and lest a dispute or difference should arise among ourselves, it was suggested that the friends should consult apart with the respective seconds, and that the seconds should be the organs of announcing propositions for settling the difference in the hearing of all. This seemed to be acceded to by all parties. I noted nothing, therefore, as authorized, except what proceeded from Mr. Jones himself; and consequently, do not, and cannot, attempt to report what was said by others. I do not remember to have heard Mr. Cilley speak after he went on the ground. He and Mr. Graves were ordered to their positions, after being instructed as to the word, and they kept their positions, eighty yards apart, until the fight ended. The conference of seconds and friends were held exactly equi-distant from them—of course, forty yards off.

I made no proposition on the ground, and rejected none, without consulting Mr. Crittenden and Mr. Menefee; and I believe that every act of mine there, and throughout the whole affair, met with their approbation, and that of Mr. Graves.

It was at the instance of Mr. Graves himself, that I remarked to Mr. Jones, immediately previous to the last exchange of shots: "If this matter is not terminated this shot, and is not settled, I will propose to shorten the distance." Mr. Graves had no confidence in his own shooting, at so long a distance, and directed me positively, if they missed repeatedly, to prevent a prolongation of the affair by proposing closer quarters.

The reason why Mr. Graves insisted upon Mr. Cilley's saying, "either that he declined to receive the note of colonel Webb, because he was not accountable for words spoken in debate," or "that, in declining to receive the note, he did not do so upon the ground of personal objection to col. Webb, as a gentleman," was because Mr. Cilley had made both these declarations, as Mr. Graves alleged to his friends, to him verbally. He would not be satisfied with the declarations announced on the ground, and his friends could not advise him to accept them as satisfactory, for the reason that they admitted nothing which Mr. Cilley did not admit in his written correspondence, and nothing which he did admit in his conversation with Mr. Graves. Mr. Graves could not be satisfied on the field, whilst his adversary was before him with a rifle in his hand, with what he was not satisfied with before, whilst looking at a pen merely in his own hand.

I have now stated the facts, and the world can make its own deduction of the causes which led to the death of the honorable Mr. Cilley. If I am a proper judge of those causes, and am expected to say what they were, I will sum them up in order:

First. Mr. Cilley, as Mr. Graves affirmed, and still affirms, denied, in writing, a satisfactory answer which he had made to Mr. Graves verbally.

Second. He made this written denial in answer to a letter of Mr. Graves, which he had himself requested to be addressed to him, with a view to form a pretext for a written admission of the very facts he denied.

Third. He impeached the honor of one for whom, as a gentleman, Mr. Graves undertook, by the very act of bearing his note, to vouch.

For these causes, Mr. Graves challenged him to mortal combat; and Fourth. When Mr. Graves called on him for "that satisfaction which is recognized among gentlemen," he prescribed barbarous and savage terms; an unusual weapon, the most deadly, at the distance selected, in the hands of a good shot.

Fifth. He precipitated the time of meeting, when the second of Mr. Graves was avowing a want of preparation and a desire for delay.

Sixth. A weapon, not one of a pair, was tendered for the use of Mr. Graves, in a manner that was considered taunting.

Seventh. In the second exchange of shots, Mr. Cilley fired deliberately at Mr. Graves' life, after the rifle of Mr. Graves had gone off accidentally, and without effect.

Eighth. Mr. Graves called Mr. Cilley out upon a point of sufficient importance, as he thought, to cause a challenge; he did not get the satisfaction he demanded, and he was not the man to leave the field without gaining that point, after any number of ineffectual fires.

And for reason of all these causes the combat proved mortal. Mr. Cilley was killed; death might have been the fate of Mr. Graves. Certain it is, that Mr. Graves did not hold Mr. Cilley accountable for the exercise of any privilege of a member of the house of representatives. There was no point of their controversy when the plea of Mr. Cilley's privilege of debate would not have been held sacred and sufficient by Mr. Graves and his friends. Mr. Graves held him accountable in defence only of his own veracity, and of the honor of one for whom he had undertaken to vouch as a gentleman.

Such are the more prominent causes known to me which made this duel bloody, which made Mr. Graves insist upon a second and a third exchange of shots, which brought Mr. Cilley to an untimely end.

Most respectfully,
HENRY A. WISE.

From the "Globe" of Tuesday, the 13th inst.
LETTER FROM THE HON. FRANKLIN PIERCE.

WASHINGTON, March 12, 1838.

SIR: I inclose herewith a number of "the Atlas," a paper printed at Boston, for the purpose of calling the attention of the committee to a letter dated in this city on the 5th instant; the perusal of which has filled me with equal pain and surprise. In a former letter in the same paper, it was stated that I was the second of Mr. Cilley in the late tragical duel. This I did not notice, because the correction had already gone abroad, and also for the reason that so far as the immediate relatives and friends of the deceased (who have occupied my thoughts almost exclusively since the melancholy occurrence) were concerned, it was a matter of no importance. But the letter to which I now call the attention of the committee, contains statements which must be of the most painful interest to those relatives as they are to me: statements into which a regard to their feelings and my own character alike demand a strict investigation. I extract those parts of the letter which relates particularly to myself, and into which I respectfully ask the committee to institute a rigid inquiry.

EXTRACTS.

1st. "If the matter be probed to the bottom, it will be found that Mr. Cilley was sacrificed by his own friends, who urged and induced him to fight in the confident expectation that he would kill Graves at the first fire."

2d. "But in the interval between that interview and the note he received from Mr. Graves containing a written statement of the substance of the conversation which he was requested to assent to, he had consulted, it is said, with his friend Mr. Pierce, of New Hampshire, and through Mr. Pierce, with that celebrated duellist—celebrated for killing his opponents by unfair advantages—Mr. Benton of Missouri. No doubt others were called into the council. Mr. Cilley's remarkable skill with the rifle was well known."

3d. "When the carriage, containing Mr. Cilley's body, drove up to the door of his boarding house, Mr. Pierce, who boards in the same house, is said to have run down stairs with an air of exultation, calling out for the news, and confident that his friend had been successful. The revulsion in his feelings, when he learned the real state of the case, may be imagined."

With regard to the first extract, I would state that I have been a friend of Mr. Cilley from the days of our college life, and suppose I may be one of the individuals alluded to, but that I never entertained or expressed a "confident expectation that he would kill Mr. Graves;" but on the contrary, I did express, both before the meeting and after the parties had left the city, an anxious hope that the difference might be settled without the effusion of blood. I never advised Mr. Cilley to accept the challenge, nor do I know any friend who did.

In relation to the second, I state that he did consult with me, and that I advised him by all means to avoid a personal difficulty; if he could, to make his first note in reply to Mr. Graves acceptable; and I particularly suggested to him to state that he neither denied or affirmed anything with regard to Mr. Webb's character, as I understood him to say he had done before, in order that Mr. Graves should have no cause to make it a matter personal to himself. At the time the note was written, I do not recollect to have heard from Mr. Cilley, or any other person, that he was accustomed to the use of the rifle at all.

When the second note was received, and the answer written, I suggested that he had better introduce the sentiment which I knew he entertained, that he regretted that his former note was not satisfactory, for the purpose of manifesting still his disposition for reconciliation. Mr. Cilley fully concurred in all my suggestions.

It is due to col. Benton to state that I never spoke with him on this subject, until Friday afternoon, when the challenge had been received, and Mr. Cilley had resolved to accept it.

In relation to the third extract quoted above, I have to state, that late in the afternoon, when on Pennsylvania avenue, at the foot of Third street, on which street were our lodgings, a messenger on horseback came up and informed me that he had come from the field, and that Mr. Cilley was killed. I proceeded immediately to our boarding-house, and announced the fact to Mr. Williams, general Wall, and the family. While we were standing in the entry, a note from Mr. Wise was brought in, stating that my friend was wounded, and that he had left him near the Anacosta bridge. I asked one of the gentlemen to take a carriage and go out with me. General Wall remarked, that he would probably be brought in before we could get out of the city. Mr. Williams went up stairs for an outside garment; before he returned, the carriage drove up with the remains of Mr. Cilley.

I trust the committee will be enabled to ascertain upon what authority statements so injurious to myself and others, have been made.

I am, very respectfully,

FRANKLIN PIERCE.

Hon. ISAAC TOUCEY,

Chairman of the committee of investigation.

The supreme court of the United States having been invited to attend the funeral of Mr. Cilley, adopted the following resolutions, which we copy from "the New York American."

Resolved, That the justices of the supreme court entertain a high respect for the character of the deceased, sincerely deplore his untimely death, and sympathize with his bereaved family in the heavy affliction which has fallen upon them.

Resolved, That with every desire to manifest their respect for the house of representatives, and the committee of the house, by whom they have been invited, and for the memory of the deceased, the justices of the supreme court cannot, consistently with the duties they owe to the public attend in their official characters, the funeral of one who has fallen in a duel.

Ordered, That these proceedings be entered on the minutes of the court, and that the chief justice enclose a copy to the chairman of the committee of the house of representatives.

The following resolves, introduced by Mr. Codman, of Portland, were unanimously passed in the Maine house of representatives, on Monday the 12th inst.

Resolved, That the intelligence of the sudden death of the honorable Jonathan Cilley, a representative in congress from this state, has been received with unfeigned grief.

Resolved, That the people of this state hold in high estimation the distinguished talents and public services of the deceased, and feel the deepest sympathy for his afflicted widow, children and friends.

Resolved, That attested copies of these resolves be forwarded to the widow of the deceased, and to each of the senators and representatives in congress from this state.

After the above resolutions had been adopted, Mr. Gardiner, of Waterville, introduced several resolutions, condemning the practice of duelling, which were read, and assigned for a second reading.

SPEECH OF MR. CALHOUN,

OF SOUTH CAROLINA,

On the sub-treasury bill: delivered in the senate of the United States, February 15, 1838.

I regard this measure, which has been so much denounced as very little more than an attempt to carry out the provisions of the joint resolutions of 1816 and the deposit act of 1836. The former provides that no notes but those of specie paying banks shall be received in the dues of the government, and the latter that such banks only shall be the depositories of the public revenues and fiscal agents of the government; but it omitted to make provisions for the contingency of a general suspension of specie payments, such as is the present. It followed, accordingly, on the suspension in May last, which totally separated the government and the banks, that the revenues were thrown in the hands of the executive, where it has since remained under its exclusive control, without any legal provision for its safe keeping. The object of this bill is to supply this omission; to take the public money out of the hands of the executive and place it under the custody of the laws, and to prevent the renewal of a connexion which has proved so unfortunate to both the government and the banks. But it is this measure, originating in an exigency caused by our own acts, and that seeks to make the most of a change effected by operation of law, instead of attempting to innovate, or to make another experiment, as has been erroneously represented, which has been denounced under the name of the sub-treasury with such unexampled bitterness.

In lieu of this bill, an amendment has been offered, as a substitute, by the senator from Virginia, furthest from the chair, (Mr. Rives,) which he informs us is the first choice of himself and those who agree with him, and the second choice of those with whom he is allied on this question. If I may judge from appearances, which can hardly deceive, he might have said their first choice, under existing circumstances; and have added, that despairing of a national bank, the object of their preference, they have adopted his substitute, as the only practical alternative at present. We have, then, the question thus narrowed down to this bill and the proposed substitute. It is agreed, on all sides, that one or the other must be selected, and that to adopt or reject the one, is to reject or adopt the other. The single question then is, which shall we choose? A deeply momentous question, which we are now called on to decide in behalf of the states of this union, and on our decision their future destiny must, in a great degree, depend, so long as their union endures.

In comparing the relative merits of the two measures, preparatory to a decision, I shall touch very briefly on the principles and details of the bill. The former is well understood by the senate and the country at large, and the latter has been so ably and lucidly explained by the chairman of the committee in his opening speech, as to supercede the necessity of further remarks on them at this stage of the discussion. I propose, then, to limit myself to a mere general summary, accompanied by a few brief observations.

The object of the bill, as I have already stated, is to take the public funds out of the hands of the executive, where they have been thrown by the operation of our acts, and to place them under the custody of law; and to provide for a gradual and slow, but a perpetual separation between the government and the banks. It proposes to extend the process of separating to the year 1845, receiving, during the first year of the series, the notes of such banks as may pay specie, and reducing thereafter the amount receivable in notes one-sixth annually, till the separation shall be finally consummated at the period mentioned.

The provisions of the bill are the most simple and effectual that an able committee could devise. Four principal receivers, a few clerks, and a sufficient number of agents to examine the state of the public funds in order to see that all is right, at an annual charge not exceeding forty or fifty thousand dollars at most, constitute the additional officers and expenditures required, to perform all the functions heretofore discharged by the banks, as depositories of the public money and fiscal agents of the treasury. This simple apparatus will place the public treasury on an independent footing, and give to the government, at all times, a certain command of its funds to meet its engagements, and preserve its honor and faith inviolate. If it be desirable to separate from the banks, the government must have some independent agency of its own to keep and disburse the public revenue; and if it must have such an agency, none, in my opinion, can be devised more simple, more economical, more effectual and safe, than that provided by this bill. It is the necessary result of the separation, and to reject it, without proposing a better, (if, indeed, a better can be,) is to reject the separation itself.

I turn now to the substitute. Its object is directly the reverse of that of the bill. It proposes to revive the league of state banks, and to renew our connection with them, and which all acknowledge has contributed so much to corrupt the community, and to create a spirit of speculation, heretofore unexampled in our history.

The senator in offering it, whether wisely or not, has at least acted consistently. He was its advocate at first in 1834, when the alternative was between it and the recharter of the late Bank of the United States. He then defended it zealously and manfully, against the fierce assaults of his present allies, as he now defends it, when those, who then sustained him, have abandoned the measure. Whether wisely or not, there is something heroic in his adherence, and I commend him for it; but I fear I cannot say as much for his wisdom and discretion. He acknowledged with all others, the disasters that have followed the first experiment, but attributes the failure to inauspicious circumstances, and insists that the measure has not had a fair trial. I grant that a second experiment may succeed, after the first has failed; but the senator must concede, in return, that every failure must necessarily weaken confidence, both in the experiment and the experimenter. He cannot be more confident in making this second trial than he was in the first; and if I doubted the success then, and preferred the sub-treasury to his league of banks, he must excuse me for still adhering to my opinion, and doubting the success of his second trial. Nor ought he to be surprised, that those who joined him in the first should be rather shy of trying the experiment again, after having been blown into the air, and burnt and scalded by the explosion. But, if the senator has been unfortunate in failing to secure the co-operation of those who aided him in the first trial, he has been compensated by securing the support of those who were then opposed to him. They are now his zealous supporters. In contrasting their course then and now, I intend nothing personal. I make no charge of inconsistency, nor do I intend to imply it. My object is truth, and not to wound the feelings of any one, or any party. I know that to make out a charge of inconsistency, not only the question, but all the material circumstances must be the same. A change in either, may make a change of vote necessary; and, with a material variation in circumstances, we are often compelled to vary our course, in order to preserve our principles. In this case, I conceive that circumstances, as far as the present allies of the senator are concerned, have materially changed. Then the option was between a recharter of the late bank and a league of state banks; but now the former is out of the question, and the option is between such a league and a total separation from the banks. This being the alternative, they may well take that, which they rejected in 1834, without subjecting themselves to the charge of inconsistency, or justly exposing themselves to the imputation of change of principle, or opinion. I acquit them, then, of all such charges. They doubtless think now, as they formerly did, of the measure, which they then denounced and rejected, but which a change of circumstances now compel them to support. But in thus acquitting them of the charge of inconsistency, they must excuse me if I avail myself of the fact, that their opinion remains unchanged, as an argument in favor of the bill—against the substitute. The choice is between them. They are in the opposite scales. To take from the one is, in effect, to add to the other; and any objection against the one, is an argument equally strong in favor of the other. I then do avail myself of their many powerful objections in '34 against the measure, which this substitute proposes now to revive. I call to my aid, and press into my service every denunciation they then uttered, and every argument they then so successfully urged against it. They, no, we (for I was then, as now, irreconcilably opposed to the measure) charged against it, and proved what we charged, that it placed the purse and the sword in the same hands; that it would be the source of boundless patronage and corruption, and fatal in its consequences to the currency of the country; and I now avail myself of these, and all other objections, then urged by us, in as full force against this substitute, as if you were again to rise in your places and repeat them now; and of course, as so many arguments, in effect, in favor of the bill; and on their strength I claim your vote in its favor, unless, indeed, still stronger objections can be urged against it. I say stronger, because time has proved the truth of all that was then said against the measure now proposed to be revived by this substitute. What was then prediction is now fact. But whatever objections have been, or may be urged against the bill, however strong they may appear in argument, remain yet to be tested by the unerring test of time and experience. Whether they shall ever be realized must be admitted even by those who may have the greatest confidence in them, to be at least uncertain; and it is the part of wisdom and prudence, where objections are equally strong against two measures, to prefer that which is yet untried, to that which has been tried and failed. Against this conclusion, there is but one escape.

It may be said that we are sometimes compelled, in the midst of the many extraordinary circumstances in which we may be placed, to prefer that, which is of itself the more objectionable, to that which is less so; because the former may more probably lead, in the end, to some desired result, than the latter.—To apply the principle to this case, it may be said that the substitute, though of itself objectionable, is to be preferred, because it would more probably lead to the establishment of a national bank, than the bill which you believe to be the only certain remedy for all the disorders that affect the currency. I admit the position to be sound in principle, but it is one exceedingly bold and full of danger in practice, and ought never to be acted on, but in extreme cases, and where there is a rational prospect of accomplishing the object ultimately aimed at. The application, in this case, I must think, would be rashness itself. It may be safely assumed, that the success of either, whichever may be adopted, the bill or the substitute, would be fatal to the establishment of a national bank. It can never put down a successful measure to take its place; and, of course, that which is most likely to fail, and re-plunge the country into all the disasters of a disordered currency, is that which would most probably lead to the restoration of a national bank; and to prefer the substitute on that account is, in fact, to prefer it because it is the worst of the two. But are you certain that another explosion would be followed by a bank? We have already had two; and it is far more probable, that the third would impress, universally and indelibly, on the public mind, that there was something radically and incurably wrong in the system which would blow up the whole concern, national bank and all.

If I may be permitted to express an opinion, I would say, you have pursued a course on this subject unfortunate both for yourselves and country. You are opposed both to the league of banks, and the sub-treasury. You prefer a national bank; and regard it as the only safe and certain regulator of the currency, but consider it, for the present, out of the question, and are therefore compelled to choose between the other two. By supporting the substitute, you will be held responsible for all the mischief and disasters that may follow the revival of the pet bank system, as it has been called, with the almost certain defeat of your first and cherished choice; and those you oppose will reap all the benefits of the power, patronage and influence, which it may place in their hands, without incurring any portion of the responsibility. But that is not all. The success of the substitute would be the defeat of the bill, which would, in like manner, place on you the responsibility of its defeat, and give those you oppose, all the advantage of having supported it without any of the responsibility, that would have belonged to it, had it been adopted. Had a different course been taken—had you joined in aiding to extend the custody of the laws over the public revenue, in the hands of the Executive, where your own acts have placed it, and for which you, of course, are responsible, throwing the blame at the same time on those, to whom you attribute the present disordered state of the currency, the burthen of the responsibility, you would have stood ready to profit by events. If the sub-treasury, contrary to your anticipation, succeeded, as patriots, you would have cause to rejoice in the unexpected good. If it failed, you would have the credit of having anticipated the result, and might then after a double triumph of sagacity and foresight, have brought forward your favorite measure, with a fair prospect of success, when every other had failed. By not taking this course, you have lost the only prospect of establishing a national bank.

Nor has your course, in my opinion, been fortunate for the country. Had it been different, the currency question would have been decided at the called session; and had it been decided then, the country would this day have been in a much better condition: at least the manufacturing and commercial section to the north, where the derangement of the currency is felt the most severely. The south is comparatively in an easy condition.

Such are the difficulties that stand in the way of the substitute at the very threshold. Those beyond are vastly greater, as I shall now proceed to show. Its object as I have stated, is to revive the league of state banks, and the first question presented for consideration is, how is this to be done—how is the league to be formed? how stimulated into life when formed; and what after it has been revived, would be the true character of the league or combination? To answer these questions we must turn to its provisions.

It provides that the secretary of the treasury shall select twenty-five specie paying banks, as the fiscal agents of the government, all to be respectable and substantial, and that the selection shall be confirmed by the joint vote of the two houses. It also provides, that they shall be made the depositories of the public money, and that their notes shall be receivable in the dues of the government; and that in turn, for these advantages, they shall stipulate to perform certain duties, and comply with various conditions, the object of which is, to give to the secretary of the treasury full knowledge of their condition and business, with the view to supervise and control their acts, as far as the interest of the government is concerned. In addition to these, it contains other and important provisions, which I shall not enumerate, because they do not fall within the scope of the objections, that I propose to urge against the measure.

Now I ask what does all this amount to? What but a proposal on the part of the government to enter into a contract or bargain, with certain selected state banks, on the terms and conditions contained. Have we the right to make such a bargain is the first question; and to that, I give a decided negative, which I hope to place on constitutional grounds, that cannot be shaken. I intend to discuss it, with other questions growing out of the connection of the government with the banks, as a new question for the first time presented for consideration and decision. Strange as it may seem, the questions growing out of it, as long as it has existed, have never yet been presented nor investigated in reference to their constitutionality. How this has happened, I shall now proceed to explain, preparatory to the examination of the question, which I have proposed.

The union of the government and the banks was never legally solemnized. It originated shortly after the government went into operation, not in any legal enactment, but in a short order of the treasury department of not much more than a half a dozen of lines, as if it were a mere matter of course. We thus glided imperceptibly into a connection, which was never recognized by law till 1816, (if my memory serves,) but which has produced, more important after consequences, and has had a greater control over the destiny of this country, than any one of the mighty questions, which have so often and deeply agitated the country. To it may be traced, as their seminal principle, the vast and extraordinary expansion of our banking system, our excessive import duties, unconstitutional and profuse disbursements, the protective tariff, and its associated system for spending what it threw into the treasury, followed in time by a vast surplus which the utmost extravagance of the government could not dissipate, and finally, by a sort of retributive justice, the explosion of the entire banking system, and the present prostrated condition of the currency, now the subject of our deliberation.

How a measure, fraught with such important consequences should at first, and for so long a time should have escaped the attention and the investigation of the public, deserves a passing notice. It is to be explained by the false conception of the entire subject of banking, which at that early period universally prevailed in the community. So erroneous was it, that a bank note was then identified in the mind of the public with gold and silver, and a deposit in bank was regarded, as under the most safe and sacred custody, that could be devised. The original impression, derived from the bank of Amsterdam, where every note, or certificate in circulation, was honestly represented by an equal and specific quantity of gold or silver in bank, and where every deposit, was kept, as a sacred trust, to be safely returned to the depository, when demanded was extended to banks of discount, down to the time of the formation of our government, with but slight modifications. With this impression, it is not at all extraordinary, that the deposit of the revenue in banks for safe keeping, and the receipt of their notes in the public dues, should be considered, a matter of course, requiring no higher authority than a treasury order: and hence a connection, with all the important questions belonging to it and now considered of vast magnitude, received so little notice, till public attention was directed to it by its recent rupture. This total separation from the system, in which we now find ourselves placed, for the first time, authorizes and demands, that we shall investigate freely and fully, not only the consequences of the connection, but all the questions growing out of it, more especially those of a constitutional character; and I shall in obedience to this demand return to the question from which this digression has carried me so far.

Have we then the right to make the bargain proposed? Have we the right to bestow the high privileges, I might say prerogatives, on them of being made the depositories of the public revenue, and of having their notes received and treated as gold and silver in the dues of the government and in all its fiscal transactions? Have we the right to do all this in order to bestow confidence in the banks, with the view to enable them to resume specie payments? What is the state of the case? The banks are deeply indebted to the country, and are unable to pay; and we are asked to give them these advantages, in order to enable them to pay their debts. Can we grant the boon? In answering this important question, begin with the fact, that our government is one of limited powers. It can exercise no right but what is specifically granted; nor pass any law but what is necessary and proper to carry such power into effect. This small pamphlet (holding it up) contains the constitution. Its grants of power are few and plain and I ask gentlemen to turn to it, and point out the power, that authorizes us to do what is proposed to be done, or to show that, to pass this substitute, is necessary to carry any of the granted powers into effect. If neither can be shown, what is proposed cannot be constitutionally done; and till it is specifically pointed out, I am warranted in believing, that it cannot be shown.

Our reason is often confounded by a mere name. An act, in the minds of many, may become of doubtful constitutional authority, when applied to a bank which none would for a moment, hesitate to pronounce grossly unconstitutional, when applied to an individual. To free ourselves from this illusion, I ask, could this government constitutionally bestow on individuals, or a private association, the advantages proposed to be bestowed on the selected banks in order to enable them to pay their debts? Is there one who hears me, who would venture to say, yes even in the case of the most extensive merchant or mercantile concern, such as some of those in New York, or New Orleans, at the late suspension whose embarrassments involved entire sections in distress? But, if not, on what principle can a discrimination be made in favor of the banks? They are local institutions created by the states for local purposes composed, like private associations, of individual citizens, on whom the acts of the state cannot confer a particle of constitutional right under this constitution that does not belong to the humblest citizen. So far from it, if there be a distinction, it is against the banks. They are removed farther from the control of this government than the individual citizens, who by the constitution, are expressly subject to the direct action of this government in many instances while the state banks, as constituting a portion of the domestic institutions of the states, and resting on their reserved rights, are entirely beyond our control; so much so, as not to be the subject of a bankrupt law, although the authority to pass one is expressly granted by the constitution.

On what possible ground, then, can the right in question be placed, unless, indeed, on the broad principle that these local institutions, intended for state purposes, have been so extended and have so connected themselves with the general circulation and business of the country, as to effect the interest of the whole community, so as to make it the right and duty of congress to regulate them; or, in short on the broad principle of the general welfare? There is none other, that I can perceive: but this would be to adopt the old and exploded principle, at all times dangerous, but pre-eminently so at this time when such loose and dangerous conceptions of the constitution are abroad in the land. If the argument is good, in one case, it is good in all similar cases. If this government may interfere with any one of the domestic institutions of the states, on the ground of promoting the general welfare, it may with othera. If it may bestow privileges to control them, it may also appropriate money for the same purpose; and thus a door might be opened to an interference with state institutions, of which we of a certain section ought at this time to be not a little jealous.

The argument might be pushed much farther. We not only offer to confer great and important privileges on the banks to be selected, but, in turn, ask them to stipulate to comply with certain conditions, the object of which is to bring them under the supervision and control of this government. It might be asked, where is the right to purchase or assume such supervision, or control? It might be repeated, that they are state institutions, incorporated solely for state purposes, and to be entirely under state control, and that all supervision on our part is in violation of the rights of the states. It might be argued that such supervision or control, is calculated to weaken the control of the states over their own institutions, and to render them less subservient to their peculiar and local interests, for the promotion of which they were established; and too subservient to other, and, perhaps conflicting interests, which might feel but little sympathy with those of the states. But I forbear. Other, and not less urgent objections claim my attention. To dilate too much on one, would necessarily sacrifice the claim of others.

I next object, that whatever may be the right to enter into the proposed bargain, the mode in which it is proposed to make it is clearly unconstitutional, if I rightly comprehend it. I am not certain that I do; but, if I understand it rightly, the plan is, for the secretary of the treasury to select twenty-five state banks, as described in the substitute, which are to be submitted to the two houses to be confirmed or rejected, by their joint resolutions, without the approval of the president; in the same mode, as they would appoint a chaplain, or establish a joint rule for the government of their proceedings.

In acting on the joint resolution, if what I suppose be intended, each house would have the right, of course, to strike from it the name of any bank and insert another, which would in fact vest in the two houses the uncontrollable right of making the selection. Now, if this be the mode proposed, as I infer from the silence of the mover, it is a plain and palpable violation of the constitution. The obvious intention is, to evade the veto power of the executive, which cannot be, without an infraction of an express provision of the constitution, drawn up with the utmost care, and intended to prevent the possibility of evasion. It is contained in the 1st article, 7th section, and the last clause, which I ask the secretary to read:

["Every order, resolution, or vote, to which the concurrence of the senate and house of representatives may be necessary, (except on a question of adjournment) shall be presented to the president of the United States, and before the same shall take effect, shall be approved by him, or being disapproved by him, shall be repassed by two-thirds of the senate and house of representatives, according to the rules and limitations prescribed in the case of a bill."]

Nothing can be more explicit or full. It is no more possible to evade the executive veto, on any joint vote, than in the passage of a bill. The veto was vested in him not only to protect his own powers, but as an additional guard to the constitution. I am not the advocate of executive power, which I have been often compelled to resist of late, when extended beyond its proper limits, as I shall ever be prepared to do when it is. Nor am I the advocate of legislative or judicial. I stand ready to protect all, within the sphere assigned by the constitution, and to resist them beyond. To this explicit and comprehensive provision of the constitution, in protection of the veto, there is but a single exception, resulting, by necessary implication, from another portion of the instrument, not less explicit, which authorizes each house to establish the rules of its proceedings. Under this provision the two houses have full and uncontrollable authority within the limits of their respective walls, and over those subject to their authority, in their official character. To that extent, they may pass joint votes and resolutions, without the approval of the executive; but beyond that, without it, they are powerless.

There is in this case special reasons why his approval should not be evaded. The president is at the head of the administrative department of the government, and is especially responsible for its good management. In order to hold him responsible, he ought to have due power in the selection of its agents, and proper control over their conduct. These banks would be by far the most powerful and influential of all the agents of the government, and ought not to be selected without the concurrence of the executive. If this substitute should be adopted, and the provision in question be regarded such, as I consider it, there can be no doubt what must be the fate of the measure. The executive will be bound to protect, by the intervention of its constitutional right, the portion of power clearly allotted to that department by that instrument, which would make it impossible for it to become a law, with the existing division in the two houses.

I have not yet exhausted my constitutional objections. I rise to higher and to broader, applying directly to the very essence of this substitute. I deny your right to make a general deposit of the public revenue in a bank. More than half of the errors of life may be traced to fallacies originating in an improper use of words; and among not the least mischievous is the application of this word to bank transactions, in a sense wholly different from its original meaning. Originally it meant a thing placed in trust, or pledged to be safely and sacredly kept, till returned to the depositor, without being used by the depository, while in his possession. All this is changed when applied to a deposit in bank. Instead of returning the identical thing, the bank is understood to be bound to return only an equal value; and instead of not having the use, it is understood to have the right to loan it out on interest, or to dispose of it as it pleases, with the single condition, that an equal amount be returned, when demanded, which experience has taught is not always done. To place, then, the public money in deposit, in bank, without restriction, is to give the free use of it, and to allow them to make as much as they can out of it, between the time of deposit and disbursement. Have we such a right? The money belongs to the people,—collected from them for specific purposes,—in which they have a general interest,—and for that only: and what possible right can we have to give such use of it to certain selected corporations? I ask for the provision of the constitution that authorizes it. I ask, if we could grant the use, for similar purposes, to private associations or individuals? Or if not to them, to individual officers of the government; for instance, to the four principal receivers under this bill, should it pass? And if this cannot be done, that the distinction be pointed out.

If these questions be satisfactorily answered, I shall propound others still more difficult. I shall then ask, if the substitute should become a law, and the twenty-five banks be selected, whether they would not in fact be the treasury? And if not, I would ask, where would be the treasury? But if the treasury, I would ask, if public money in bank would not be in the treasury? And if so, how can it be drawn from it to be lent for the purpose of trade, speculation, or any other use whatever, against an express provision of the constitution? Yes, as express as words can make it. I ask the secretary to read the 1st article, 9th section, and the clause next to the last.

"No money shall be drawn from the treasury, but in consequence of appropriations made by law; and a regular statement and account of the receipts and expenditures of all public money shall be published from time to time."

How clear! How explicit! No money to be drawn from the treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law;—that is, the object on which the expenditure is to be made, to be designated by law, and the sum allotted to effect it, specified; and yet we have lived in the daily and habitual violation of this great fundamental provision, from almost the beginning of our political existence to this day. Behold the consequences! It has prostrated and engulfed the very institutions which have enjoyed this illicit favor, and tainted, above all other causes, the morals and politics of the whole country. Yes, to this must be traced, as one of the main causes, the whole system of extensive revenue, excessive expenditure, and excessive surpluses; and to them, especially the last, the disastrous overthrow of the banks and the currency, and the unexampled degeneracy of public and private morals, which have followed. We have suffered the affliction, may the blessing, which follows chastisement, when its justice is confessed, come in due season.

But I take a still higher ground. I strike at the root of the mischief. I deny the right of this government to treat bank notes as money in its fiscal transactions. On this great question, I never have before committed myself, though not generally disposed to abstain from forming or expressing opinions. In all instances, in which a national bank has come in question, I have invariably taken my ground, that if the government has the right to receive and treat bank notes as money, it had the right, and was bound under the constitution, to regulate them, so as to make them uniform and stable as a currency. The reasons for this opinion are obvious, and have been so often and fully expressed on former occasions, that it would be useless to repeat them now: but I never examined fully the right of receiving, or made up my mind on it, till since the catastrophe in May last, which, as I have said, entirely separated the government from the banks. Previous to that period, it was an abstract question, with no practical bearing; as much so as is now the constitutional right of admitting Louisiana into the Union. Things are now altered. The connexion is dissolved; and it has become a practical question of the first magnitude.

The mover of the substitute assumed as a postulate, that this government had a right to receive in its dues, whatever it might think proper. I deny the position in toto. It is one, that ought not to be assumed, and cannot be proved, and which is opposed by powerful objections. The genius of our constitution is opposed to the assumption of power. Whatever power it gives is expressly granted; and if proof were wanted, the numerous grants of powers far more obvious and apparently much more safe to be assumed than the one in question, would afford it. I shall cite a few striking instances.

If any powers might be assumed, one would suppose, that of applying money to pay the debts of the government, and borrowing it to carry on its operations would be among them;—yet both are expressly provided for by the constitution. Again, to congress is granted the power to declare war and raise armies and navies; yet the power to grant letters of marque and reprisal and to make rules for the regulation of the army and navy are not left to assumption, as obvious as they are, but are given by express grant. With these and other instances not less striking, which might be added, it is a bold step to assume, without proof, the far less obvious power of the government receiving whatever it pleases in its dues as money. Such an assumption would be in direct conflict with the great principle which the state rights party, with which the senator (Mr. Rives) classes himself, have ever adopted in the construction of the constitution. But, if the former cannot be assumed, it would be in vain to attempt to prove that it has been granted, or that it is necessary and proper to carry any of the granted powers into effect. No such attempt has been made, nor can be, with success. On the contrary, there are strong objections to the power, which, in my opinion, cannot be surmounted.

If once admitted, it would lead by consequence to a necessary interference with individual and state concerns never contemplated by the constitution. Let us, for instance, suppose that, acting on the assumption of the senator, the government should choose to select tobacco as an article to be received in payment of its dues, which would be as well entitled to it as any other product, and in which the senator's constituents are so much interested. Does he not see the consequences? In order to make its taxes uniform, which it is bound to do by the constitution, and which cannot be done unless the medium in which it is paid is so, the government would have to assume a general control over the great staple in question; to regulate the weight of the hogshead or package; to establish inspections under its own officers in order to determine the quality, and whatever else might be necessary to make the payments into the treasury uniform. So likewise, if the still greater staple, cotton, be selected. The weight of the bale, the quality of the cotton, and its inspection would all necessarily fall under the control of the government; and does not the senator see that the exercise of a power that must lead to such consequences—consequences so far beyond the sphere assigned to this government by the constitution, must be unconstitutional? Nor does the objection extend only to these and other staple articles. It applies with equal, if not greater force, to receiving the notes of state banks, as proposed by the substitute, in the dues of the government and the management of its fiscal concerns. It must involve the government in the necessity of controlling and regulating state banks, as this substitute abundantly proves, as well as the whole history of our connection with them; and it has been shown that banks are, at least, as far removed from the control of this government as the cultivators of the soil, or any other class of citizens. To this I might add another objection; not less strong, that for the government to receive and treat bank notes as money in its dues, would be in direct conflict, in its effect, with the important power conferred expressly on congress of coining money and regulating the value thereof: but as this will come in with more propriety in answer to an argument advanced by the senator from Massachusetts, (Mr. Webster,) I shall now state his argument and reply to it.

He asserted again and again, both now and at the extra session, that it is the duty of the government not only to regulate, but to furnish a sound currency. Indeed, it is the principal argument relied on by the senator in opposition to the bill, which he says abandons this great duty. Now, if by currency be meant gold and silver coins, there will be but little difference between him and myself. To that extent the government has a clear and unquestionable right by express grant; but if he goes farther, and intends to assert that the government has the right to make bank notes a currency, which it is bound to regulate, then his proposition is identical in effect, though differently expressed, with that of the senator from Virginia, (Mr. Rives,) and all the arguments I have urged against it are equally applicable to his. I hold, on my part, that the power of the government on this subject is limited to coining money and regulating its value, and punishing the counterfeiting of the current coins;—that is, of the coins made current by law, the only money known to the constitution. It is time to make a distinction between money, or currency, if you please—between that which will legally pay debts, and mere circulation, which has its value from its promise to be paid in the former, and under which classification, bank notes as well as bills or promissory notes of individuals fall. These are all in their nature private and local, and cannot be elevated to the level currency, or money, in the fiscal transactions of government, without coming into conflict, more or less, with the object of the constitution in vesting the very power in congress, which I shall now proceed to show.

It will hardly be questioned, that the object was to fix a standard in order to furnish to the union a currency of uniform and steady value, and was therefore united in the same sentence with the relative power to fix the standard of weights and measures,—the objects being similar. Now, if our experience has proved any thing, it has amply shown that so long as the government is connected with the banks, and their notes received in its transactions, as money, so long it is impossible to give any thing like stability to the standard of value; and that the power of coining, and regulating the coins, becomes in a great measure a mere nullity. Every dollar issued in bank notes, when it is made the substitute for money, drives out of circulation more or less of the precious metals; and when the issue becomes exorbitant, gold and silver almost entirely disappears, as our experience at this time proves. The effects are analogous to alloying or clipping the coin, as far as stability of standard is concerned; and it would be not less rational to suppose, that such a power on the part of individuals, would be consistent with a uniform and stable currency, than to suppose the receiving and treating bank notes as a substitute for money by the government, would be. The only check or remedy is to restrict them to their proper sphere, to circulate in common with bills of exchange or other private and local paper, for the convenience of business and trade. So far from such a course operating injuriously on the people, or from being liable to the charge of forming one currency for the people and another for the government, as has been so often and with such effect repeated,—it is the very reverse. Government by refusing to receive bank notes, as it is bound to do, would in fact furnish a choice to the people, to take either money or notes at their pleasure. The demand of the government will always keep a plentiful supply of the former in the country, so far as to afford the people a choice, while the opposite would expel the money and leave no option to them but to take bank notes or worse, as at present.

I have now shown how it is proposed to form the league of banks, and have presented the constitutional impediments that stand in the way. These are numerous and strong; so much so, that they ought to be irresistible with all, except the multitudinous in construction; but I cannot expect they will produce their full effect. I know too well the force of long entertained impressions, however erroneous, to be sanguine—how strongly the mind rebels against the expulsion of the old and the admission of new opinions. Yet, in this case, where we clearly see how gradually and silently error crept in under the disguise of words, applied to new and totally different ideas, without exciting notice or alarm; and when we have experienced such deep disasters in consequence of parting from the plain intent and meaning of the constitution, I cannot but hope that all who believe that the success of the government depends on a rigid adherence to the constitution, will lay aside all previous impressions, taken up without reflection, and give to the objections their due weight.

I come now to the next point, to show how this league is to be revived or stimulated into life. Till this can be done, the substitute should become a law, would be a dead letter. The selection is to be made for specie paying banks. None but such can receive the public deposits, or have their notes received in the dues of the government. There are none such now. The whole banking system lies inanimate; and must be vivified before it can be re-united with the government. No one is bold enough to propose an union with this lifeless mass. How then is the vital spark to be revived? how the breath of life, the promethean fire, to be breathed into the system anew, is the question? This is the task.

The mover tells us, that it must be the work of the government. He says that it is bound to aid the banks to resume payments; and for that purpose ought to hold out to them some adequate inducement. He tells us, that they have been long preparing and had made great efforts, but can go no farther; have rolled the round, huge rock almost to the summit, but unless the government put forth its giant arm, and give the last push, it will recoil and rush down the steep to the bottom, and all past labor be lost. Now, what is this adequate inducement? What this powerful stimulus, which it is proposed the government should apply, in order to enable the banks to accomplish this herculean task? The substitute shall answer.

It proposes to fix the 1st of July next for the period of resumption; and as the inducement to resume, it proposes to select twenty-five of the most respectable and solid, out of the resuming banks to be the depositories of the public moneys, and the fiscal agents of the government, as has been already stated. It also proposes, and this is the stimulus, the essence of the whole,—to make the notes of such banks as may resume on or before that day exclusively receivable in the public dues. Here is a quid pro quo; something proposed to be done, for which something is to be given. We tell the banks plainly, if you resume, we, on our part, stipulate to make twenty-five of you our fiscal agents and depositories of the revenue; and we further stipulate that those who resume by the time fixed, shall have the exclusive privilege for ever of having their notes receivable in the dues of the government, in common with gold and silver. If the banks perform their part, we shall be bound in honor and good faith to perform ours. It would be a complete contract, as obligatory as if signed, sealed, and delivered. Such is the inducement.

The next question is, will it be adequate? Yes, abundantly adequate. The battery is strong enough to awaken the dead to life; the consideration sufficient to remunerate the banks for whatever sacrifice they may be compelled to make, in order to resume payment. It is difficult to estimate the value of these high privileges, or prerogatives, as I might justly call them. They are worth millions. If you were to enter into a similar contract with an individual, I doubt not, that he could sell out in open market for at least thirty, forty, or fifty millions of dollars. I do then the mover the justice to say, that his means are ample to effect what he proposes. As difficult as is the work of resumption,—and difficult it will turn out to be when tried,—the inducement will prove all sufficient. But the resumption, however desirable, may be purchased too dearly; and such would prove to be the case, should the project succeed. Not only is the offer too great, but the mode of effecting it is highly objectionable. Its operation would prove not less disastrous than the bargain has been shown to be unconstitutional, which I shall now proceed to establish.

The offer will have a double effect. It will act as a powerful stimulus to resumption, but will act at the same time with equal force to excite a struggle among the banks, not only to resume themselves, but to prevent others from resuming. The reason is clear. The advantage to each will increase, as the number of the resuming banks decreases; and of course, the great point of contest among the strong will be to restrict the proffered prize to the smallest number. The closer the monopoly the greater the profits. In this struggle, a combination of a few powerful and wealthy banks, the most respectable and solid, as designated in the substitute, will overthrow and trample down the residue. Their fall will spread desolation over the land. Whatever may be the fate of others in this desperate contest, there is one, in relation to which no doubt can be entertained: I refer to the United States Bank of Pennsylvania, a long name and a misnomer; and which, for the sake of brevity, but with no personal disrespect to the distinguished individual at the head, I shall call Mr. Biddle's bank. That, at least, will be one of the winners—one of the twenty-five to whom the prize will be assigned. Its vast resources, its wealth and influential connexions, both at home and abroad, the skill and ability of the officer at its head, and, what is less honorable, the great resource it holds, in the notes of the late United States Bank, of which more than six millions have been put into circulation, in violation, to say the least, of a trust, constituting more than five-sixths of all its circulation, and which it is not bound to pay,—with the still greater amount on hand, making in the whole more than twenty-six millions, and which may be used the same way, if not prevented, would place it beyond all doubt among the victors. He starts without proper weights, and will lead the way from the first. Who the others may be is uncertain; this will depend mainly upon his good will and pleasure. It may be put down as certain, whoever they may be, that they will be powerful and influential, and not unfavorable to his interest or aggrandizement. But the mischievous effect will not be limited to this death-like struggle, in which so many must fall and be crushed, that might otherwise weather the storm. The forced resumption, for such it will be in effect, would be followed by wide spread desolation. It is easy to sink to suspension, but hard to return to resumption. Under the most favorable circumstances, and when conducted most leisurely and cautiously, the pressure must be severe; but, if coerced or precipitated by bankrupt laws or temptations such as this, it will be ruinous. To make it safe and easy must be the work of time. Government can do but little. The disease originates in excessive indebtedness, and the only remedy is payment or reduction of debts. It is estimated, that when the banks suspended payments, the community was indebted to them the enormous sum of $475,000,000. To reduce this within the proper limits, is not the work of a few days, and can be but little aided by us. The industry and the vast resources of the country, with time, are the only remedies to be relied on for the reduction; and to these, with the state legislature, and the public opinion, the resumption must be left. To understand the subject fully, we must look a little more into the real cause of the difficulty.

This enormous debt was incurred in prosperous times. The abundant means of the banks, from the surplus revenue and a combination of other causes, induced them to discount freely. This increased the circulation, and with its increase, its value depreciated, and prices rose proportionably. With this rise, enterprise and speculation seized the whole community, and every one expected to make a fortune at once; and this in turn gave a new impulse to discounts and circulation, till the swelling tide burst its barriers and deluged the land. Then began the opposite process of absorbing the excess. If it had been possible to return it back to the banks, the sources from which it flowed, through its debtors, the speculating, enterprising, and business portion of the community, the mischief would have been in a great measure avoided. But circulation had flowed off into other reservoirs; those of the moneyed men and bankers, who hoard when prices are high, and buy when they are low. The portion thus drawn off and held in deposit, either in bank or the chests of individuals, was as effectually lost, as far as the debtors of the banks were concerned, as if it had been burnt. The means of payment was thus diminished; prices fell in proportion, and the pressure increased, as they fell. Though the amount in circulation be greatly reduced, yet the banks are afraid to discount, lest on resumption, the hoarded mass of deposits held by individuals or other banks, should be let loose, and, in addition to what might be put into circulation should discounts be made, would cause another inundation to be followed by another suspension. How is this difficulty to be safely surmounted, but by unlocking the hoarded means? And how is that to be done, without deciding the currency question? This is the first and necessary step. That done, all will be able to calculate, and determine what to do. The period of inaction and uncertainty would cease, and that of business revive. Funds that are now locked up, would be brought again into operation, and the channels of circulation be replenished in the only mode that can be done with safety. Thus thinking, I am now and have been from the first in favor of an early decision, and adverse to all coercion, or holding out temptation to resume; leaving the disease to the gradual and safe operation of time, with as little tempering as possible. In the mean time, I hold it to be unwise to cease discounting, and to adopt an indiscriminate system of curtailment. Its effects are ruinous to the business of the country, and calculated to retard, rather than to accelerate a resumption. The true system I would say, would be to discount with business paper as freely as usual, and curtail gradually on permanent debts. The former would revive business, and would increase the debts to the bank less than it would increase the ability of the community to pay them.

Having now shown how this league, or combination of banks is to be formed and revived, with the difficulties in the way, it remains to determine, what will be the true character and nature of the combination when formed. It will consist of state banks retaining their original powers, that of discounting and all, without being in the slightest degree impaired. To these the substitute proposes to add important additions; to receive their notes as gold and silver in the public dues; to give them the use of the public deposits, and to organize and blend the whole into one, as the fiscal agent of the government, to be placed under the immediate supervision and control of the secretary of the treasury. Now what does all this amount to? Shall I name the word—be not startled; a bank—a government bank—the most extensive, powerful and dangerous, that ever existed. This substitute would be the act of incorporation; and the privileges it confers, so much additional banking capital, increasing immensely its powers, and giving it an unlimited control over the business, and exchanges of the country.

The senator from Virginia (Mr. Rives) was right in supposing that this new trial of the experiment would be made under very different circumstances from the first, and would have a very different termination. That too, like this, was a bank—a government bank, as distinguished from the late bank, to which it was set up, as a rival, and was at the time constantly so designated in debate. But the circumstances now are indeed different—very different, and so would be the result of the experiment. This bank would not be the same rickety concern as the former. That ended in anarchy, and this would in despotism. I will explain.

The former failed not so much in consequence of the adverse circumstances of the times or any essential defect in the system, as from the want of a head—a common sensorium, to think, to will, and to decide,—for the whole, which was indispensably necessary to ensure concert and give unity of design and execution. A head will not be wanting now. Mr. Biddle's bank will supply the defect. His would be not only one of the resuming banks, as I have shown, but would also be one of the 25 to be selected. If there should be the temerity to omit it, the present project would share the fate of its predecessor. Mr. Biddle's bank at the head of those excluded, would be an overmatch for the selected, in skill, capital and power; and the whole league would inevitably be overthrown. But if selected, the position of his bank in league would be certain. Its vast capital, its extensive connections, its superior authority, and his skill, abilities and influence, would place it at the head, to think and act for the whole. The others would be as dependent on his, as the branches of the late bank were on the mother institution. The whole would form one entire machine, impelled by a single impulse, and making a perfect contrast with its predecessor in the unity and energy of its operations.

Nor would its fate be less dissimilar. Anarchy was inscribed on the first iron from the beginning. Its deficiency in the great and essential element, to ensure concert, was radical and could not be remedied. Its union with the government could not supply it, nor avert its destiny. But very different would be the case of the present. Add its intimate union with the government, for which the substitute provides, to its other sources of power, and it would become irresistible. The two, government and bank, would unite and constitute a single power; but which would gain the ascendancy;—whether the government would become the bank, or the bank the government, is neither certain nor material; for whichever it might be, it would form a despotic money-craze, (if I may be permitted to unite an English and a Greek word,) altogether irresistible.

It is not a little surprising, that the senator from Virginia (Mr. Rives) whose watchful jealousy could detect, as he supposed, the embryo of a government bank in the bill, should overlook this regular incorporation of one by his own substitute. Out of the slender materials of treasury warrants and drafts to pay public creditors, or transfer funds from place to place, as the public service might require, and four principal receivers to keep the public money, he has conjured up, with the aid of a vivid imagination, a future government bank, which he told us, with the utmost confidence, would rise like a cloud, at first as big as a hand, but which would soon darken all the horizon. Now, it is not a little unfortunate for his confident predictions, that these seminal principles from which the bank is to spring, have all existed from the commencement of our government in full force, except the four receivers, without showing the least tendency to produce the result he anticipates. Not only ours, but every civilized government has the power to draw treasury warrants, and transfer drafts; nor has the power in a single instance terminated in a bank. Nor can the fact, that the money is to be kept by receivers, contribute in the least to produce one. The public funds in their hands will be as much beyond the control of the executive, as it was in the vaults of the banks. But, to shorten discussion, I would ask, how can there be a bank without the power to discount or to use the deposits and out of which of the provisions of the bill could the treasury, by any possibility obtain either, under the severe penalties of the bill, which prohibits the touching of the public money, except on warrants or drafts, drawn by those having authority, in due form, and for the public service.

But the danger which an excited imagination anticipates hereafter from the bill would exist in sober reality under the substitute. There it would require neither fancy nor conjecture to create one. It would exist with all its faculties and endowments complete; discount, deposits, and all,—with which immense means, guided by a central and directing head, and blended and united with the government, so as to form one great mass of power. What a contrast with the bill! How simple and harmless the one, with its four principal receivers, twice as many clerks, and five inspectors, compared with this complex and mighty engine of power! And yet there are many, both intelligent and patriotic, who oppose the bill and support the substitute, on the ground that the former would give more patronage and power than the latter! How strange and wonderful the diversity of the human mind!

So far from being true, the very fact of the separation of the government from the banks, provided for in the bill, would, of itself, be the most decisive blow that could be given against government patronage; and the union of the two, the most decisive in its favor. When their notes are received in the public dues, as cash, and the public money deposited in their vaults, the banks become the allies of the government on all questions connected with its fiscal action. The higher its taxes and duties, the greater its revenue and expenditure; and the larger its surplus, the more their circulation and business, and, of course, the greater their profit; and hence on all questions of taxation and disbursements, and the accumulations of funds in the treasury, their interest would throw them on the side of the government and against the people.

All this is reversed, when separated. The higher the taxation and disbursements, and the larger the surplus, the less would be their profits; and their interest in that case, would throw them with the people, and against the government. The reason is obvious. Specie is the basis of banking operations; and the greater amount they can command, the greater will be their business and profits; but when the government is separated from them and collects and pays away its dues in specie instead of their notes, it is clear that the higher the taxes and disbursements, and the greater the surplus in the treasury, the more specie will be drawn from the use of the banks and the less will be left as the basis of their operations; and, consequently, the less their profit. Every dollar withdrawn from them would diminish their business four-fold at least; and hence a regard to their own interest would inevitably place them on the side to which I have assigned them.

The effects on the politics of the country would be great and salutary. The weight of the banks would be taken from the side of the tax consumers, where it has been from the commencement of the government, and placed on the side of the tax payers. This great division of the community necessarily grows out of the fiscal action of the government. Take taxation and disbursement together, and it will always be found that one portion of the community pays into the treasury, in the shape of taxes, more than it receives back in that of disbursements, and that another receives back more than it pays. The former are the tax payers, and the latter the consumers,—making the great, essential, and controlling division in all civilized communities. If, with us, the government has been thrown on the side of the consumers, as it has, it must be attributed to its alliance with the banks, whose influence has been, in consequence, at all times steadily and powerfully on that side. It is to this mischievous and unholy alliance that may be traced almost all the disasters that have befallen us, and the great political degeneracy of the country. Hence the protective system; hence its associated and monstrous system of disbursements; hence the collection of more money from the people than the government could require; hence the vast and corrupting surpluses; hence legislative and executive usurpations; and finally, hence the prostration of the currency and the disasters which give rise to our present deliberations. Revive this fatal connection; adopt this substitute, and all this train of evils will again follow with redoubled disasters and corruption. Refuse the connection; adopt this bill, and all will be reversed, and we shall have some prospect of restoring the constitution and the country to their primitive simplicity and purity. The effect of the refusal on the patronage of the government would be great and decisive. Burke has wisely said, that the "revenue is the state in modern times." Violence and coercion are no longer the instruments of government in civilized communities. Their reign is past. Every thing is now done by money. It is not only the sinew of war, but of politics; over which, in the form of patronage, it exercises almost unlimited control. Just as the revenue increases or diminishes, almost in the same proportion, is patronage increased or diminished.

But admit for a moment, that neither the separation nor the connection would have any sensible effect to increase or diminish the revenue; and that it would be of the same amount, whether the bill or substitute should be adopted; yet, even on that supposition, the patronage of the latter would be an hundred fold greater than the former. In estimating the amount of patronage of any measure, three particulars must be taken into the calculation; the number of persons who may be effected by it; their influence in the community, and the extent of the control exercised over them. It will be found on comparison, that the substitute combines all these elements in a far greater degree, than the bill, as I shall now proceed to show. I begin with the number.

The bill provides, as has been stated, for four principal receivers, eight or ten clerks, and a suitable number of agents to act as inspectors, making in the whole, say 25 individuals. These would constitute the only additional officers to keep and disburse the public money. The substitute, in addition to the officers now in service, provides for the selection of 25 banks, to be taken from the most powerful and influential, and which would have, on an average, at the least, 100 officers and stockholders each, making in the aggregate, 2,500 persons, who would be directly interested in the bank's, and of course, under the influence of the government.

As to the relative influence of the officers and the selected banks over the community, every impartial man must acknowledge, that the preponderance would be greater on the side of the latter. Admitting the respectability of the receivers and other officers provided for in the bill, and the officers and stockholders of the banks to be individually the same, still the means of control at the disposition of the former, would be as nothing compared in that of the latter. They could not touch a cent of public money. Their means would be limited to their salary, which would be too small to be felt in the community. Very different would be the case with the officers and stockholders of the banks. They, of all persons, are by far the most influential in the community. A greater number depend on them for accommodation and favor and the success of their business and prospects in life, than any other class in society; and this would be especially true of the banks connected with the government.

It only remains now to compare the extent of the control that may be exercised by the government over the two, in order to complete the comparison, and here again the preponderance will be found to be strikingly on the same side. The whole amount of expenditure under the bill would not exceed $30,000 or $40,000 annually at the very farthest; and this constitutes the whole amount of control which the government can exercise. There would be no perquisites, no contracts, jobs or incidental gains. The offices and salaries would be all. To that extent, those who may hold them, would be dependent on the government, and thus far they may be controlled. How stands the account on the other side? What value shall be put on the public deposits in the banks? What on the receivability of their notes, as cash, by the government? What on their connection with the government, as their fiscal agent, which would give so great a control over the exchanges and business of the country? How many millions shall these be established at, and how insignificant must the paltry sum of $30,000 or $40,000 appear to those countless millions held under the provisions of the substitute at the pleasure of the government!

Having now finished the comparison as to the relative patronage of the two measures, I shall next compare them as fiscal agents of the government; and here let me say, at the outset, that this discussion has corrected an error, which I once entertained. I had supposed, that the hazard of keeping the public money under the custody of officers of the government, would be greater, than in bank. The senators from New Hampshire and Connecticut, (Messrs. Hubbard and Niles) have proved from the record, that the hazard is on the other side; and that we have lost more by the banks, than by the collecting and disbursing officers combined. What can be done to increase the security by judicious selection of officers, and proper organization, is strongly illustrated by the facts stated by the chairman (Mr. Wright,) in his opening speech; that in the war department, there has been no loss for 15 years,—from '21 to '36,—on an expenditure certainly not less than $100,000,000. I take some pride in this result of an organization, which I originated and established when secretary of war against the most formidable opposition.

As to the relative expense of the two agencies, that of the bill, as small as it is, we are to judge appearances, is the greatest; but if by facts, the substitute would be much the most so, provided we charge it with all the advantages, which the banks would derive from their connection with the government, as ought in fairness to be done, as the whole ultimately comes out of the pockets of the people.

In a single particular the banks have the advantage as fiscal agents. They would be the more convenient. To this they are entitled, and I wish to withhold from them no credit, which they may justly claim.

The senator from Virginia (Mr. Rives) appeared to have great apprehension, that the collection of the public dues in specie might lead to hoarding. He may dismiss his fears on that head. It is not the genius of modern and civilized governments to hoard; and if it were, the banks will take care, that there shall be no extraordinary accumulation of cash in the treasury. Pass the bill, and I under-write, that we shall never have again to complain of a surplus. It would rarely, if ever in peace and settled times, exceed three or four millions at the outside. Nor is his apprehension that hoarding of specie would lead to war, less groundless. The danger is in another quarter. War is the harvest of banks, when they are connected with government. The vast increase of revenue and expenditures, and the enormous public loans, which necessarily ensue mainly to their advantage, swell their profits in war to the utmost limits. But separate them from government, and war would then be to them, a state of famine, for reasons which must be apparent after what has been said, which would throw their weight on the side of peace and against war; just as certainly, as I have shown, that the separation would throw it on the side of tax payers, and against the tax consumers.

I come now to the comparison of the effects of the two measures on the currency of the country. In this respect, the senator from Virginia (Mr. Rives) seemed to think, that his substitute would have a great superiority over the bill; but his reasons were to me wholly unsatisfactory. If we are to judge from experience, it ought to be pronounced to be the worst possible measure. It has been in operation but twice (each for but a few years) since the commencement of the government; and it has so happened, that the only two explosions of the currency occurred during those periods. But, without relying on these disastrous occurrences, we have seen enough to satisfy the most incredulous that there are great and radical defects in our bank circulation, which no remedy heretofore applied, has been able to remove. It originates in the excess of paper, compared to specie, and the only effective cure is to increase the latter and reduce the former; and this the substitute itself implicitly acknowledges by proposing a remedy that would prove wholly inoperative. It proposes that, after a certain period mentioned, none of the banks to be selected, should issue notes under ten dollars. The effects would clearly be, not a diminution of the circulation of small notes, but a new division of the banking business, in which the issue of large notes would fall to the lot of the selected banks and the small to the others, without restricting, in the least, the aggregate amount of paper circulation.

But what the substitute would fail to do, the bill would effectually remedy. None doubt, but the separation from the banks would greatly increase the proportion of specie to paper; but the senator from Virginia (Mr. Rives) apprehends, that its operation would be too powerful; so much so, in fact, as to destroy the banks. His argument is, that specie would be always at a premium, and that it would be impossible for the banks to do business, so long as that was the case. His fears are groundless. What he dreads would be but a temporary evil. The very fact, that specie would bear a premium would have the double effect, to diminish paper circulation, and increase the importation of specie, till an equilibrium between the two would be restored, when they would be at par. At what point this would be effected, is a little uncertain; but the fear is, that with our decreasing revenue, instead of the specie being increased to excess, it would not be increased sufficiently to give the desired stability to the currency.

In this connection, the senator urged an objection against the bill, which I regard as wholly groundless. He said, that the payment of the dues of the government in specie, would create a double demand; a domestic, as well as a foreign; the effects of which would be to increase greatly, its fluctuations; and so deeply was he impressed with the idea, that he drew a vivid picture of its alternate flow from the coast to the interior, and from north to south, and back again. All this is the work of imagination. The effect would be directly the reverse. The more numerous the demands, the less the fluctuation; so much so, that the greatest stability would be, where it exclusively performed the function of circulation, and where each individual must keep a portion to meet his daily demands. This is so obvious, that I shall not undertake to illustrate it.

But the superiority of the bill over the substitute would not be limited only to a more favorable proportion between specie and paper. It would have another important advantage that cannot be well over-estimated; it would make a practical distinction between currency and circulation, —between the currency of the country, and private and local circulation, under which head bank paper would be comprehended. The effects would be, to render a general explosion of the circulation almost impossible. Whatever derangements might occur, would be local and confined to some one particular commercial sphere; and even, within its limits, there would be a sound currency to fall back on, not partaking of the shock, and which would greatly diminish the intensity and duration of the distress. In the mean time, the general business and finances of the country would proceed, almost without feeling the derangement.

With a few remarks on the comparative effects of the two measures on the industry and business of the country, I shall conclude their comparison. What has been said on their relative effects on the currency, goes far to decide the question of their relative effects on business and industry.

I hold a sound and stable currency to be among the greatest encouragements to industry and business generally; and an unsound and fluctuating one, now expanding and now contracting, so that no honest man can tell what to do, as among the greatest discouragements. The dollar and the eagle are the measure of value, as the yard and the bushel are of quantity; and what would we think of the incorporation of companies to regulate the latter—to expand or contract, or shorten or lengthen them at pleasure, with the privilege to sell by the contracted or shortened, and buy by the expanded or lengthened? Is it not seen that it would place the whole industry and business of the country under the control of such companies? But it would not more certainly effect it, than a similar control possessed by the money institutions of the country, over the measure of value. But I go further, and assert confidently, that the excess of paper currency, as well as its unsteadiness, is unfavorable to the industry and business of the country. It raises the price of every thing, and consequently increases the price of production and consumption; and is, in the end, hostile to every branch of industry.

I hold that specie and paper have each their proper sphere; the latter for large and distant transactions, and the former for all others; and that the nearer our circulation approaches gold and silver, consistently with convenience, the better for the industry and the business of the country. The more specie the better, till that point is reached. When attained, it would combine in the greatest possible degree, soundness and facility, and would be favorable to the productive classes universally; I mean men of business, planters, merchants, and manufacturers, as well as operatives. It would be particularly favorable to the south. Our great staples are cash articles every where; and it was well remarked by the senator from Mississippi, (Mr. Walker,) at the extra session, that we sold at cash prices and brought at paper prices; that is, sold low and bought high. The manufacturing, commercial and navigating interests would also feel its beneficial effects. It would cheapen productions and be to manufacturers in lieu of a protective tariff. Its effects would be to enable them to meet foreign competition, not by raising prices by high duties, but by enabling them to sell as cheap or cheaper than the foreigner, which would harmonize every interest, and place our manufactures on the most solid basis. It is the only mode by which the foreign market can ever be commanded; and commanded it would be, with a sound and moderately expanded currency. Our ingenuity, invention, and industry are equal to any people; and all our manufacturers want, is a sound currency and an even chance, to meet competition with success any where, at home or abroad. But with a bloated and fluctuating paper circulation, this will be impossible. Among its many drawbacks, it levies an enormous tax on the community.

I have already stated, that the community is estimated to have been indebted to the banks $475,000,000 at the suspension of specie payments. The interest on this sum, estimated at six per cent. (it ought to be higher,) would give an annual income to those institutions of upwards of thirty millions; and this is the sum yearly paid by the community for bank accommodations, to the excess of which we owe our bloated and unstable circulation. Never was a circulation so worthless, furnished at so dear a rate. How much of this vast income may be considered as interest on real capital, it is difficult to estimate; but it would, I suppose, be ample to set down ten millions to that head, which would leave upwards of twenty millions annually, as the profits derived from banking privileges over and above a fair compensation for the capital invested, which some body must pay, and which must ultimately fall on the industry and business of the country. But this enormous expansion of the system is not astonishing; so great is the stimulus applied to its growth. Ingenious men of other ages, devoted themselves in vain to discover the art of converting the baser metals into gold and silver; but we have conferred on a portion of the community, an art still higher,—of converting paper to all intents and purposes, into the precious metals; and ought we to be surprised, that an article so cheap to the manufacturers, and so dear to the rest of the community, should be so greedily over supplied, and without any reference to the interest, or to the wants of the community?

If we are to believe the senator from Virginia, and others on the same side, we owe almost all our improvements and prosperity to the banking system;—and if it should fail, the age of barbarism would again return. I had supposed that the bases of our prosperity were our free institutions; the wide spread and fertile region we occupy, and the hereditary intelligence and energy of the stock, from which we are descended; but it seems, that all these go for nothing, and that the banks are every thing. I make no war on them. All I insist on is, that the government shall separate from them, which I believe to be indispensable, for the reasons I have assigned, both now and formerly. But I cannot concur in attributing to them our improvements and prosperity. That they contributed to give a strong impulse to industry and enterprise in the early stages of their operation, I doubt not. Nothing is more stimulating than an expanding and depreciating currency. It creates a delusive appearance of prosperity, which puts every thing in motion. Every one feels as if he was growing richer, as prices rise, and that he has it in his power, by foresight and exertion, to make his fortune. But it is the nature of stimulus, moral as well as physical, to excite at first, and to depress afterwards. The draught, which at first causes unnatural excitement and energy is sure to terminate in corresponding depression and weakness; nor is it less certain that the stimulus of a currency, expanding beyond its proper limits, follows the same law. We have had the exhilaration, and the depression has succeeded. We have had the pleasure of getting drunk, and now experience the pain of becoming sober. The good is gone and the evil has succeeded; and on a fair calculation, the latter will be found to be greater than the former. Whatever impulse the banking system was calculated to give to our improvement and prosperity, has already been given; and the reverse effects will hereafter follow, unless the system should undergo great and radical changes; the first step towards which, would be the adoption of the measure proposed by this bill.

I have, Mr. President, finished what I intended to say. I have long anticipated the present crisis, but did not expect its arrival in my time. When I saw its approach, I resolved to do my duty be the consequences to me what they might, and I offer my thanks to the Author of my being, that he has given me the resolution and opportunity to discharge, what I honestly believe to be that duty on this great subject.

How the question will be decided, is acknowledged to be doubtful, so nearly are the two houses supposed to be divided; but whatever may be its fate now, I have the most perfect confidence in its final triumph. The public attention is roused. The subject will be thoroughly investigated, and I have no fears but the side I support, will prove to be the side of truth, justice, liberty, civilization, and moral and intellectual excellence.

TWENTY-FIFTH CONGRESS.

SECOND SESSION—SENATE.

March 17. The senate met, and, after the reading of the journal, adjourned, to attend the funeral of the hon. Timothy Jarvis Carter, late a representative from the state of Maine.

March 19. The Vice-President presented, from the state department, a report, called for by a senate resolution, offered by Mr. Benton, in relation to the contract with the publishers of the documentary history of the revolution. Laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Also, from the post office department, the remainder of the correspondence, &c. called for by resolution of the 9th instant, offered by Mr. Niles in relation to the conduct of the Metropolis Bank of this city, as a public fiscal agent. Laid on the table, and ordered to be printed, together with the documents on the same subject from the treasury department.

By Mr. Linn: from the Missouri iron company, asking that they may be permitted to enter 500,000 acres of the public lands on a credit of five years, with a view to secure the wood upon it for the use of the company; also asking a right of way through the public lands for a railroad from the iron mountain to the Mississippi, the neighborhood of which Mr. L. recommended as the best possible site for a national foundry. Referred.

By Messrs. Swift, Wright, and Morris: Various petitions on slavery and the slave trade. Motions to receive severally laid on the table.

By Messrs. Wright and Morris: remonstrating against the admission of Texas. Laid on the table.

By Mr. Buchanan, from H. Binney and other citizens of Philadelphia, with statements of the large amount of property employed in the book-selling and book-publishing business, which would be at stake on the passage of the proposed international copyright law. Laid on the table, and ordered to be printed. Mr. B. intimating that he would call it up hereafter, if it should be necessary, to effect the object of the petitioners in opposition to the proposed copyright law.

By Mr. Wall: from citizens of Essex county, New Jersey, friends of a tried and sound currency, expressing their views in favor of a United States bank for that purpose, and in decided opposition to the sub-treasury scheme. Referred, and ordered to be printed.

By Mr. Ruggles: from citizens of Maine, in opposition to the sub-treasury, and in favor of a national bank. Laid on the table. By Mr. Lyon and Mr. Preston: from individuals. Referred. Mr. Grundy, from the committee on the judiciary, reported the substitute of the house, referred to that committee, for the senate bill altering the time of holding the United States courts in the 9th circuit without amendment, together with communications on the subject of the bill from the two judges, Wayne and McKinley, of that circuit.

[This bill was subsequently taken up, the two above named communications were read, together with extracts from letters from the clerks of the courts; an amendment was offered to the substitute of the house, by Mr. Sevier, (to change the holding of the Arkansas circuit court to October instead of March, as proposed,) and the bill was then informally passed over, the morning hour having expired.]

Mr. Morris offered a resolution, immediate action on which being objected to by Mr. Clay, of Alabama, lies over one day, instructing the committee on the judiciary to inquire whether the present laws of the United States on the subject of the slave trade prohibited that trade, or the transfer of slaves between this country and Texas.

Mr. Knight, on leave, introduced a bill for the relief of the heirs of Benjamin King. Read twice and referred.

The senate resumed the consideration of the sub-treasury bill.

Mr. Benton concluded his remarks in favor of the bill. On motion of Mr. Southard, the senate adjourned.

March 20. Mr. McKean presented the proceedings of a large meeting of the friends of the late and present administrations of the general government, and opposed to the sub-treasury bill, recently held at Pittsburgh, on which occasion George A. Cook presided. Mr. McK. said, on looking over the names of the gentlemen who made the call and took part in this meeting, he knew many of them to be what they profess to be, "friends and supporters of the late and present administrations;" he knew also that they were men of respectability and democrats of the old school. Read, laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

Several petitions from individuals, &c. were presented and referred.

A number of bills were reported:

Mr. Morris, from the committee on the judiciary, reported the bill referred to them, establishing the territory of Iowa from a portion of that of Wisconsin, with an amendment, which was read.

The resolution offered by Mr. Norvell, for declaring the sense of the senate that no one engaged in a duel ought to be appointed to office under the U. S. government, was taken up, and without debate, laid on the table, on motion of Mr. Clay, of Alabama.

The resolution offered by Mr. Morris, for instructing the committee on the judiciary to inquire in regard to the relations of the United States with Texas in regard to slavery, under existing laws, and whether any legislation is necessary or expedient on this subject, was taken up, and, without debate, laid on the table, on motion of Mr. Walker, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Brown, Buchanan, Clay, of Alabama, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Pierce, Preston, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Smith, of Connecticut, Southard, Spence, Strange, Tallmadge, Tipton, Trotter, Walker, White, Wright, Young—32.

NAYS—Messrs. Linn, McKean, Morris, Niles, Prentiss, Robbins, Smith, of Indiana, Swift, Williams—9.

On motion of Mr. Wall, the committee on the judiciary was discharged from the further consideration of the subject of increasing the compensation of the United States district attorney for Indiana.

Also, of allowing mileage to the judges of the United States courts for the purpose of equalizing their salaries.

Mr. Wall, from the same committee, reported the bill referred to them supplementary to the act regulating the processes in the courts of the United States providing compensation for jurors, witnesses, &c. with a motion for its indefinite postponement. Laid on the table.

Also, a motion to discharge the same committee from the farther consideration of the subject of paying jurors in the United States district court in Mississippi. Laid on the table.

The bill for the relief Michael Caskett was read a third time, and passed.

The senate resumed the consideration of the bill to change the time of holding the courts of the United States in the ninth circuit.

The amendment before offered by Mr. Sevier to the substitute of the other house for the bill, was adopted.

Mr. Sevier moved farther to amend the substitute by declaring it a high misdemeanor for any judge to fail or refuse to hold the courts as required by the law, except in the case of sickness.

Mr. Preston and Mr. Clay, of Alabama, objected to this amendment as redundant, or as interfering with the provision of the constitution that judges should hold their office during good behavior, a point that must, in any case, be decided under the constitution, in pursuance of a process of impeachment.

Mr. Sevier, on account of several successive failures to hold the court in Arkansas, insisted on trying the question on his amendment, though he was willing to amend it by adding other proper and sufficient excuses besides that of sickness.

The morning hour having expired, the bill was informally passed over.

The senate again took under consideration the sub-treasury bill.

Mr. Southard spoke in opposition to the bill, and in reply to Mr. Calhoun and Mr. Benton. Before he had concluded,

The senate adjourned, after an executive session.

March 21. After the presentation of petitions, on motion of Mr. Linn, 5,000 extra copies of the report on the subject of acclimating tropical plants in Florida, were ordered to be printed.

On motion of Mr. Tipton, the committee on the post office and post roads were instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a post route from Corydon to Harrison county, in Indiana.

Mr. Tipton also offered a resolution directing the expenditure of an appropriation heretofore made for the removal of the United States troops from Fort Gibson. Read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. King, from the committee on commerce, reported the house bills referred to them, for the relief of George Dyer, and of Squier Stearns, with a notice that when they should come up he should move for their indefinite postponement.

The senate resumed the consideration of the bill to alter the time of holding the United States courts in the ninth district.

Mr. Sevier withdrew his amendment, making it a high misdemeanor for a judge to refuse or fail to hold the courts as required by law, except in case of sickness.

The question recurring on the substitute of the house for the bill as amended by the senate,

Mr. Preston opposed the substitute on the ground that it added to the circuit of Judge Wayne the state of Alabama, in which Judge McKinley resides, thus also relieving one of them from certain duties, and imposing them on another, when the duties of both respectively were well known to them when they accepted their appointments.

Mr. Clay, of Alabama, repudiated all personal considerations relating to the judges, and urged the propriety and expediency of the substitute, (joining Alabama to Georgia and South Carolina,) on the ground of public utility.

Mr. White expressed his concurrence in the sentiment of Mr. Clay, that legislation should be conducted with a view to the public interests, and not to men. He, however, objected to the residence of two judges within the same circuit; and, on this principle, in connexion with the unreasonable amount of duties which would be imposed on judge Wayne, he opposed the substitute.

On motion of Mr. Buchanan, the bill was laid on the table.

A message was received from the president of the United States, on the subject of the northeastern boundary. Laid on the table, and 1,000 extra copies ordered to be printed.

The senate resumed the consideration of the sub-treasury bill.

Mr. Southard concluded his remarks in opposition to the bill.

The question was then put on Mr. Rives's substitute for the bill, and it was lost by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Knight, McKean, Merrick, Nicholas, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Robbins, Ruggles, Smith, of Indiana, Southard, Spence, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Webster, White—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Lyon, Morris, Mouton, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Smith, of Connecticut, Strange, Trotter, Walker, Wall, Williams, Wright, Young—30.

Mr. Cuthbert expressed great regret for differing at all from his political friends; he was not unwilling to separate the government from the banks, but still would not concur in refusing to take the paper of the banks, which constituted and must constitute the principal medium of commerce and currency of the people. He therefore moved to strike out the 23d section of the bill, which provides that the government should gradually cease entirely to receive the notes of other banks.

Mr. Calhoun said he regarded this as a very important provision of the bill; and before taking the question on striking it out, he wished to be heard on this point, and also in the expression of his views in a general argument in favor of the bill.—He therefore moved that the senate adjourn; whereupon

The senate went informally into executive session, after which it adjourned.

Mr. Toland offered the following, which lies over one day:

Mr. Shields offered the following, which lies over one day:

Whereas, many of the troops employed in the service of the United States, in the present Florida Seminole war, lost their horses and baggage in said service, without any fault of theirs, because the United States had failed to provide forage for said horses, and consequently said troops were dismounted, many hundred miles from home, and required to perform, and did perform, after they were dismounted, on foot, the same services which were required of mounted men; and, notwithstanding their monthly pay while mounted was twenty dollars, it was reduced after they had sustained such loss to eight dollars per month; and, whereas, the horses of many of said troops died from excessive fatigue in executing extraordinary orders of the commanding officers, without any fault of their riders, and the said horses were killed by accident or casualty while under the immediate orders and direction of said officers, to which they would not otherwise have been liable; therefore,

Resolved, That the committee on claims be instructed to inquire into the expediency of allowing to said dismounted men, who performed services as above stated, additional pay, so as to make their monthly wages equal to that of mounted men in said service; and, also, of providing that the property lost in said service, in any of the troops above mentioned, shall be paid for by the United States.

Mr. Davies offered the following, which was disagreed to by the house.

Resolved, That hereafter the stated hour of meeting of this house shall be half past eleven o'clock.

Mr. Cushman offered a similar resolution, fixing the time of meeting at 11 o'clock, which was also rejected.

On motion of Mr. Rice Garland,

Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury be directed to communicate to this house what progress has been made in issuing patents for land in the state of Louisiana since the last report made to this house on that subject, stating particularly how many patents have been issued for private land claims; how many for lands purchased under the credit system; how many for lands purchased under the cash system at public sales, and by private entry of lands that have been offered for sale; how many for lands sold under the different laws authorizing the entry at private sale of the back lands in that state; how many for purchasers under each of the pre-emption laws of 1814, of May 29, 1830, and June 19, 1834; and how many under any other description of title. Also, how many remain yet to be issued of each of said description of titles, and the causes that delay the issuing of said patents; also, when it is probable the patents now suspended will be issued; also, what progress has been made in the examination of the certificates of purchase under the pre-emption law of June 19, 1834; when the examination will probably terminate; and under what law or laws the said secretary of the treasury, or the commissioner of the general land office, they, or either of them, have suspended the issuing of patents under said act.

On motion of Mr. Sawyer,

Resolved, That the committee on commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a light boat off Bluff Point, on Albemarle sound.

On motion of Mr. Phillips, it was Resolved, That the committee on commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of remodeling the consular establishment of the United States.

Mr. Adams offered the following, which lies over:

Resolved, That the clerk of this house be directed to cause to be made out, and reported to this house, a list of all the petitions, memorials and papers presented to the house, at the late session, and at the present session of congress, and laid on the table without being read, printed, debated, or referred; specifying the names of the first petitioner, and the number of signatures to each paper so laid on the table; specifying also the state from which each petition, memorial remonstrance, or resolution came; and distinguishing all such as have been laid on the table under the general resolution of the 21st December, 1837, from those which have been laid on the table by separate motions, and showing the object prayed for in each of said petitions, memorials, remonstrances and resolution.

On motion of Mr. Everett, it was Resolved, That the secretary of war be directed to lay before this house a copy of his answer to a letter of general Jesup, of the 20th December, 1837.

Mr. Patton moved the suspension of the rules for the purpose of taking up the resolutions, offered by himself, on a former day, on the subject of the executive power, and the manner of its exercise, and proposing the appointment of a select committee to inquire whether any "honest, capable, and faithful" officers have been dismissed from offices not on grounds of error, negligence, incapacity, misconduct, or unfitness; and, also, to consider and report whether any and what restrictions can be imposed by law upon the executive patronage, so as more effectually to guard against abuse and corruption in the exercise of the power of removal from and appointment to office.

And upon this motion Mr. Patton demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

Mr. Cambreleng asked if it was the object of the mover to make the consideration of this resolution the special order.

Mr. Patton replied that it was his object to move for the assignment of a particular day for the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. Boon wished to vote understandingly. He would ask how far back this inquiry was to go?

Mr. Patton said he was willing that it should go back to the beginning of the government.

The resolutions were again read at the request of several members, and, the question being taken, resulted as follows: Yeas, 71, nays 68. So that, (more than a hundred members being absent,) two-thirds not voting for the motion, the house refused at this time to give preference to the consideration of Mr. Patton's resolutions.

From Michigan, by Mr. Cray.

From Florida, by Mr. Downing.

Memorials in relation to the late duel, and the subject of duelling generally, were presented by Messrs. Fairfield, Davee, Adams, McClellan, Sibley, Loomis, De Graff, Maxwell, Henry, McClure, Biddle, Polk, Kilgore, and Phillips, and referred to the select committee on that subject.

Remonstrances against the annexation of Texas were presented by Messrs. Fletcher, Lincoln, and Naylor, and laid on the table.

Memorials relating to slavery, were presented by Messrs. Cushing, Briggs, Fletcher, Lincoln, Adams, Everett, Davis, Henry, Naylor, Kilgore, and Herod.

The house then adjourned.

Tuesday, March 20. On motion of Mr. E. Whittlesey, the Speaker was requested to appoint a member of the committee of claims, vice Mr. Carter, deceased.

After a number of committees had reported, the house took up the unfinished business of the morning, which was the resolution of Mr. Wm. C. Johnson, in relation to the appropriation of public lands for public schools already debated by that gentleman for several days during that hour. He had not finished when the time appropriated to morning business elapsed.

On motion of Mr. Cambreleng, the house went into committee of the whole on the state of the union, (Mr. Casey in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill.

Mr. Cambreleng proposed to amend the bill by increasing the same to be appropriated for the protection of seamen, from thirty thousand dollars, as proposed in the bill, to forty thousand dollars.

Mr. Adams complained that it had not been shown to be clearly necessary to appropriate so large an additional sum to that already appropriated for this object at the extra session. He wanted an inquiry into this subject.

It was also objected by Mr. A. H. Shepperd, that the accounts of the officers, employed to disburse this money, as foreign consuls, &c. were not before the house; and that an investigation of these accounts should be had.

Mr. Howard attributed the necessity of making an additional appropriation for this object to the difference of exchange, which has made the expenditure greater, and which will have the same effect for some time to come.

Mr. A. H. Shepperd contended that the great sin in this matter is that sums are represented as being expended, which are yet in the hands of disbursing officers. He was for an inquiry into this subject.

Mr. Adams made some explanations as to the mode in which drafts were made for the purpose under consideration, by foreign consuls, and urged still further the necessity of the inquiry he had proposed. Mr. A. thought there was a good deal in the remark of the gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. Howard,) that the difference in exchange was the cause of an increased expenditure in this department. He said that this had been adverted to as a good argument in favor of the sub-treasury scheme. This he had hardly expected: but he hoped that the chairman of the committee of ways and means, or some other skilful financier in this house, would bring forward some measure, which would have the effect to relieve the country from such an onerous tax as that to which allusion was made by the chairman of the committee on foreign affairs.

Mr. Phillips made statements to show that there had latterly been a great increase in the number of cases, calling for the expenditure of this appropriation, and to demonstrate the necessity of the proposed amendment.

Some explanations ensued, between Messrs. Cambreleng, A. H. Shepperd, and Adams, as to the mode of remitting, drawing, and disbursing the fund for the relief of distressed seamen.

Mr. McKay contended that the whole matter required to be regulated and revised, and showed the necessity of this by comparing the present usage with the requisitions of the law of 1803. He was opposed to the amendment.

Mr. McKim thought the amendment proposed one of the most important items in the bill before the committee. The object was most useful, and the necessity of the case required that the proposed increase should now be made.

The question was then taken on the proposed amendment, yeas 44, nays 19; no quorum voting.

The Speaker resumed the chair, and the chairman announced the fact that no-quorum was present.

Mr. Reed rose to move that the house adjourn, and called for the yeas and nays, with the view of ascertaining who were present. He should vote against adjournment.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the house refused to adjourn by the following vote: yeas 9, nays 121.

A quorum appearing, Mr. Casey resumed the chair, and the amendment under consideration was adopted without a division.

On motion of Mr. Cambreleng, (who stated that there was no other head under which the appropriations could be presented,) the bill was so amended as to provide for the second payment of Luigi Persico, under a joint resolution of both houses, $4000; and for the second payment to artists employed upon the pictures for the rotundo, $8000.

Mr. Bell offered the following amendment to the bill:

"Sec. . . And be it further enacted, That, from and after the first day of October next, the salaries of all the officers for the payment of which provision is made in this act, and all compensations and allowances to agents or other persons authorized by law, the payment of which is provided for in this act except the president and judges of the courts of the United States, and except also, such officers, agents, diplomatic or commercial, whose duties require them to reside without the limits of the United States and the territories thereof, shall be reduced one-fourth, or twenty-five per cent. of the amount now authorized by law: provided, that any time before the said first day of October, the bill reported from the committee on ways and means to the house of representatives, entitled "a bill to provide for the collection, safe-keeping, transfer, and disbursement of the public revenue," or any other bill of a similar tendency, or in which provision shall be made for the collection and disbursement of the public revenue in gold and silver, treasury notes, or other evidences of debt issued under the authority of the United States, to the exclusion of current bank notes shall become the law of the land."

Mr. Cambreleg objected that this amendment was not in order, as to the bill under consideration, under the rules of the house.

The Chair decided it not to be in order.

Mr. Bell took an appeal from this decision. The rule in question provides that "no motion or proposition on a subject, different from that under consideration, should be admitted under color of amendment." This objection did not apply to this amendment, he contended; it had reference to the specific subject-matter of the bill. He also answered other supposed objections to the presentation of his proposition as an amendment to the bill under consideration; and insisted that the construction of the rule, set up by the gentleman from New York, (Mr. Cambreleg), as an objection to this amendment, was a new construction of a rule acted upon for many years without such objections.

Mr. Williams, of North Carolina, defended the appropriateness of the proposed amendment to this bill. He gave instances to show that the practice of the house was in favor of such a construction of the rule. He hoped the committee would overrule the decision of the chair upon this question of order, whether the amendment itself were or were not adopted.

Mr. Cambreleg opposed the appeal, and contended that the letter of the rule should be adhered to, whatever might have been the practice of the house under that rule hitherto.

Mr. Bell further contended that his amendment was not on a different subject from that under consideration, and urged its adoption upon that ground, as well as upon the uniform practice of the house.

Mr. Halstead sustained the appeal. What was the subject of the bill? The payment of the salaries of public officers. And what was the subject of the proposed amendment? The reduction of the amounts of those salaries. Nor did that portion of the amendment which makes it contingent at all after that view of the question. He was in favor of the amendment, and of its coming in under the bill before the committee, as a course sanctioned by the custom and usage of the house.

Mr. Reed defended the proposition to append the proposed amendment to the general appropriation bill upon the same grounds as those stated by the gentleman last up.

Mr. Cushman supported the chair.

The question upon sustaining the decision of the chair was taken by tellers, and resulted as follows: ayes 66, noes 57. So the chair was sustained.

Mr. Reed rose and made a correction of an error in the report of some remarks of his upon a former day, in relation to certain expenditures of the post office department.

Jet d'eau, in the yard of the capitol, &c.

Mr. Halstead moved to strike from the bill the item of $4,000 for the jet d'eau on the southern foot path in the capitol grounds, and was about to make another amendment he wished to make, when

The Chair reminded him that the committee had decided to act upon one amendment at a time.

Mr. Halstead said he was about to give his reasons for opposing this and other items in the bill, and the whole bill. He was proceeding to do this, when he gave way to a motion that the committee rise, which motion prevailed; and then, on motion, The house adjourned at 4 o'clock.

Wednesday, March 21. The following, among other reports, were presented to-day.

By Mr. Cambreleg, from the committee of ways and means, a bill making appropriations for preventing and suppressing Indian hostilities for 1838, and for arrearages for 1837.

By Mr. Fry, from the committee on revolutionary pensions, against the resolution of February 19, to amend the pension law of July 4, 1836; also, against the petitions of Hannah Brown and Catharine Coffin; and a bill granting a pension to Stephen Olney.

By Mr. Harlan, from the same committee, reported unfavorably upon the subject of reviving the acts granting bounty lands and extra pay to certain Canadian volunteers.

By Mr. Kemble, from the committee on military affairs, against the petition of Ann C. Stephenson.

By Mr. Ingham, from the committee on naval affairs, a bill to authorize the employment of two additional clerks in the office of the secretary of the navy, two additional clerks in the office of the navy commissioners, and to increase the compensation of the warrant clerk of the navy department.

On motion of Mr. Thomas,

Resolved, That the clerk be directed to purchase a full and perfect copy of the laws of the United States for the use of each of the standing committees of the house of representatives, and to pay for the same out of the contingent fund.

The house took up and concurred in the following resolution, moved by Mr. Slade on the 11th of January last:

"Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury be directed to lay before this house a statement, showing the number of acres of the public lands which have been purchased under laws granting the right of pre-emption, distinguishing the several laws under which, and the several states and territories in which such purchases have been made. And that he also be directed to communicate any information which may be in possession of his department touching any associations which may have been formed by intruders on public lands, for the purpose of adjusting their relative rights of occupancy, and putting down competition at the public sales of such lands."

Mr. Johnson of Maryland, being indisposed to-day, the consideration of his resolution, in relation to public lands and public schools, on motion of Mr. Everett, of Vermont, was postponed until to-morrow morning.

The resolution of Mr. Everett, which was laid on the table on the 28th December, calling upon the department of state, for information relative to the correspondence of this government with that of Mexico, was then taken up, and passed.

Mr. Cushman moved that the house go into committee of the whole, during the remainder of the hour, upon the bill from the senate, for testing experiments for the purpose of preventing the explosion of steamboat boilers.

Mr. Adams objected, on the ground that several resolutions remained on the speaker's table, requiring immediate action; and that the morning hour should be devoted to their consideration.

Mr. Cushman's motion to suspend the rules was lost.

Mr. Clark asked leave to introduce at this time a resolution, fixing a day for the special consideration of the sub-treasury bill, reported by the committee of this house; to which objection was made. Mr. C. made an unsuccessful motion to suspend the rules for this purpose.

The resolution of Mr. Miller, offered on the 29th December, and laid on the table for consideration, for the purpose of ordering an inquiry into the expediency of making certain improvements in the harbor of St. Louis, was taken up, and adopted.

Two resolutions offered by Mr. Jones on the same day and laid over, authorizing certain surveys of rivers in the territory of Wisconsin, were taken up, and, on motion of Mr. Bond, referred to the committee on roads and canals.

A resolution offered by the same, on the same day, and laid over, in relation to the surveys of certain mineral lands in that territory, was taken up and adopted.

The resolution of Mr. Everett, offered and laid over on the 9th January, calling for inquiry as to the capture of certain Seminoles, under a flag of truce, by general Jesup, was next taken up, and passed.

The resolution of Mr. Fillmore, calling for information from the executive relative to the burning of the steamboat Caroline, at Schlosser, which was offered on the 19th of February, and laid over, came next in order for consideration.

Mr. McKim said that, in the absence of the chairman of the committee on foreign affairs, he would move to lay this resolution on the table.

Mr. Fillmore expressed the hope that the resolution would not thus be disposed of. It was offered a month ago, and the information it called for was of importance.

Mr. McKim insisting on his motion,

Mr. Fillmore demanded the yeas and nays; when Mr. McKim said he would change his motion, and moved to postpone the further consideration of the resolution until to-morrow.

Mr. Fillmore would like to know for what reason the gentleman from Maryland had interposed this objection.

Mr. McKim had already said that the chairman of the committee on foreign affairs was not in his place.

Mr. Fillmore said he had the best reason to know that that gentleman was in favor of, or rather was not opposed to, the adoption of this proposition.

Mr. McKim could only speak for himself. He was, himself, opposed to the adoption of it. Every thing was now going on right, with regard to that affair, and the tendency of this proposition would only be to excite and irritate feeling.

Mr. Fillmore. It would be recollected that the affair alluded to in this proposition occurred some three months ago. The resolution of inquiry had already been on the table a month. The information it seeks is in the hands of the executive. To obtain it was a matter of as much importance to his constituents as it could possibly be to the gentleman from Maryland, who has easier access to its source. It was discretionary with the executive to grant or to withhold this information, as he should think best. The gentleman from Maryland might certainly so far confide in the executive as to leave such a matter to him.

Mr. Adams, hoped the gentleman from Maryland would withdraw his motion to postpone. The information asked for was of such a character as to allay, not to excite feeling. The house was the proper arbiter of all questions touching peace and war, and should first receive all important information upon topics like that under consideration. Yet the intelligence of the day had contained official correspondence upon the subject, which this very resolution a month ago demanded, and which now comes before the house from Canada.

Mr. McKim had read this correspondence, and saw in it only additional reason why this resolution ought not now to be adopted. It would only keep up the feverish anxiety of the country to know that which the proper time for knowing had not yet come. The whole affair was the subject of negotiation at the court of St. James, and it would be improper to anticipate the result. He could not withdraw his motion to postpone.

Mr. Fillmore and Mr. Fletcher, of Vermont, insisted upon the importance of this information to the whole country, and to their constituents in particular, and hoped the motion would not prevail.

The motion to postpone was rejected without a division; and the resolution was then adopted.

On motion of Mr. Cambreleg, the house resolved itself into committee of the whole on the state of the union, (Mr. Casey in the chair,) upon the general appropriation bill.

An amendment offered yesterday by Mr. Halstead, proposing to strike out the appropriation of $4,000 for a jet d'eau in the capitol yard, being under consideration, and the mover having possession of the floor,

Mr. Halstead went at length into an examination of the expenditures of the last and present administrations, and those of Mr. Adams' administration, urging the necessity of their reduction, and of the interposition of a check to alleged increasing extravagances.

Mr. Bynum responded to the remarks of Mr. Halstead. His observations applied to the strictures of the gentleman from New Jersey upon the extravagance of the administration, and were chiefly of a personal character.

Mr. Lincoln expressed his surprise that the gentleman from New Jersey should have introduced his review of the expenditures upon an amendment so unimportant. He defended the appropriation under consideration, and did not consider that, as chairman of the committee on the public buildings, he had acted in opposition to democratic principles in putting that item into the estimates upon which the bill before the committee was based. He was opposed to rash and indiscriminate denunciations against the administration, and believed that such a course impeded, rather than aided desirable reforms.

Mr. Bell said that the country was under obligation to the gentleman from New Jersey for his effort in bringing up the instances of extravagance in expenditure in the administration of the government, whether in the legislative or executive departments. He believed that that gentleman would find that some of the items to which he had alluded were not the proper subjects of animadversion; but as to the great mass of those items, he was correct. Mr. B. was sorry to perceive the tone in which that gentleman had been responded to. If the positions of gentlemen upon this subject were to be sanctioned by the house, there was an end to free debate and free inquiry into the expenditures of the government forever. He thought the present the proper occasion for the introduction of this discussion, as to the general expenditures of government.

Mr. Cambreleg made some remarks in reference to the pressing necessity of the immediate passage of the appropriation bills.

Mr. Mercer, as a member of the committee on the public buildings, sustained the particular item in the bill now to be stricken out.

Mr. Halstead took the floor, and gave way to Mr. Bell, who moved that the committee rise; which was ordered, 63 to 48.

On motion of Mr. Underwood, the house adjourned at ten minutes past 5 o'clock.

NILES' NATIONAL REGISTER.

FIFTH SERIES. No. 5.—VOL. IV.]

WASHINGTON CITY, MARCH 31, 1838.

[VOL. LIV.—WHOLE No. 1,832.]

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

PRINTED AND PUBLISHED, EVERY SATURDAY, BY WILLIAM OGDEN NILES, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

Our present sheet contains Mr. Clay's speech on the sub-treasury bill. It has been in type for some time, waiting an insertion in the order of the debate. In our next we will publish Mr. Webster's speech, and follow it with Mr. Calhoun's reply to Mr. Clay, and the desultory debate which occurred between those gentlemen.

Since our last general Scott arrived in this city, and is, we are pleased to learn, in excellent health.

The "Globe" on Wednesday night says:—"We regret to learn that the Hon. Mr. McKim of Maryland, has been confined to his chamber by indisposition since Thursday last, which will account for his name not being found in the vote of the house since that day."

THE SUB-TREASURY BILL, as amended in various particulars, was ordered to be engrossed on Saturday night last by a vote of 27 yeas to 25 noes, and by the same vote passed on Monday last. On Tuesday it was reported to the house by the speaker, and, after a short debate, on motion of Mr. Patton ordered to lie on the table—yeas 106, nays 98. We have inserted the bill as it passed the senate, and all the proceedings upon it in that body and in the house, in subsequent pages, to which our readers are referred.

MANDAMUS CASE. On Thursday last the circuit court of the District of Columbia, was moved to issue their process of attachment against Amos Kendall, esq. postmaster general, for contempt in disobeying the mandamus heretofore issued in this case. Mr. R. S. Cox, who read the application, as we learn from the "Intelligencer," made a short statement of the facts which had transpired since the decision of the supreme court, and read a correspondence with the postmaster general on the subject. The court has not made known its decision.

NEW HAMPSHIRE. The New "Hampshire Patriot," of the 26th inst. says, Mr. Hill's majority is 3033, and five small towns to be heard from, which gave in 1832, 101 for Jackson and 23 for Clay.

Of the state of parties in the legislature we have nothing certain. But the Concord Statesman, (W.), of about 240 members of the house, puts down 114 as whigs, 10 or 12 as conservatives, and the balance as friends of the administration.

CANADIAN AFFAIRS. Gen. Sutherland, of the patriot army, an account of whose capture we published sometime since, is now under trial by a military court martial at Toronto. He is arraigned under an act, passed at the recent session of the Upper Canada legislature, "to protect the inhabitants of the province from aggression from the frontier or neighboring countries."

On his arraignment he called himself a lawyer—which would seem to contradict the story of his being a deserter from the U. S. marines.

After his arraignment, as we learn from the New York American, he made an unsuccessful attempt to destroy himself. Complaining of indisposition, he induced the jailor to send him a basin of warm water, and at the same time asking for some writing materials; they were sent, together with a pen-knife. Having induced the sentinel stationed in his room to lie down and sleep, Sutherland attempted to destroy himself, by putting his feet and hands in the warm water, and with the penknife opening the veins of the arms and legs. The faintness caused by the loss of blood, caused him to fall on the floor, which aroused the sentinel; immediate assistance was procured. The wounds bound up, and the prisoner removed to the hospital.

The Hamilton (U. C.) Express, of the 17th inst. says:

Colonel Prince has gone to Toronto to give evidence against Sutherland, Theller, and others, before the court martial, which has been organized for their trial. We understand that colonel Prince said the spot where Sutherland was taken has been measured by the American authorities, and declared by them to be within our territory. If this be so, it cuts off all hope which the miserable wretch may have clung to for the prolongation of his life.

M. Papineau, ex-speaker of the house of assembly.

bly of Lower Canada, and leader, as was supposed, of the recent insurrection, has, according to a letter from Dr. Nelson, a co-patriot, deserted back again to the royal authorities, and abandoned the cause of revolution—induced thereto, says the aforesaid doctor, "through selfish and family motives regarding the seignories and inveterate love of the old French bad laws."

A more miserable failure, or a more weak, un-purposed and unconcerted attempt to overthrow an established government, was never made than in the case of the recent outbreaks in Canada.

BANKS, CURRENCY, &c. The Albany Argus of Saturday last contains a statement of the condition of the banks of New York, for the month ending the 1st inst. A comparison with previous reports shows the following results:

	June 1.	Feb. 1.	March 1.
Loans and disc'ts,	64,391,999	53,393,854	52,338,338
Specie,	2,802,313	3,919,332	4,092,793
Circulation,	14,940,498	11,545,850	11,107,350
Due canal fund,	3,052,598	3,249,730	2,833,221
state treasurer,	2,152,950	147,527	31,169
U. S. treasurer,	4,143,389	199,443	174,996
Ind. depositors,	14,516,813	14,950,163	14,375,291
Profits,	6,329,726	8,010,450	8,057,769

The above statements show a diminution of loans and discounts for the last month, of $1,095,566; an increase of specie of $173,461; a diminished circulation of $408,500; a decrease of the canal fund deposits of $386,509; of individual deposits, $574,872; and of the state treasurer's deposit of $158,273.

The Boston Daily Advertiser publishes the following:

Resumption of specie payments. The late bank convention at New York, adjourned to meet again in that city on the 2nd Wednesday in April. The associated banks of this city have appointed the same delegates who attended the former convention, with instructions, we believe, which authorize them to agree to a resumption of specie payments on the part of the banks of this city, at as early a period as the convention may deem it expedient. We have no doubt that the banks of this city will be fully prepared to resume at the earliest date which can be named by the convention.

The presidents of the New Orleans banks held a preparatory meeting on the 16th inst. to consult on their joint action with regard to the emission of post notes, &c., of which Mr. H. D. F. Burthe, of the Carrollton bank, was appointed chairman. It was adjourned till next day, for the purpose of acquiring correct information as to the present circulation of each bank.

The board of trade of New York, at a meeting on Saturday evening, adopted the following resolution by an almost unanimous vote:

Resolved, That the board of trade consider the charges, contained in a memorial to the legislature, on the Phoenix bank, fully proved, and that its charter ought to be repealed, and its affairs closed by competent receivers.

The New York Journal of Commerce says that a few days have produced great fluctuations in the rates of domestic exchanges. The rate on Mississippi is now twenty-five per cent. discount, Tennessee 20; Alabama bank notes of large denominations, 17; Georgia, 10; Ohio, 8; Michigan, 12, and Wild Cat, 25. The recent change has been chiefly in exchange on Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi and Tennessee. It is said that the banks of the two latter states have large funds on the Atlantic, which they refuse altogether to employ in redeeming their paper, until, by holding off, they get it still lower. They have bought immense quantities of cotton at high prices, part of which has been credited towards debts due to the banks, and the balance has been settled by large issues of their notes. These notes constitute the local currency, and serve to pay the debts due from their merchants to those on the Atlantic cities. Many eastern merchants have taken these notes, and now the banks contrive to throw on them the whole loss which would otherwise accrue on the high prices they have paid. Instead of employing the proceeds of their cotton to equalize exchanges by buying up their bills as fast as they have funds, which would make the loss to eastern merchants bad enough in all conscience, they hold those funds in reserve until the accumulation of their notes depresses the price of them low enough to satisfy their plans, when they will probably buy them up. The difficulty with the other states, is a real indebtedness, and too liberal issues from the banks. Their policy of present ease will be liable to recoil at the last in heavier calamity. Exchanges on the great point of New Orleans remain steady, and on Boston, we are happy to say, have been brought down within one-fourth or one-half per cent. of par. The operation has been somewhat severe, but the result has been quickly brought about, and will prepare the way for speedy relief and expansion. Money is scarce here in a general way, yet plenty in some circles. The five per cent. treasury notes are a good deal bought up for the sake of the interest they bear.

On the 22d instant, the house of representatives of Massachusetts rejected the motion of Mr. Sturgis to instruct the committee to bring in a bill declaring that the charters of all the banks in the commonwealth were forfeited in consequence of the temporary suspension of specie payments. In favor of rejecting 218, nays 193.

In the senate, on the same day, after a long debate, the following resolution was passed by a unanimous vote, thirty-six senators voting in favor of it, viz:

"Resolved, That the suspension of specie payments by the banks of this commonwealth in May last was, under the circumstances, necessary, expedient, and for the interest of the people."

REVENUE OF 1837. The statement of the register of the treasury, recently presented to congress, shows the amount of gross revenue which accrued from duties on imports and tonnage in the ports of the United States to be $31,690,356. Of this amount $17,176,908 accrued in the city of New York; 4,439,472 in Boston; in Philadelphia 3,195,339; New Orleans 2,291,544; Baltimore 1,492,424; Charleston 693,389; Savannah 153,223; Richmond 152,575; Mobile 140,762; Portland 134,837; and Salem 128,081.

The amount of duties on imports which accrued in the city of New York in the year ending Sept. 30, 1837, was $10,855,201. The amount which accrued in the same period in Boston was 2,966,109; in Philadelphia, 2,073,778; Baltimore, 1,220,751; New Orleans, 1,670,758; Salem, 151,237.

The amount of debentures, bounties, &c., was $4,722,663, of which $1,376,844 was for expenses of collection. The amount of debentures and other deductions in New York was 1,467,782.

We find in the French papers the following notice published by the bank recently established in Paris under the chief direction of M. Laffitte:

"After the 1st January, the bank will issue notes bearing interest as follows:

2 per cent. on notes payable at 3 days sight,
2 1-2 do. do. payable at 12 do	12 do
4 do. do. payable at 30 do	30 do

The interest will be paid only to the day of their first presentation.

These notes given in exchange for money deposited with the bank are transferable by endorsement.

Drafts on all the cities in the departments will be furnished falling due at any period that may be required."

[N. Y. Courier.]

EMANCIPATION AND COLONIZATION. The New Orleans Picayune of the 13th inst. says—"We understand that six hundred negroes, belonging to a gentleman of this city, lately deceased, are to be liberated according to his will, provided they are willing to go to Africa, in which case ample provision is to be made for their transportation."

A STEAMER LOST. We learn, says the St. Louis Bulletin, "that the steamboat American, Lusk, master, on her passage from Natchez to this port, loaded with iron, struck a snag at the foot of Big Eddy, and sunk immediately in eight feet water; fortunately no lives were lost. The deck passengers have lost all the property they had on board. The Wilmington brought up the crew and passengers to this place."

SUB-TREASURY BILL.

The following is the bill as it passed the senate on Saturday night last:

A bill to impose additional duties as depositaries upon certain public officers, to appoint receivers general of public money, and to regulate the safe-keeping, transfer, and disbursement of the public moneys of the United States.

Be it enacted by the senate and house of representatives of the United States of America, in congress assembled, That there shall be prepared and provided, within the new treasury building now erecting at the seat of government, suitable and convenient rooms for the use of the treasurer of the United States, his assistants and clerks; and sufficient and secure fire proof vaults and safes, for the keeping of the public moneys in the possession and under the immediate control of the said treasurer; which said rooms, vaults, and safes, are hereby constituted and declared to be, the treasury of the United States. And the said treasurer of the United States shall keep all the public money which shall come to his hands in the treasury of the United States as hereby constituted, until the same are drawn therefrom according to law.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the mint of the United States, in the city of Philadelphia, in the state of Pennsylvania, and the branch mint, in the city of New Orleans, in the state of Louisiana, and the vaults and safes thereof, respectively, shall be places of deposit and safe-keeping of the public moneys at those points respectively; and the treasurer of the said mint and branch mint respectively, for the time being, shall have the custody and care of all public moneys deposited within the same, and shall perform all the duties required to be performed by them, in reference to the receipt, safe-keeping, transfer, and disbursements of all such moneys, according to the provisions hereinafter contained.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted. That there shall be prepared and provided, within the custom-houses now erecting in the city of New York, in the state of New York, and in the city of Boston, in the state of Massachusetts, suitable and convenient rooms for the use of the receivers general of public moneys, hereinafter directed to be appointed at those places respectively; and sufficient and secure fire proof vaults and safes for the safe-keeping of the public moneys collected and deposited with them, respectively; and the receivers general of public money, from time to time appointed at those points, shall have the custody and care of the said rooms, vaults and safes respectively, and of all the public money deposited within the same, and shall perform all the duties required to be performed by them in reference to the receipt, safe-keeping, transfer, and disbursement of all such moneys, according to the provisions of this act.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That there shall be erected, prepared, and provided, at the expense of the United States, at the city of Charleston, in the state of South Carolina, and at the city of St. Louis, in the state of Missouri, offices with suitable and convenient rooms for the use of the receivers general of public money hereinafter directed to be appointed at the places above named; and sufficient and secure fire proof vaults and safes for the keeping of the public money collected and deposited at those points respectively; and the said receivers general, from time to time appointed at those places, shall have the custody and care of the said offices, vaults, and safes, so to be erected, prepared, and provided, and of all the public moneys deposited within the same; and shall perform all the duties required to be performed by them, in reference to the receipt, safe-keeping, transfer, and disbursement of all such moneys, according to the provisions hereinafter contained.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the president shall nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the senate, appoint four officers, to be denominated "receivers general of public money," which said officers shall hold their respective offices for the term of four years unless sooner removed therefrom; one of which shall be located at the city of New York, in the state of New York; one of which shall be located at the city of Boston, in the state of Massachusetts; one of which shall be located at the city of Charleston, in the state of South Carolina; and the remaining one of which shall be located at the city of St. Louis, in the state of Missouri; and all of which said officers shall give bonds to the United States, with sureties, according to the provisions hereinafter contained, for the faithful discharge of the duties of their respective offices.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the treasurer of the United States, the treasurer of the mint of the United States, the treasurers, and those acting as such, of the various branch mints already erected and now erecting, all collectors of the customs, all surveyors of the customs acting also as collectors, all receivers general of public moneys, all receivers of public moneys, all receivers of public moneys at the several land offices, and all postmasters, except as is hereinafter particularly provided, be, and they are hereby, required to keep safely, without loaning or using, all the public money collected by them, or otherwise at any time placed in their possession and custody, till the same is ordered by the proper department or officer of the government to be transferred or paid out: and when such orders for transfer or payment are received, faithfully and promptly to make the same as directed, and to do and perform all other duties as fiscal agents of the government, which may be imposed by this or any other acts of congress, or by any regulation of the treasury department, made in conformity to law; and also to do and perform all acts and duties required by law, or by direction of any of the executive departments of the government, as agents for paying pensions, or for making any other disbursements which either of the heads of those departments may be required by law to make, and which are of a character to be made by the depositaries hereby constituted, consistently with the other official duties imposed upon them.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the treasurer of the United States, the treasurer of the mint of the United States, the treasurer of the branch mint at New Orleans, and the receivers general of public money hereinafter directed to be appointed, shall, respectively, give bonds to the United States, in such form, and for such amounts, as shall be directed by the secretary of the treasury, and by and with the advice and consent of the president, with sureties to the satisfaction of the solicitor of the treasury; and shall from time to time, renew, strengthen, and increase their official bonds, as the secretary of the treasury, with the consent of the president, may direct; any law in reference to any of the official bonds of any of the said officers to the contrary notwithstanding.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the secretary of the treasury, at as early a day as possible after the passage of this act, to require from the several depositaries hereby constituted, and whose official bonds are not hereinafter provided for, to execute bonds new and suitable in their terms to meet the new and increased duties imposed upon them respectively by this act, and with sureties, in sums, such as shall seem reasonable and safe to the solicitor of the treasury, and from time to time require such bonds to be renewed and increased in amount and strengthened by new sureties, to meet any increasing responsibility which may grow out of accumulations of money in the hands of the depositary, or out of any other duty or responsibility arising under this or any other law of congress.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That all collectors and receivers of public money, of every character and description, within the District of Columbia, shall, as frequently as they may be directed by the secretary of the treasury so to do, pay over to the treasurer of the United States at the treasury thereof, all public moneys collected by them, or in their hands; that all such collectors and receivers of public moneys within the cities of Philadelphia and New Orleans, shall, upon the same direction, pay over to the treasurers of the mints in their respective cities, at the said mints, all public moneys collected by them, or in their hands; and that all such collectors and receivers of public moneys within the cities of New York, Boston, Charleston, and St. Louis, shall, upon the same direction, pay over to the receivers general of public money in their respective cities, at their offices respectively, all the public moneys collected by them, or in their hands, to be safely kept by the said respective depositaries, until otherwise disposed of according to law; and it shall be the duty of the said secretary to direct such payments, by the said collectors and receivers, at all the said places, at least as often as once in each month, and as much more frequently, in all cases, as he, in his discretion, may think proper.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the secretary of the treasury to transfer the moneys in the hands of any depositary hereby constituted, to the treasury of the United States; to the mint at Philadelphia; to the branch mint at New Orleans; or to the offices of either of the receivers general of public moneys, by this act directed to be appointed; to be there safely kept, according to the provisions of this act; and also to transfer moneys in the hands of any one depositary constituted by this act to any other depositary constituted by the same, at his discretion, and as the safety of the public moneys, and the convenience of the public service, shall seem to him to require. And for the purpose of payments on the public account, it shall be lawful for the treasurer of the United States to draw upon any of the said depositaries, as he may think most conducive to the public interests, or to the convenience of the public creditors, or both.

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That the moneys in the hands, care, and custody, of any of the depositaries constituted by this act, shall be considered and held as deposited to the credit of the treasurer of the United States, and shall be, at all times, subject to his draft, whether made for transfer or disbursement, in the same manner as though the said moneys were actually in the treasury of the United States; and each depositary shall make returns to the treasury department of all moneys received and paid by him, at such times, and in such form, as shall be directed by the secretary of the treasury.

SEC. 12. And be it further enacted, That whenever public moneys shall accumulate in the hands of any depositary constituted by this act, other than the treasurer of the United States, the treasurer of the mint of the United States, the treasurer of the branch mint at New Orleans, and the receivers general of public money, to an amount beyond that secured by the bond of the officer, or which the secretary of the treasury shall, for any cause, consider unsafe, and it shall not be desirable to transfer the moneys so accumulated to any other depositary, it shall be lawful for the said secretary to direct the said moneys, or any portion thereof, to be specially deposited in such bank of the state, or territory, wherein the depositary who is to make the deposit is located, as he, the said secretary, shall select and name: Provided, The bank so selected will agree to receive and keep the moneys deposited with it upon the terms and conditions in the next section of this act prescribed.

SEC. 13. And be it further enacted, That the special deposits of the public moneys authorized by the last preceding section of this act to be made in banks, shall be made upon the following terms and conditions, and upon no other, namely:

First. All such deposits shall be strictly special deposits; and the banks holding them shall be prohibited in the most effectual manner, from making any use of the moneys deposited, by way of loans, discounts, or in any other manner, or for any other purpose whatsoever; and to secure the fulfilment of this condition, the secretary of the treasury is authorized, in his discretion, to furnish the banks selected as deposit banks with safes for the keeping of the public moneys exclusively, and under the joint control of the bank and some designated officer of the government, or to adopt such other guards as they shall prefer.

Second. Nothing but gold or silver, or such notes, bills, or paper, issued under the authority of the United States, as may be directed by law to be received in payment of the public dues, shall be offered for deposit, or received by the bank as a deposit, under the provisions of this act.

Third. All deposits shall be passed, upon the books of the bank, to the credit of the depositary making the same; but no moneys deposited in pursuance of this act shall be withdrawn without the express order of the secretary of the treasury, for the payments; and no drafts of the treasurer of the United States, or orders or warrants of the secretary of the treasury, for ordinary transfer or disbursement, shall be made upon any bank selected as a deposit bank under this act.

Fourth. A commission, such as shall be agreed upon between the secretary of the treasury and the bank, not in any case to exceed one eighth of one per centum upon the moneys deposited with it, shall be allowed and paid by the United States, in full satisfaction of all claims on the part of the bank for trouble and risk growing out of the receipt, safe keeping and repayment of the special deposits herein authorized to be made; all accounts for commissions to be audited and paid at the treasury of the United States.

SEC. 14. And be it further enacted, That, in case no bank within the state or territory wherein the depositary, directed to make deposits, is located, will consent to receive the moneys of the government upon special deposit, according to the foregoing conditions and regulations, then it shall be lawful for the secretary of the treasury to select some bank in an adjoining state, or territory, such as may be most convenient for the officer to make deposits, and the public service; and in case no convenient bank of either character can be found willing to receive such deposits upon the terms proposed, the secretary may transfer the same to the treasury of the United States, to the mint, or branch mints, or to the officers of either of the receivers general of public money, as shall be most convenient to the depositary from whom the money is to be transferred, or to the wants of the public service in reference to disbursements.

Sec. 15. And be it further enacted, That the secretary of the treasury shall be, and he is hereby, authorized to cause examinations to be made of the books, accounts, and money on hand, of the several depositories constituted by this act; and for that purpose to appoint special agents, as occasion may require with such compensation as he may think reasonable, to be fixed and declared at the time of each appointment, which said examinations, in all cases where the sum on hand usually exceeds three-fourths of the amount of the officer's bond, shall not be made less frequently than once in each year, and as much more frequently, in those and all other cases, as the secretary, in his discretion, shall direct. The agents selected to make these examinations shall be instructed to examine as well the books, accounts, and returns of the officer, as the money on hand, and the manner of its being kept, to the end that uniformity and accuracy in the accounts, as well as safety to the public moneys, may be secured thereby.

Sec. 16. And be it further enacted, That in addition to the examinations provided for in the last preceding section, and as a further guard over the public moneys, it shall be the duty of each naval officer and surveyor, as a check upon the receiver general of public moneys, or collector of the customs, of their respective districts; of each register of a land office, as a check upon the receiver of his land office; and of the director and superintendent of each mint and branch mint, when separate offices, as a check upon the treasurers, respectively, of the said mints, or the persons acting as such, at the close of each quarter of the year, and as much more frequently as they shall be directed by the secretary of the treasury to do so, to examine the books, accounts, returns, and money on hand, of the receivers general of public money, collectors, receivers of land offices, treasurers, and persons acting as such, and to make a full, accurate and faithful return to the treasury department of their condition.

Sec. 17. And be it further enacted, That the said officers respectively, whose duty it is made by this act to receive, keep, and disburse the public moneys, as the fiscal agent of the government, may be allowed any necessary additional expenses of safe-keeping, transferring, and disbursing said moneys; all of such expenses of every character to be first expressly authorized by the secretary of the treasury, whose directions upon all the above subjects, by way of direction and otherwise, are to be strictly followed by all the said officers: Provided that the whole number of clerks to be appointed by virtue of this section of this act, shall not exceed ten, and that the aggregate compensations of the whole shall not exceed eight thousand dollars, nor shall the compensation of any one clerk, so appointed, exceed eight hundred dollars per annum.

Sec. 18. And be it further enacted, That the secretary of the treasury shall, with as much promptitude as the convenience of the public business and the safety of the public funds will permit, withdraw the balances remaining with the present depositories of the public moneys, and confine the safe-keeping, transfer, and disbursement of those moneys to the depositories established by this act.

Sec. 19. And be it further enacted, That all marshals, district attorneys, and others, having public money to pay to the United States, and all patentees wishing to make payment for patents to be issued, may pay all such moneys to the treasurer of the United States, at the treasury, to the treasurer of either of the mints, in Philadelphia or New Orleans, to either of the receivers general of the public money, or to such other depository constituted by this act, as shall be designated by the secretary of the treasury, in other parts of the United States, to receive such payments, and give receipts or certificates of deposit therefor.

Sec. 20. And be it further enacted, That all officers charged by this act with the safe-keeping, transfer, and disbursement of the public moneys, are hereby required to keep an accurate entry of each sum received, and of the kind of money in which it is received, and of each payment or transfer, and of the kind of currency in which it is made; and that if any one of the said officers shall convert to his own use, in any way whatever, or shall use by way of investment in any kind of property or merchandise, or shall loan, with, or without interest, any portion of the public moneys entrusted to him for safe-keeping, disbursement, transfer, or for any other purpose, every such act shall be deemed and adjudged to be an embezzlement of so much of the said moneys as shall be thus taken, converted, invested, used or loaned, which is hereby declared to be a high misdemeanor, and any officer or person convicted thereof before any court of the United States of competent jurisdiction, shall be sentenced to imprisonment for a term not less than two, nor more than five years, and to a fine equal to the amount of the money embezzled.

Sec. 21. And be it further enacted, That, until the rooms, offices, vaults, and safes, directed by the first four sections of this act to be constructed and prepared for the use of the treasurer of the United States, the treasurers of the mints at Philadelphia and New Orleans, and the receivers general of public money at New York, Boston, Charleston, and St. Louis, can be constructed and prepared for use, it shall be the duty of the secretary of the treasury to procure suitable rooms for offices for those officers at their respective locations, and to contract with such banks, incorporations, or individuals, as may be willing to contract for such use of their vaults and safes as may be required for the safe-keeping of the public moneys in the charge and custody of those officers respectively, the expense to be paid by the United States.

Sec. 22. And be it further enacted, That it shall not be lawful for the secretary of the treasury to make or continue in force, any general order which shall create any difference between the different branches of revenue, as to the funds or medium of payment, in which debts or dues accruing to the United States may be paid.

Sec. 23. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the secretary of the treasury to issue and publish regulations to enforce the speedy presentation of all government drafts for payment at the place where payable, and to prescribe the time, according to the different distances of the depositories from the seat of government, within which all drafts upon them, respectively shall be presented for payment; and in default of such presentation, to direct any other mode and place of payment which he may deem proper.

Sec. 24. And be it further enacted, That the receivers general of public moneys directed by this act to be appointed, shall receive, respectively, the following salaries, per annum, to be paid quarter yearly, at the treasury of the United States, to wit: the receiver general of public money at New York shall be paid a salary of three thousand dollars per annum; the receiver general of public money at Boston shall be paid a salary of two thousand five hundred dollars per annum; the receiver general of public money at Charleston shall be paid a salary of two thousand five hundred dollars per annum; and the receiver general of public money at St. Louis, shall be paid a salary of two thousand five hundred dollars per annum; and these salaries, respectively, shall be in full for the services of the respective officers; nor shall either of them be permitted to charge, or receive, any commission, pay, or perquisite, for any official service, of any character or description whatsoever; and the making of any such charge, or the receipt of any such compensation, is hereby declared to be a misdemeanor, for which the officer convicted thereof, before any court of the United States of competent jurisdiction, shall be subject to punishment by fine, or imprisonment, or both, at the discretion of the court before which the offence shall be tried.

Sec. 25. And be it further enacted, That the treasurer of the United States be, and he is hereby authorized to receive at the treasury, and at such other points as he may designate, payments in advance for public lands, the payments so made, in all cases, to be evidenced by the receipt of the said treasurer of the United States; which receipts so given shall be current at the several land offices of the United States, as cash, at any public or private sale of lands, in the same manner as the currency authorized by law to be received in payment for the public lands: Provided, however, that the receipts given by the treasurer of the United States, pursuant to the authority conferred in this section, shall not be negotiable or transferable, by delivery or assignment, or in any other manner whatsoever, but shall, in all cases, be presented in payment for lands by or for the person to whom the receipt was given, as shown upon its face.

Sec. 26. And be it further enacted, That for the purchase of sites, and for the construction of offices of the receivers general of public money, by this act directed, to be erected at Charleston, S. C. and at St. Louis, Missouri, there shall be, and hereby is, appropriated, to be paid out of any money in the treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of ten thousand dollars, to be expended under the direction of the secretary of the treasury, who is hereby required to adopt plans for the said offices, and the vaults and safes connected therewith, and to cause the same to be constructed and prepared for use, with as little delay as shall be consistent with the public interests, and the convenient location and security of the buildings to be erected: Provided, however, That if, the secretary of the treasury shall find, upon inquiry and examination, that suitable rooms for the use of the receiver general at Charleston can be obtained in the custom house now owned by the United States at that place, and that secure vaults and safes can be constructed in that building for the safe-keeping of the public money, then he shall cause such rooms to be prepared and fitted up, and such vaults and safes to be constructed in the custom-house at Charleston, and no independent office shall be there erected.

Sec. 27. And be it further enacted, That for the payment of the expenses authorized by this act, other than those herein before provided for, a sufficient sum of money be, and the same is hereby appropriated, to be paid out of any money in the treasury not otherwise appropriated.

MR. CLAY'S SPEECH

ON THE SUB-TREASURY BILL.

Delivered in the Senate of the United States Feb. 19, 1838.

Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky, rose and addressed the senate as follows: I have seen some public service, passed through many troubled times, and often addressed public assemblies, in this capital and elsewhere; but never before have I risen in a deliberative body, under more oppressed feelings, or with a deeper sense of awful responsibility. Never before have I risen to express my opinions upon any public measure fraught with such tremendous consequences to the welfare and prosperity of the country, and so perilous to the liberties of the people, as I solemnly believe the bill under consideration will be. If you knew, sir, what sleepless hours reflection upon it has cost me; if you knew with what fervor and sincerity I have implored Divine assistance to strengthen and sustain me in my opposition to it, I should have credit, with you, at least, for the sincerity of my convictions, if I shall be so unfortunate as not to have your concurrence as to the dangerous character of the measure. And I have thanked my God that he has prolonged my life until the present time, to enable me to exert myself in the service of my country, against a project far transcending, in pernicious tendency, any that I have ever had occasion to consider. I thank him for the health I am permitted to enjoy; I thank him for the soft and sweet repose which I experienced last night; I thank him for the bright and glorious sun which shines upon us this day.

It is not my purpose, at this time, Mr. President, to go at large into a consideration of the causes which have led to the present most disastrous state of public affairs. That duty was performed by others, and myself, at the extra session of congress. It was then clearly shown that it sprang from the ill-advised and unfortunate measures of executive administration. I now will content myself with saying that, on the 4th day of March, 1829, Andrew Jackson, not by the blessing of God, was made president of the United States; that the country then was eminently prosperous; that its currency was as sound and safe as any that a people were ever blessed with; that, throughout the wide extent of this whole union, it possessed a uniform value; and that exchanges were conducted with such regularity and perfection, that funds could be transmitted from one extremity of the union to the other, with the least possible risk or loss. In this encouraging condition of the business of the country it remained for several years, until after the war, wantonly waged against the late Bank of the United States, was completely successful, by the overthrow of that invaluable institution. What our present situation is, it is as needless to describe as it is painful to contemplate. First felt in our great commercial marts, distress and embarrassment have penetrated into the interior, and now pervade almost the entire union. It has been justly remarked by one of the soundest and most practical writers that I have had occasion to consult, that "all convulsions in the circulation and commerce of every country must originate in the operation of the government, or in the mistaken views and erroneous measures of those possessing the power of influencing credit and circulation; for they are not otherwise susceptible of convulsion, and, if left to themselves, they will find their own level, and flow nearly in one uniform stream."

Yes, Mr. President, we all have but too melancholly a consciousness of the unhappy condition of our country. We all too well know that our noble and gallant ship lies helpless and immovable upon breakers, dismantled, the surge beating over her venerable sides, and the crew threatened with instantaneous destruction. How came she there? Who was the pilot at the helm when she was stranded? The party in power! The pilot was aided by all the science and skill, by all the charts and instruments of such distinguished navigators as Washington, the Adamases, Jefferson, Madison, and Monroe; and yet he did not, or could not, save the public vessel. She was placed in her present miserable condition by his bungling navigation, or by his want of skill and judgment. It is impossible for him to escape from one or the other horn of that dilemma. I leave him at liberty to choose between them.

I shall endeavor, Mr. President, in the course of the address I am about making, to establish certain propositions, which I believe to be incontestable; and, for the sake of perspicuity, I will state them severally to the senate. I shall contend—

1st. That it was the deliberate purpose and fixed design of the late administration to establish a government bank—a treasury bank—to be administered and controlled by the executive department.

2d. That, with that view, and to that end, it was its aim and intention to overthrow the whole banking system, as existing in the United States when the administration came into power, beginning with the Bank of the United States, and ending with the state banks.

3d. That the attack was first confined, from considerations of policy, to the Bank of the United States; but that, after its overthrow was accomplished, it was then directed, and has since been continued, against the state banks.

4th. That the present administration, by its acknowledgements, emanating from the highest and most authentic source, has succeeded to the principles, plans, and policy of the preceding administration, and stands solemnly pledged to complete and perfect them.

And, 5th. That the bill under consideration is intended to execute the pledge, by establishing, upon the ruins of the late Bank of the United States, and the state banks, a government bank, to be managed and controlled by the treasury department, acting under the commands of the president of the United States.

I believe, solemnly believe, the truth of every one of these five propositions. In the support of them, I shall not rely upon any gratuitous surmises or vague conjectures, but upon proofs, clear, positive, undeniable, and demonstrative. To establish the first four, I shall adduce evidence of the highest possible authenticity, or facts admitted or undeniable, and fair reasoning founded on them. And as to the last, the measure under consideration, I think the testimony, intrinsic and extrinsic, on which I depend, stamps, beyond all doubt, its true character as a government bank, and ought to carry to the mind of the senate the conviction which I entertain, and in which I feel perfectly confident the whole country will share.

1. My first proposition is, that it was the deliberate purpose and fixed design of the late administration to establish a government bank—a treasury bank—to be administered and controlled by the executive department. To establish its truth, the first proof which I offer is the following extract from president Jackson's annual message of December, 1833:

"The charter of the Bank of the United States expires in 1836, and its stockholders will most probably apply for a renewal of their privileges. In order to avoid the evils resulting from precipitancy, in a measure involving such important principles, and such deep pecuniary interests, I feel that I cannot, in justice to the parties interested, too soon present it to the consideration of the legislature and the people. Both the constitutionality and the expediency of the law creating this bank are well questioned by a large portion of our fellow-citizens; and it must be admitted by all that it has failed in the great end of establishing a uniform and sound currency."

"Under these circumstances, if such an institution is deemed essential to the fiscal operations of the government, I submit to the wisdom of the legislature, whether a national one, founded upon the credit of the government and its revenues, might not be devised, which would avoid all constitutional difficulties, and, at the same time, secure all the advantages to the government and the country that were expected to result from the present bank."

This was the first open declaration of that implacable war against the late Bank of the United States, which was afterwards waged with so much ferocity. It was the sound of the distant bugle, to collect together the dispersed and scattered forces, and prepare for battle. The country saw with surprise the statement that "the constitutionality and expediency of the law creating this bank are well questioned by a large portion of our fellow citizens," when, in truth and in fact, it was well known that but few then doubted the constitutionality, and none the expediency of it. And the assertion excited much greater surprise, that "it must be admitted by all that it has failed in the great end of establishing a uniform and sound currency." In this message, too, whilst a doubt is intimated as to the utility of such an institution, president Jackson clearly first discloses his object to establish a national one, founded upon the credit of the government and its revenues. His language is perfectly plain and unequivocal. Such a bank, founded upon the credit of the government and its revenues, would secure all the advantages to the government and the country, he tells us, that were expected to result from the present bank.

In his annual message of the ensuing year, the late president says:

"The importance of the principles involved in the inquiry, whether it will be proper to recharter the Bank of the United States, requires that I should again call the attention of congress to the subject. Nothing has occurred to lessen in any degree the dangers which many of our citizens apprehended from that institution, as at present organized. In the spirit of improvement and compromise which distinguishes our country and its institutions, it becomes us to inquire whether it be not possible to secure the advantages afforded by the present bank, through the agency of a bank of the United States, so modified in its principles as to obviate constitutional and other objection."

"It is thought practicable to organize such a bank, with the necessary officers, as a branch of the treasury department, based on the public and individual deposits, without power to make loans or purchase property, which shall remit the funds of the government; and the expense of which may be paid, if thought advisable, by allowing its officers to sell bills of exchange, to private individuals at a moderate premium. Not being a corporate body, having no stockholders, debtors and property, and but few officers, it would not be obnoxious to the constitutional objections which are urged against the present bank; and having no means to operate on the hopes, fears, or interests of large masses of the community, it would be shorn of the influence which makes that bank formidable."

In this message, president Jackson, after again alluding to the imaginary dangers of a bank of the United States, recurs to his favorite project, and inquires "whether it be not possible to secure the advantages afforded by the present bank, through the agency of a bank of the United States, so modified in its principles and structure as to obviate constitutional and other objections." And to dispel all doubts of the timid, and to confirm the wavering, he declares that it is thought practicable to organize such a bank, with the necessary officers, as a branch of the treasury department. As a branch of the treasury department! The very scheme now under consideration. And, to defray the expenses of such an anomalous institution, he suggests that the officers of the treasury department may turn bankers and brokers, and sell bills of exchange to private individuals at a moderate premium!

In his annual message of the year 1831, upon this subject, he was brief and somewhat covered in his expressions. But the fixed purpose which he entertained is sufficiently disclosed to the attentive reader. He announces that,

"Entertaining the opinions heretofore expressed in relation to the Bank of the United States, as at present organized, I felt it my duty, in my former messages, frankly to disclose them, in order that the attention of the legislature and the people should be seasonably directed to that important subject, and that it might be considered, and finally disposed of, in a manner best calculated to promote the ends of the constitution, and subserve the public interests."

What were the opinions "heretofore" expressed we have clearly seen. They were adverse to the Bank of the United States, as at present organized, that is to say, an organization with any independent corporate government; and in favor of a national bank which should be so constituted as to be subject to exclusive executive control.

At the session of 1831-'32, the question of the recharter of the Bank of the United States came up; and although the attention of congress and the country had been repeatedly and deliberately before invited to the consideration of it by president Jackson himself, the agitation of it was now declared by him and his partisans to be precipitate and premature. Nevertheless, the country and congress, conscious of the value of a safe and sound uniform currency, conscious that such a currency had been eminently supplied by the Bank of the United States, and unmoved by all the outcry raised against that admirable institution, the recharter commanded large majorities in both houses of congress. Fatally for the interests of this country, the stern self-will of general Jackson prompted him to risk every thing upon its overthrow. On the 10th of July, 1833, the bill was returned with his veto; from which the following extract is submitted to the attentive consideration of the senate:

"A bank of the United States is, in many respects, convenient for the government and useful to the people. Entertaining this opinion, and deeply impressed with the belief that some of the powers and privileges possessed by the existing bank are unauthorized by the constitution, subversive of the rights of the states, and dangerous to the liberties of the people, I felt it my duty, at an early period of my administration, to call the attention of congress to the practicability of organizing an institution, combining all its advantages, and obviating these objections. I sincerely regret that, in the act before me, I can perceive none of those modifications of the bank charter which are necessary, in my opinion, to make it compatible with justice, with sound policy, or with the constitution of our country."

"That a bank of the United States, competent to all the duties which may be required by government, might be so organized as not to infringe upon our own delegated powers, or the reserved rights of the states, I do not entertain a doubt. Had the executive been called upon to furnish the project of such an institution, the duty would have been cheerfully performed. In the absence of such a call, it is obviously proper that he should confine himself to pointing out those prominent features in the act presented, which, in his opinion, make it incompatible with the constitution and sound policy."

President Jackson admits, in the citation which has just been made, that a bank of the United States is, in many respects, convenient for the government; and reminds congress that he had, at an early period of his administration, called its attention to the practicability of so organizing such an institution as to secure all its advantages, without the defects of the existing bank. It is perfectly manifest that he alludes to his previous recommendations of a government—a treasury bank. In the same message he tells congress, that if he had been called upon to furnish the project of such an institution, the duty would have been cheerfully performed. Thus it appears that he had not only settled in his mind the general principle, but had adjusted the details of a government bank, to be subjected to executive control: and congress is even chided for not calling upon him to present them. The bill now under consideration, beyond all controversy, is the very project which he had in view, and is to consummate the work which he began. I think, Mr. President, that you must now concur with me in considering the first proposition as fully maintained. I pass to the second and third, which, on account of their intimate connexion, I will consider together.

2. That, with a view of establishing a government bank, it was the settled aim and intention of the late administration to overthrow the whole banking system of the United States, as existing in the United States when that administration came into power, beginning with the Bank of the United States, and ending with the state banks.

3. That the attack was first confined, from considerations of policy, to the Bank of the United States; but that, after its overthrow was accomplished, it was then directed, and has since been continued, against the state banks.

We are not bound to inquire into the motives of president Jackson for desiring to subvert the established monetary and financial system which he found in operation; and yet some examination into those which probably influenced his mind is not without utility. These are to be found in his peculiar constitution and character. His egotism and vanity prompted him to subject every thing to his will; to change, to remould, and retouch every thing. Hence the proscription which characterized his administration, the universal expulsion from office, at home and abroad, of all who were not devoted to him, and the attempt to render the executive department of government, to use a favorite expression of his own, a complete "unit." Hence his seizure of the public deposits in the Bank of the United States, and his desire to unite the purse with the sword. Hence his attack upon all the systems of policy which he found in practical operation—on that of internal improvements, and on that of the protection of national industry. He was animated by the same sort of ambition which induced the master-mind of the age, Napoleon Bonaparte, to impress his name upon every thing in France. When I was in Paris, the sculptors were busily engaged chiseling out the famous N., so odious to the Bourbon line, which had been conspicuously carved on the palace of the Tuilleries, and on other public edifices and monuments in the proud capital of France. When, Mr. President, shall we see effaced all traces of the ravages committed by the administration of Andrew Jackson? Society has been uprooted, virtue punished, vice rewarded, and talents and intellectual endowments despised; brutality, vulgarity, and loco-focoism upheld, cherished, and countenanced. Ages will roll around before the moral and political ravages which have been committed will, fear, cease to be discernible. General Jackson's ambition was to make his administration an era in the history of the American government, and he has accomplished that object of his ambition; but I trust that it will be an era to be shunned as sad and lamentable, and not followed and imitated as supplying sound maxims and principles of administration.

I have heard his hostility to banks ascribed to some collision which he had with one of them, during the late war, at the city of New Orleans; and it is possible that may have had some influence upon his mind. The immediate cause, more probably, was the refusal of that perverse and unaccommodating gentleman, Nick Biddle, to turn out of the office of president of the New Hampshire branch of the Bank of the United States, at the instance of his excellency Isaac Hill, in the summer of 1839, that giant-like person, Jeremiah Mason—giant in body, and giant in mind. War and strife, endless war and strife, personal or national, foreign or domestic, were the aliment of the late president's existence. War against the bank, war against France, and strife and contention with a countless number of individuals. The wars with Black Hawk and the Seminoles were scarcely a luncheon for his voracious appetite. And he made his exit from public life, denouncing war and vengeance against Mexico and the state banks.

My acquaintance with that extraordinary man commenced in this city, in the fall of 1815 or 1816. It was short, but highly respectful, and mutually cordial. I beheld in him the gallant and successful general, who, by the glorious victory of New Orleans, had honorably closed the second war of our independence, and I paid him the homage due to that eminent service. A few years after, it became my painful duty to animadvert, in the house of representatives, with the independence which belongs to the representative character, upon some of his proceedings in the conduct of the Seminole war, which I thought illegal and contrary to the constitution and the law of nations. A non-intercourse between us ensued, which continued until the fall of 1824, when, he being a member of the senate, an accommodation between us was sought to be brought about by the principal part of the delegation from his own state. For that purpose, we were invited to dine with them at Claxton's boarding house, on capitol hill, where my venerable friend from Tennessee, (Mr. White) and his colleague on the Spanish commission, were both present. I retired early from dinner, and was followed to the door by general Jackson and the present minister of the United States at the court of Madrid. They pressed me earnestly to take a seat with them in their carriage. My faithful servant and friend, Charles, was standing at the door waiting for me, with my own. I yielded to their urgent politeness, directed Charles to follow with my carriage, and they sat me down at my own door. We afterwards frequently met, with mutual respect and cordiality; dined several times together, and reciprocated the hospitality of our respective quarters. This friendly intercourse continued until the election, in the house of representatives, of a president of the United States came on in Feb. 1825. I gave the vote which, in the contingency that happened, I told my colleague, (Mr. Crittenden,) who sits before me, prior to my departure from Kentucky, in November, 1824, and told others, that I should give. All intercourse ceased between general Jackson and myself. We have never since, except once accidentally, exchanged salutations, nor met, except on occasions when we were performing the last offices tenderly disclosed. Speaking of a sound currency, he says:

"In considering the means of obtaining so important an end, [that is, a sound currency,] we must set aside all calculations of temporary convenience, and be influenced by those only that are in harmony with the true character and permanent interests of the republic. We must recur to first principles, and see what it is that has prevented the legislation of congress and the states on the subject of currency from satisfying the public expectation, and realizing results corresponding to those which have attended the action of our system when truly consistent with the great principle of equality upon which it rests, and with that spirit of forbearance and mutual concession and generous patriotism which was originally, and must ever continue to be, the vital element of our Union."

"On this subject, I am sure that I cannot be mistaken in ascribing our want of success to the undue countenance which has been afforded to the spirit of monopoly. All the serious dangers which our system has yet encountered may be traced to the resort to implied powers, and the use of corporations clothed with privileges, the effect of which is to advance the interests of the few at the expense of the many. We have felt but one class of these dangers, exhibited in the contest waged by the Bank of the United States against the government for the last four years. Happily, they have been obviated for the present by the indignant resistance of the people; but we should recollect that the principle whence they sprang is an ever-active one, which will not fail to renew its efforts in the same and in other forms, so long as there is a hope of success, founded either on the inattention of the people, or the treachery of their representatives to the subtle progress of its influence."

"We are now to see whether, in the present favorable condition of the country, we cannot take an effectual stand against this spirit of monopoly, and practically prove, in respect to the currency, as well as other important interests, that there is no necessity for so extensive a resort to it as that which has been heretofore practised."

"It has been seen that without the agency of a great moneyed monopoly the revenue can be collected, and conveniently and safely applied to all the purposes of the public expenditure. It is also ascertained that, instead of being necessarily made to promote the evils of an unchecked paper system, the management of the revenue can be made auxiliary to the reform which the legislatures of several of the states have already commenced in regard to the suppression of small bills; and which has only to be fostered by proper regulations on the part of congress, to secure a practical return, to the extent required for the security of the currency, to the constitutional medium."

As in the instance of the attack upon the Bank of the United States, the approach to the state banks is slow, cautious, and insidious. He reminds congress and the country that all calculations of temporary convenience must be set aside; that we must recur to first principles; and that we must see what it is that has prevented legislation of congress and the states on the subject of the currency from satisfying public expectation. He declares his conviction that the want of success has proceeded from undue countenance which has been afforded to the spirit of monopoly. All the serious dangers which our system has yet encountered may be traced to the resort to implied powers, and to the use of corporations. We have felt, he says, but one class of these dangers in the contest with the Bank of the United States, and he clearly intimates that the other class is the state banks. We are now to see, he proceeds, whether in the present favorable condition of the country, we cannot take an effectual stand against this spirit of monopoly. Reverting to his favorite scheme of a government bank, he says it is ascertained that, instead of being made necessary to promote the evils of an unchecked paper system, the management of the revenue can be made auxiliary to the reform which he is desirous of accomplishing. Immediately after my vote, a notorious war was commenced against me, and all the barbed darts let loose upon me. I shall not trace it during its ten years' bitter continuance. But I thank my God that I stand here, firm and erect, unbent, unbroken, unsubdued, unswayed, and ready to denounce the mischievous measures of his administration, and ready to denounce this, its legitimate offspring, the most pernicious of them all.

His administration consisted of a succession of astounding measures, which fell on the public ear like repeated bursts of loud and appalling thunder. Before the reverberations of one peal had ceased, another and another came, louder and louder, and more terrifying. Or rather, it was like a volcanic mountain, emitting frightful eruptions of burning lava. Before one was cold and crusted; before the voice of the inhabitants of buried villages and cities were hushed in eternal silence, another, more desolating, was vomited forth, extending wider and wider the circle of death and destruction.

Mr. President, this is no unnecessary digression. The personal character of such a chief as I have been describing, his passions, his propensities, the character of his mind, should be all thoroughly studied, to comprehend clearly his measures and his administration. But I will now proceed to more direct and strict proofs of my second and third propositions. That he was resolved to break down the Bank of the United States, is proven by the same citations from his messages which I have made, to exhibit his purpose to establish a treasury bank, is proven by his veto message, and by the fact that he did destroy it. The war against all other banks was not originally announced, because he wished the state banks to be auxiliaries in overthrowing the Bank of the United States, and because such an announcement would have been too rash and shocking upon the people of the United States for even his tremendous influence. It was necessary to proceed in the work with caution, and to begin with that institution against which could be embodied the greatest amount of prejudice. The refusal to recharter the Bank of the United States was followed by a determination to remove from its custody the public money of the United States. That determination was first whispered in this place, denied, again intimated, and finally, in September, 1833, executed. The agitation of the American public which ensued, the warm and animated discussions in the country and in congress, to which that unconstitutional measure gave rise, are all fresh in our recollection. It was necessary to quiet the public mind, and to reconcile the people to what had been done, before president Jackson seriously entered upon his new career of hostility to the state banks. At the commencement of the session of congress, in 1834, he imagined a sufficient calm had been produced, and, in his annual message of that year, the war upon the state banks was opened. In that message he says:

"It seems due to the safety of the public funds remaining in that bank, and to the honor of the American people, that measures be taken to separate the government entirely from an institution so mischievous to the public prosperity, and so regardless of the constitution and laws. By transferring the public deposits, by appointing other pension agents, as far as it had the power, by ordering the discontinuance of the receipt of bank checks in payment of the public dues after the first day of January next, the executive has exerted all its lawful authority to sever the connection between the government and this faithless corporation."

In this quotation it will be seen that the first germ is contained of that separation and divorce of the government from banks, which has recently made such a conspicuous figure. It relates, it is true, to the late Bank of the United States, and he speaks of separating and severing the connection between the government and that institution. But the idea, once developed, was easily susceptible of application to all banking institutions. In the message of the succeeding year, his meditated attack upon the state banks is more disorganizing to introduce. The designs of president Jackson against the state banks are more fully developed and enlarged upon in his annual message of 1836, from which I beg leave to quote the following passages:

"I beg leave to call your attention to another subject intimately associated with the preceding one—the currency of the country."

"It is apparent, from the whole context of the constitution, as well as the history of the times that gave birth to it, that it was the purpose of the convention to establish a currency consisting of the precious metals. These, from their peculiar properties, which rendered them the standard of value in all other countries, were adopted in this, as well to establish its commercial standard, in reference to foreign countries, by a permanent rule, as to exclude the use of a mutable medium of exchange, such as of certain agricultural commodities, recognised by the statutes of some states as a tender for debts, or the still more pernicious expedient of a paper currency."

"Variableness must ever be the characteristic of a currency of which the precious metals are not the chief ingredient, or which can be expanded or contracted without regard to the principles that regulate the value of those metals as a standard in the general trade of the world. With us, bank issues constitute such a currency, and must ever do so, until they are made dependent on those just proportions of gold and silver, as a circulating medium, which experience has proved to be necessary, not only in this, but in all other commercial countries. Where those proportions are not infused into the circulation, and do not control it, it is manifest that prices must vary according to the tide of bank issues, and the value and stability of property must stand exposed to all the uncertainty which attends the administration of institutions that are constantly liable to the temptation of an interest distinct from that of the community in which they are established."

"But although various dangers to our republican institutions have been obviated by the failure of that bank to extort from the government a renewal of its charter, it is obvious that little has been accomplished, except a salutary change of public opinion, towards restoring to the country the sound currency provided for in the constitution. In the acts of several of the states prohibiting the circulation of small notes, and the auxiliary enactments of congress at the last session, forbidding their reception or payment on public account, the true policy of the country has been advanced, and a larger portion of the precious metals infused into our circulating medium. These measures will probably be followed up in due time by the enactment of state laws, banishing from circulation bank notes of still higher denominations; and the object may be materially promoted by further acts of congress, forbidding the employment, as fiscal agents, of such banks as issue notes of low denominations, and throw impediments in the way of the circulation of gold and silver."

"The effects of an extension of bank credits and over-issues of bank paper, have been strikingly illustrated in the sales of the public lands. From the returns made by the various registers and receivers in the early part of last summer, it was perceived that the receipts arising from the sales of public lands were increasing to an unprecedented amount. In effect, however, these receipts amount to nothing more than credits in banks. The banks lent out their notes to speculators; they were paid to the receivers, and immediately returned to the banks, to be lent out again and again, being mere instruments to transfer to speculators the most valuable public land, and pay the government by a credit on the books of the banks. Those credits on the books of some of the western banks, usually called deposits, were already greatly beyond their immediate means of payment, and were rapidly increasing. Indeed, each speculation furnished means for another; for no sooner had one individual or company paid in the notes, than they were immediately lent to another for a like purpose; and the banks were extending their business and their issues so largely as to alarm considerate men, and render it doubtful whether these bank credits, if permitted to accumulate, would ultimately be of the least value to the government. The spirit of expansion and speculation was not confined to the deposit banks, but pervaded the whole multitude of banks throughout the union, and was giving rise to new institutions to aggravate the evil."

"The safety of the public funds, and the interest of the people generally, required that these operations should be checked; and it became the duty of every branch of the general and state governments to adopt all legitimate and proper means to produce that salutary effect. Under this view of my duty, I directed the issuing of the order, which will be laid before you by the secretary of the treasury, requiring payment of the public lands sold to be made in specie, with an exception until the 15th of the present month in favor of actual settlers. This measure has produced many salutary consequences. It checked the career of the western banks, and gave them additional strength in anticipation of the pressure which has since pervaded our eastern as well as the European commercial cities. By preventing the expansion of the credit system, it measurably cut off the means of speculation, and retarded its progress in monopolizing the most valuable of the public lands. It has tended to save the new states from a non-resident proprietorship—one of the greatest obstacles to the advancement of a new country and the prosperity of an old one. It has tended to keep open the public lands for entry by emigrants at government prices, instead of their being compelled to purchase of speculators at double or treble prices. And it is conveying into the interior large sums in silver and gold, there to enter permanently into the currency of the country, and place it on a firmer foundation. It is confidently believed that the country will find, in the motives which induced that order, and the happy consequences which have ensued, much to commend and nothing to condemn."

It is seen that he again calls the attention of congress to the currency of the country, alleges that it was apparent from the whole context of the constitution, as well as the history of the times that gave birth to it, that it was the purpose of the convention to establish a currency consisting of the precious metals; imputes variableness and a liability to inordinate contraction and expansion to the existing paper system, and denounces bank issues as being an uncertain standard. He felicitates himself upon the dangers which have been obviated by the overthrow of the Bank of the United States, but declares that little has been yet done, except to produce a salutary change of public opinion towards restoring to the country the sound currency provided for in the constitution. I will here say, in passing, that all this outcry about the precious metals, gold, and the constitutional currency, has been put forth to delude the people, and to use the precious metals as an instrument to break down the banking institutions of the states, and to thus pave the way for the ultimate establishment of a great government bank. In the present advanced state of civilization, in the present condition of the commerce of the world, and in the actual relations of trade and intercourse between the different nations of the world, it is perfectly chimerical to suppose that the currency of the United States should consist exclusively, or principally, of the precious metals.

In the quotations which I have made from the last annual message of general Jackson, he speaks of the extension of bank credits, and the over-issues of bank paper, in the operations upon the sales of public lands. In his message of only the preceding year, the vast amount of those sales had been dwelt upon with peculiar complaisance, as illustrating the general prosperity of the country, and as proof of the wisdom of his administration. But now that which had been announced as a blessing is deprecated as a calamity. Now, his object being to assail the banking institutions of the states, and to justify that fatal treasury order, which I shall hereafter have occasion to notice, he expresses his apprehension of the danger to which we are exposed of losing the public domain, and getting nothing for it but bank credits. He describes, minutely, the circular process by which the notes of the banks passed out of those institutions to be employed in the purchase of the public lands, and returned again to them in the form of credits to the government. He forgets that Mr. secretary Taney, to reconcile the people of the United States to the daring measure of removing the public deposits, had simulated the banks to the exercise of great liberality in the grant of loans. He informs us, in that message, that the safety of the public funds and the interests of the people generally, required that these copious issues of the banks should be checked, and that the conversion of the public lands into mere bank credits should be arrested. And his measure to accomplish these objects was that famous treasury order, already adverted to. Let us pause here for a moment, and contemplate the circumstances under which it was issued. The principle of the order had been proposed and discussed in congress. But one senator, as far as I know, in this branch of the legislature, and not a solitary member, within my knowledge, in the house of representatives, was in favor of it. And yet, in about a week after the adjournment of congress, the principle, which met with no countenance from the legislative authority, was embodied in the form of a treasury edict, and promulgated under the executive authority, to the astonishment of the people of the United States.

If we possessed no other evidence whatever of the hostility of president Jackson to the state banks of the United States, that order would supply conclusive proof. Bank notes, bank issues, bank credits, were distrusted and denounced by him. It was proclaimed to the people that they were unworthy of confidence. The government could no longer trust in their security. And at a moment when the banking operations were extended, and stretched to their utmost tension; when they were almost all tottering and ready to fall, for the want of that metallic basis on which they all rested, the executive announces its distrust, issues the treasury order, and enters the market for specie, by a demand of an extraordinary amount to supply the means of purchasing the public lands. If the sales had continued in the same ratio they had been made during the previous year, that is, at about the rate of twenty-four millions per annum, this unprecedented demand created by government for specie must have exhausted the vaults of most of the banks, and produced much sooner the catastrophe which occurred in May last. And, what is more extraordinary, this wanton demand for specie upon all the banks of the commercial capitals, and in the busy and thickly peopled portions of the country, was that it might be transported into the wilderness, and, after having been used in the purchase of public lands, deposited to the credit of the government in the books of western banks, in some of which, according to the message, there were already credits to the government "greatly beyond their immediate means of payment." Government, therefore, did not itself receive, or rather did not retain, the very specie which it professed to demand as the only medium worthy of the public lands. The specie, which was so uselessly exacted, was transferred from one set of banks, to the derangement of the commerce and business of the country, and placed in the vaults of another set of banks in the interior, forming only those bank credits to the government upon which president Jackson placed so slight a value.

Finally, when general Jackson was about to retire from the cares of government, he favored his countrymen with a farewell address. The solemnity of the occasion gives to any opinions which he has expressed in that document a claim to peculiar attention. It will be seen on perusing it, that he denounces, more emphatically than in any of his previous addresses, the bank paper of the country, corporations, and what he chooses to denominate the spirit of monopoly. The senate will indulge me in calling its attention to certain parts of that address, in the following extracts:

"The constitution of the United States unquestionably intended to secure to the people a circulating medium of gold and silver. But the establishment of a national bank by congress, with the privilege of issuing paper money receivable in payment of the public dues, and the unfortunate cause of legislation in the several states upon the same subject, drove from general circulation the constitutional currency, and substituted one of paper in its place."

"The mischief springs from the power which the moneyed interest derives from a paper currency, which they are able to control; from the multitude of corporations, with exclusive privileges, which they have succeeded in obtaining in the different states, and which are employed altogether for their benefit; and unless you become more watchful in your states, and check this spirit of monopoly and thirst for exclusive privileges, you will, in the end, find that the most important powers of government have been given or bartered away, and the control over your dearest interests has passed into the hands of these corporations."

"But it will require steady and persevering exertions on your part to rid yourselves of the iniquities and mischiefs of the paper system, and to check the spirit of monopoly and other abuses which have sprung up with it, and of which it is the main support. So many interests are united to resist all reform on this subject, that you must not hope that the conflict will be a short one, nor success easy. My humble efforts have not been spared, during my administration of the government, to restore the constitutional currency of gold and silver: and something, I trust, has been done towards the accomplishment of this most desirable object. But enough yet remains to require all your energy and perseverance. The power, however, is in your hands, and the remedy must and will be applied, if you determine upon it."

The mask is now thrown off, and he boldly says that the constitution of the United States unquestionably intended to secure to the people a circulating medium of gold and silver. They have not enjoyed, he says, that benefit, because of the establishment of a national bank, and the unfortunate course of legislation in the several states. He does not limit his condemnation of the past policy of his country to the federal government, of which he had just ceased to be the chief, but he extends it to the states also, as if they were incompetent to judge of the interests of their respective citizens. He tells us that the mischief springs from the power which the moneyed interest derives from a paper currency, which they are able to control, and the multitude of corporations; and he stimulates the people to become more watchful in their several states, to check this spirit of monopoly. To invigorate their fortitude, he tells the people that it will require steady and persevering exertions on their part, to rid themselves of the iniquities and mischiefs of the paper system, and to check the spirit of monopoly. They must not hope that the conflict will be a short one, nor success easy. His humble efforts have not been spared during his administration, to restore the constitutional currency of gold and silver; and although he has been able to do something towards the accomplishment of that object, enough yet remains to require all the energy and perseverance of the people.

Such, Mr. President, are the proofs and the argument on which I rely to establish the second and third propositions which I have been considering. Are they not successfully maintained? Is it possible that any thing could be more conclusive on such a subject?

I pass to the consideration of the fourth proposition.

4. That the present administration, by acknowledgments emanating from the highest and most authentic source, has succeeded to the principles, plans, and policy, of the preceding administration, and stand solemnly pledged to complete and perfect them.

The proofs on this subject are brief; but they are clear, direct, and plenary. It is impossible for any unbiassed mind to doubt for a moment about them. You, sir, will be surprised, when I shall array them before you, at their irresistible force. The first that I shall offer is an extract from Mr. Van Buren's letter of acceptance of the nomination of the Baltimore convention, dated May 23d, 1835. In that letter he says:

"I content myself, on this occasion, with saying that I consider myself the honored instrument, selected by the friends of the present administration, to carry out its principles and policy; and that, as well from inclination as from duty, I shall, if honored with the choice of the American people, endeavor generally to follow in the footsteps of president Jackson, happy if I shall be able to perfect the work which he has so gloriously begun."

Mr. Van Buren announces that he was the honored instrument selected by the friends of the present administration, to carry out its principles and policy. The honored instrument! That word, according to the most approved definition, means tool. He was, then, the honored tool—to do what? to promote the honor, and advance the welfare, of the people of the United States, and to add to the glory of his country? No, no; his country was not in his thoughts. Party, party, filled the place in his bosom which country should have occupied. He was the honored tool to carry out the principles and policy of gen. Jackson's administration; and, if elected, he should, as well from inclination as from duty, endeavor, generally, to tread in the footsteps of gen. Jackson—happy if he should be able to perfect the work which he had so gloriously begun. Duty to whom? to the country, to the whole people of the United States? No such thing; but duty to the friends of the then administration; and that duty required him to tread in the footsteps of his illustrious predecessor, and to perfect the work which he had begun! Now, the senate will bear in mind that the most distinguishing features of gen. Jackson's administration related to the currency; that he had denounced the banking institutions of the country; that he had overthrown the Bank of the United States; that he had declared, when that object was accomplished, only one-half the work was completed; that he then commenced a war against the state banks, in order to finish the other half; that he constantly persevered in, and never abandoned, his favorite project of a great government treasury bank; and that he retired from the office of chief magistrate, pouring out, in his farewell address, anathemas against paper money, corporations, and the spirit of monopoly. When all these things are recollected, it is impossible not to comprehend clearly what Mr. Van Buren means, by carrying out the principles and policy of the late administration. No one can mistake that those principles and that policy require him to break down the local institutions of the states, and to discredit and destroy the paper medium which they issue. No one can be at a loss to understand that, in following in the footsteps of president Jackson, and in perfecting the work which he begun, Mr. Van Buren means to continue attacking, systematically, the banks of the states, and to erect on their ruins that great government bank, begun by his predecessor, and which he is the honored instrument selected to complete. The next proof which I shall offer is supplied by Mr. Van Buren's inaugural address, from which I request permission of the senate to read the following extract:

"In receiving from the people the sacred trust twice confided to my illustrious predecessor, and which he has discharged so faithfully and so well, I know that I cannot expect to perform the arduous task with equal ability and success. But, united as I have been in his councils, a daily witness of his exclusive and unsurpassed devotion to his country's welfare, agreeing with him in sentiments which his countrymen have warmly supported, and permitted to partake largely of his confidence, I may hope that somewhat of the same cheering approbation will be found to attend upon my path?"

Here we find Mr. Van Buren distinctly avowing, what the American people well knew before, that he had been united in the councils of gen. Jackson; that he had agreed with him in sentiments, and that he had partaken largely of his confidence. This intimacy and confidential intercourse could not have existed without the concurrence of Mr. Van Buren in all those leading and prominent measures of his friend, which related to the establishment of a government bank, the overthrow of the Bank of the United States, the attack upon the state institutions, and the denunciation of the paper currency, the spirit of monopoly, and corporations. Is it credible that general Jackson should have aimed at the accomplishment of all those objects, and entertained all these sentiments, without Mr. Van Buren's participation?

I proceed to another point of powerful evidence, in the conduct of Mr. Van Buren, in respect to the famous treasury order. That order had been promulgated, originally, in defiance of the opinion of congress, had been continued in operation in defiance of the wishes and will of the people, and had been repealed by a bill passed at the last ordinary session of congress, by overwhelming majorities. The fate of that bill is well known. Instead of being returned to the house in which it originated, according to the requirement of the constitution, it was sent to one of the pigeon-holes of the department of state, to be filed away with an opinion of a convenient attorney general, always ready to prepare one in support of executive encroachment. On the 5th of March last not a doubt was entertained, as far as my knowledge or belief extends, that Mr. Van Buren would rescind the obnoxious order. I appeal to the senator from Missouri, who sits near me, (Mr. Lin), to the senator from Mississippi, who sits farthest from me, (Mr. Walker), to the senator from Alabama, (Mr. King), and to the whole of the administration senators, if such was not the expectation of all of them. Was there ever an occasion in which a new administration had so fine an opportunity to signalize its commencement by an act of grace and wisdom, demanded by the least interests and most anxious wishes of the people? But Mr. Van Buren did not think proper to embrace it. He had shared too largely in the confidence of his predecessor, agreed too fully with him in his councils, to rescind an order which constituted so essential a part of the system which had been deliberately adopted to overthrow the state banks.

Another course pursued by the administration, after the catastrophe of the suspension of specie payments by the banks, demonstrates the hostile purposes towards them of the present administration. When a similar event had occurred during the administration of Mr. Madison, did he discredit and discountenance the issues of the banks, by refusing to receive them in payment of the public dues? Did the state governments, upon the former or the late occasion, refuse to receive them in payment of the dues to them, respectively? And if irredeemable bank notes are good enough for state governments and the people, are they not good enough for the federal government of the same people? By exacting specie, in all payments to the general government, that government presented itself in the market as a powerful and formidable competitor with the banks, demanding specie at a moment when the banks were making unexampled struggles to strengthen themselves, and prepare for the resumption of specie payments. The extent of this government demand for specie does not admit of exact ascertainment; but when we reflect that the annual expenditures of the government were at the rate, including the post office department, of about thirty-three millions of dollars, and that its income, made up either of taxes or loans, must be an equal sum, making together an aggregate of sixty-six millions, it will be seen that the amount of specie required for the use of government must be immensely large. It cannot be precisely determined, but would not be less probably than fifteen or twenty millions of dollars per annum. Now, how is it possible for the banks, coming into the specie market in competition with all the vast power and influence of the government, to provide themselves with specie in a reasonable time to resume specie payments? That competition would have been avoided, if, upon the stoppage of the banks, the notes of those of whose solidity there was no doubt, had been continued to be received in payment of the public dues, as was done in Mr. Madison's administration? And why, Mr. President, should they not have been? Why should not this government receive the same description of medium which is found to answer all the purposes of the several state governments? Why should they have resorted to the expedient of issuing an inferior paper medium, in the form of treasury notes, and refusing to receive the better notes of safe and solid banks? Do not misunderstand me, Mr. President. No man is more averse than I am to a permanent inconvertible paper medium. It would have been as a temporary measure only that I should have thought it expedient to receive the notes of good local banks. If, along with that measure, the treasury order had been repealed, and other measures adopted to encourage and coerce the resumption of specie payments, we should have been much nigher that desirable event than, I fear, we now are. Indeed, I do not see when it is possible for the banks to resume specie payments, as long as the government is in the field making war upon them, and in the market demanding specie.

Another conclusive evidence of the hostility to the state banks, on the part of Mr. Van Buren, is to be found in that extraordinary recommendation of a bankrupt law contained in his message at the extra session. According to all the principles of any bankrupt system with which I am acquainted, the banks, by the stoppage of specie payments, had rendered themselves liable to its operation. If the recommended law had been passed, commissions of bankruptcy could have been immediately sued out against all the suspended banks, their assets seized, and the administration of them transferred from the several corporations to which it is now intrusted, to commissioners appointed by the president himself. Thus, by one blow, would the whole of the state banks have been completely prostrated, and the way cleared for the introduction of the favorite treasury bank; and is it not in the same spirit of unfriendliness to those banks, and with the same view of removing all obstacles to the establishment of a government bank, that the bill was presented to the senate a few days ago by the senator from Tennessee (Mr. Grundy) against the circulation of the notes of the old Bank of the United States? At a time when there is too much want of confidence, and when every thing that can be done should be done to revive and strengthen it, we are called upon to pass a law denouncing the heaviest penalty and ignominious punishment against all who shall reissue the notes of the old Bank of the United States, of which we are told that about seven millions of dollars are in circulation; and they constitute the best portion of the paper medium of the country; the only portion of it which has a credit everywhere, and which serves the purpose of a general circulation; the only portion with which a man can travel from one end of the continent to the other; and I do not doubt that the senator who has flung these severe pains and penalties against that best part of our paper medium, provides himself with a sufficient amount of it, whenever he leaves Nashville, to take him to Washington. [Here Mr. Grundy rose, and remarked: No, sir; I always travel on specie.] Ah! continued Mr. Clay, my old friend is always specious. I am quite sure that members from a distance in the interior generally find it indispensable to supply themselves, on commencing their journey, with an adequate amount of these identical notes to defray its expenses. Why, sir, will any man in his senses deny that these notes are far better than those which have been issued by that government banker, Mr. Levi Woodbury, aided though he be by the chancellor of the exchequer, (I beg his pardon, I mean the ex-chancellor,) the senator from New York, (Mr. Wright?) I am not going to stop here to inquire into the strict legality of the reissue of these notes; that question, together with the power of the government to pass the proposed bill, will be taken up when it is considered. I am looking into the motive of such a measure. Nobody doubts the perfect safety of the notes; no one can believe that they will not be fairly and fully paid. What, then, is the design of the bill? It is to assail the only sure general medium which the people possess. It is because it may come in competition with treasury notes or other government paper. Sir, if the bill had not been proposed by my old friend from Tennessee, I would say its author better deserved a penitentiary punishment than those against whom it is directed. I remember to have heard of an illustrious individual, now in retirement, having, on some occasion, burst out into the most patriotic indignation, because of a waggish trick played off upon him, by putting a note of the late Bank of the United States into his silk purse with his gold.

But it is unnecessary to dwell longer on the innumerable proofs of the hostility against the state banks, and the deliberate purpose of those in power to overthrow them. We hear and see daily throughout the country, among their partisans and presses, denunciations against banks, corporations, rag barons, the spirit of monopoly, &c.; and the howl for gold, hard money, and the constitutional currency; and no one can listen to the speeches of honorable members, friends of the administration, in this house and the other, without being impressed with a perfect conviction that the destruction of the state banks is media ed.

I have fulfilled my promise Mr. President, to sustain the first four propositions with which I set out. I now proceed to the fifth proposition:

5. That the bill under consideration is intended to execute Mr. Van Buren's pledge, to complete and perfect the principles, plans, and policy, of the past administration, by establishing, upon the ruins of the late Bank of the United States, and the state banks, a government bank to be managed and controlled by the treasury department, acting under the commands of the president of the United States.

The first impression made by the perusal of the bill is the prodigal and boundless discretion which it grants to the secretary of the treasury, irreconcilable with the genius of our free institutions, and contrary to the former cautious practice of the government. As originally reported, he was authorized by the bill to allow any number of clerks he thought proper to the various receivers general, and to fix their salaries. It will be borne in mind that this is the mere commencement of a system; and it cannot be doubted that, if put into operation, the number of receivers general and other depositaries of the public money would be indefinitely multiplied. He is allowed to appoint as many examiners of the public money, and to fix their salaries, as he pleases; he is allowed to erect at pleasure costly buildings; there is no estimate for any thing; and all who are conversant with the operations of the executive branch of the government know the value and importance of previous estimates. There is no other check upon wasteful expenditure but previous estimates; and that was a point always particularly insisted upon by Mr. Jefferson. The senate will recollect that, a few days ago, when the salary of the receiver general at New York was fixed, the chairman of the committee on finance rose in his place and stated that it was suggested by the secretary of the treasury that it should be placed at $5,000; and the blank was accordingly so filled. There was no statement of the nature or extent of the duties to be performed, of the time that he would be occupied, of the extent of his responsibility, or the expense of living at the several points where they were to be located; nothing but the suggestion of the secretary of the treasury, and that was deemed all-sufficient by a majority. There is no limit upon the appropriation which is made to carry into effect the bill, contrary to all former usage, which invariably prescribed a sum not to be transcended.

A most remarkable feature in the bill is that to which I have already called the attention of the senate, and of which no satisfactory explanation has been given. It is that which proceeds upon the idea that the treasury is a thing distinct from the treasury of the United States, and gives to the treasury a local habitation and a name, in the new building which is being erected for the treasury department in the city of Washington. In the treasury, so constituted, is to be placed that pittance of the public revenue which is gleaned from the District of Columbia. All else, that is to say, nine hundred and ninety-nine hundredths of the public revenue of the U. S. is to be placed in the hands of the receivers general, and the other depositaries beyond the District of Columbia. Now, the constitution of the United States provides that no money shall be drawn from the public treasury but in virtue of a previous appropriation by law. That trifling portion of it, therefore, which is within the District of Columbia, will be under the safeguard of the constitution, and all else will be at the arbitrary disposal of the secretary of the treasury.

It was deemed necessary, no doubt, to vest in the secretary of the treasury, this vast and alarming discretionary power. A new and immense government bank is about to be erected. How it would work in all its parts could not be anticipated with certainty; and it was thought proper, therefore, to bestow a discretion commensurate with its novelty and complexity, and adapted to any exigencies which might arise. The 10th section of the bill is that in which the power to create a bank is more particularly conferred. It is short, and I will read it to the senate.

"Sec. 10. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the secretary of the treasury to transfer the moneys in the hands of any depositary hereby constituted, to the treasury of the United States; to the mint at Philadelphia; to the branch mint at New Orleans; or to the offices of either of the receivers general of public moneys, by this act directed to be appointed; to be there safely kept, according to the provisions of this act; and also to transfer moneys in the hands of any one depositary, constituted by this act to any other depositary constituted by the same, at his discretion, and as the safety of the public moneys, and the convenience of the public service, shall seem to him to require. And for the purpose of payments on the public account, it shall be lawful for the said secretary to draw upon any of the said depositaries, as he may think most conducive to the public interests, or to the convenience of the public creditors, or both."

It will be seen that it grants a power, perfectly undefined, to the secretary of the treasury, to shift and transfer the public money, from depositary to depositary, as he pleases. He is expressly authorized to transfer moneys in the hands of any one depositary, constituted by the act, to any other depositary constituted by it, at his discretion, and as the safety of the public moneys, and the convenience of the public service, shall seem to him to require. There is no specification of any contingency or contingencies on which he is to act. All is left to his discretion. He is to judge when the public service (and more indefinite terms could not have been employed) shall seem to him to require it. It has been said that this is nothing more than the customary power of transfer, exercised by the treasury department from the origin of the government. I deny it, utterly deny it. It is a totally different power from that which was exercised by the cautious Gallatin, and other secretaries of the treasury—a power, by the by, which, on more than one occasion, has been controverted, and which is infinitely more questionable than the power to establish a bank of the United States. The transfer was made by them rarely, in large sums, and were left to the banks to remit. When payments were made, they were effected in the notes of banks with which the public money was deposited, or to which it was transferred. The rates of exchange were regulated by the state of the market, and under the responsibility of the banks. But here is a power given to transfer the public moneys without limit, as to sum, place, or time, leaving every thing to the discretion of the secretary of the treasury, the receivers general and other depositaries. What a scope is allowed in the fixation of the rates of exchange, whether of premium or discount, to regulate the whole domestic exchanges of the country, to exercise favoritism? These former transfers were not made for disbursement, but as preparatory to disbursement; and when disbursed, it was generally in bank notes. The transfers of this bill are immediate payments, and payments made not in bank notes but in specie.

The last paragraph in the section provides that, for the purpose of payments on the public account, it shall be lawful for the secretary to draw upon any of the said depositaries, as he may think most conducive to the public interest, or to the convenience of the public creditors, or both. It will be seen that no limit whatever is imposed upon the amount or form of the draft, or as to the depositary upon which it is drawn. He is made the exclusive judge of what is "most conducive to the public interests." Now let us pause a moment, and trace the operation of the powers thus vested. The government has a revenue of from twenty to thirty millions. The secretary may draw it to any one or more points as he pleases. More than a moiety of the revenue arising from customs is receivable at the port of New York, to which point the secretary may draw all portions of it, if he thinks it conducive to the public interest. A man has to receive, under an appropriation law, $10,000, and applies to Mr. Secretary for payment. Where will you receive it? he is asked. On New York. How? In drafts from $5 to $500. Mr. Secretary will give him these drafts accordingly, upon bank note paper, impressed like and simulating bank notes, having all suitable emblazonry, signed by my friend the treasurer, (whose excellent practical sense, and solid and sound judgment, if he had been at the head of the treasury, instead of Mr. Levi Woodbury, when the suspension of specie payments took place, would have relieved or mitigated the pecuniary embarrassments of the government and the people,) and countersigned by the comptroller, and filled up in the usual way of bank notes. Here is one of them, said Mr. Clay. [He here held up to the gaze of the senate a treasury note, having all the appearance of a bank note, colored, engraved, and executed like any other bank note, for $50.] This, continued Mr. Clay, is a government post note, put into circulation, paid out as money, and prepared and sent forth, gradually to accustom the people of this country to government paper.

I have supposed $10,000 to be received in the mode stated by a person entitled to receive it under an appropriation law. Now, let us suppose what he will do with it. Anywhere to the south or west it will command a premium of from two to five per cent. No where in the United States will it be under par. Do you suppose that the holder of these drafts would be fool enough to convert them into specie, to be carried and transported at his risk? Do you think that he would not prefer that this money should be in the responsible custody of the government, rather than in his own insecure keeping? Do you think that he will deny to himself the opportunity of realizing the premium of which he may be perfectly sure? The greatest want of the country is a medium of general circulation, and of uniform value every where. That, especially, is our want in the western and interior states. Now, here is exactly such a medium; and, supposing the government bank to be honestly and faithfully administered, it will, during such an administration, be the best convertible paper money in the world, for two reasons: The first is, that every dollar of paper out will be the representative of a dollar of specie in the hands of the receivers general, or other depositaries; and, secondly, if the receivers general should embezzle the public money, the responsibility of the government to pay the drafts issued upon the basis of that money would remain unimpaired. The paper, therefore, would be as far superior to the paper of any private corporation as the ability and resources of the government of the United States are superior to those of such corporations.

The banking capacity may be divided into three faculties: deposites, discount of bills of exchange, and promissory notes, or either, and circulation. This government bank would combine them all, except that it would not discount private notes, nor receive private deposites. In payments for the public lands, indeed, individuals are allowed to make deposites, and to receive certificates of their amount. To guard against their negotiability, a clause has been introduced to render them unassignable. But how will it be possible to maintain such an inconvenient restriction, in a country where every description of paper imposing an obligation to pay money or deliver property is assignable, at law or in equity, from the commercial nature and trading character of our people?

Of all the faculties which I have stated of a bank, that which creates a circulation is the most important to the community at large. It is that in which thousands may be interested, who never obtained a discount, or made a deposit with a bank. Whatever a government agrees to receive in payment of the public dues as a medium of circulation, is money, current money, no matter what its form may be, treasury notes, drafts drawn at Washington by the treasurer, on the receiver general at New York, or to use the language employed in various parts of this bill, "such notes, bills or paper issued under the authority of the United States." These various provisions were probably inserted not only to cover the case of treasury notes, but that of these drafts in due season. But if there were no express provision of law, that these drafts should be receivable in payment of public dues, they would, necessarily, be so employed, from their own intrinsic value.

The want of the community of a general circulation of uniform value everywhere in the United States would occasion vast amounts of the species of drafts which I have described to remain in circulation. The appropriations this year will probably fall not much short of thirty millions. Thirty millions of treasury drafts on receivers general, of every denomination, and to any amount, may be issued by the secretary of the treasury. What amount would remain in circulation cannot be determined a priori, I suppose not less than ten or fifteen millions; at the end of another year some ten or fifteen millions more; they would fill all the channels of circulation. The war between the government and state banks continuing, and this mammoth government bank being in the market, constantly demanding specie for its varied and ramified operations, confidence would be lost in the notes of the local banks, their paper would gradually cease to circulate, and the banks themselves would be crippled and broken. The paper of the government bank would ultimately fill the vacuum, as it would instantly occupy the place of the notes of the late Bank of the United States.

I am aware, Mr. President, that by the 25th section of the bill, in order to disguise the purpose of the vast machinery which we are about constructing, it is provided that it shall be the duty of the secretary of the treasury to issue and publish regulations to enforce the speedy presentation of all government drafts for payments at the place where payable, &c. Now, what a tremendous power is here vested in the secretary! He is to prescribe rules and regulations to enforce the speedy presentation of all government drafts for payment at the place where payable. The speedy presentation! In the case I have supposed, a man has his $10,000 in drafts on the receiver general at New York. The secretary is empowered to enact regulations requiring him speedily to present them, and, if he do not, the secretary may order them to be paid at St. Louis. At New York they may be worth a premium of five per cent.; on St. Louis they may be liable to a discount of five per cent. Now, in a free government, who would ever think of subjecting the property or money of a citizen to the exercise of such a power by any secretary of the treasury? What opportunity does it not afford to reward a partisan, or punish an opponent? It will be impossible to maintain such an odious and useless restriction for any length of time. Why should the debtor (as the government would be in the case of such drafts as I have supposed) require his creditor (as the holder of the draft would be) to apply within a prescribed time for his payment? No, sir; the system would control you; you could not control the system. But if such a ridiculous restriction could be so continued, the drafts would, nevertheless, whilst they were out, be the time long or short, perform the office of circulation and money.

Let us trace a little further the operation of this government bank, and follow it out to its final explosion. I have supposed the appropriation of some thirty millions of dollars annually by the government, to be disbursed in the form of drafts, issued at Washington by the treasury department, upon the depositaries. Of that amount some ten or fifteen millions would remain, the first year, in circulation; at the end of another year, a similar amount would continue in circulation; and so on, from year to year, until at the end of a series of some five or six years, there would be in circulation, to supply the indispensable wants of commerce and of a general medium of uniform value, not less than some sixty or eighty millions of drafts issued by the government. These drafts would be generally upon the receiver general at New York, because, on that point, they would be preferred over all others, as they would command a premium, or be at par, throughout the whole extent of the United States; and we have seen that the secretary of the treasury is invested with ample authority to concentrate at that point the whole revenue of the United States.

All experience has demonstrated that in banking operations a much larger amount of paper can be kept out in circulation than the specie which it is necessary to retain in the vaults to meet it when presented for payment. The proportions which the same experience has ascertained to be entirely safe, are one of specie to three of paper. If, therefore, the executive government had sixty millions of dollars accumulated at the port of New York, in the hands of the receiver general, represented by sixty millions of government drafts in circulation, it would be known that twenty of that sixty millions would be sufficient to retain to meet any amount of drafts which, in ordinary times, would be presented for payment. There would then remain forty millions in the vaults, idle and unproductive, and of which no practical use could be made. Well: a great election is at hand in the state of New York, the result of which will seal the fate of an existing administration. If the application of ten millions of that dormant capital could save, at some future day, a corrupt executive from overthrow, can it be doubted that the ten millions would be applied to preserve it in power? Again: let us suppose some great exigency to arise, a season of war, creating severe financial pressure and embarrassment. Would not an issue of paper, founded upon and exceeding the specie in the vaults, in some such proportions as experience had demonstrated might be safely emitted, be authorized? Finally, the whole amount of specie might be exhausted, and then, as it is easier to engrave and issue bank notes than to perform the unpopular office of imposing taxes and burdens, the discovery would be made that the credit of the government was a sufficient basis whereupon to make emissions of paper money, to be redeemed when peace and prosperity returned. Then we should have the days of continental money, and of assignats, restored! Then we should have that government paper medium, which the senator from South Carolina (Mr. Calhoun) considers the most perfect of all currency!

Meantime, and during the progress of this vast government machine, the state banks would be all prostrated. Working well, as it may, if honestly administered, in the first period of its existence, it will be utterly impossible for them to maintain the unequal competition. They could not maintain it even if the government were actuated by no unfriendly feelings towards them. But when we know the spirit which animates the present executive towards them, who can doubt that they must fall in the unequal contest? Their issues will be discredited and discountenanced; and that system of bankruptcy which the president would even now put into operation against them, will, in the sequel, be passed and enforced without difficulty.

Assuming the downfall of the local banks, the inevitable consequence of the operations of this great government bank; assuming, as I have shown would be the case, that the government would monopolize the paper issues of the country, and obtain the possession of a great portion of the specie of the country, we should then behold a combined and concentrated moneyed power, equal to that of all the existing banks of the United States, with that of the late Bank of the United States superadded. This tremendous power would be wielded by the secretary of the treasury, acting under the immediate commands of the president of the United States. Here would be a perfect union of the sword and the purse; here would be no imaginary, but an actual, visible, tangible, consolidation of the moneyed power. Who or what could withstand it? The states themselves would become supplicants at the feet of the executive for a portion of those paper emissions, of the power to issue which they had been stripped, and which he now exclusively possessed.

Mr. President, my observation and experience have satisfied me that the safety of liberty and prosperity consists in the division of power, whether political or pecuniary. In our federative system, our security is to be found in that happy distribution of power which exists between the federal government and the state governments. In our monetary system, as it lately existed, its excellence resulted from that beautiful arrangement by which the states had their institutions for local purposes, and the general government its institution for the more general purposes of the whole union. There existed the greatest congeniality between all the parts of this admirable system. All was homogeneous. There was no separation of the federal government from the states, or from the people. There was no attempt to execute practically that absurdity of sustaining, among the same people, two different currencies of unequal value. And how admirably did the whole system, during the forty years of its existence move and work! And on the two unfortunate occasions of its ceasing to exist, how quickly did the business and transactions of the country run into wild disorder, and utter confusion.

Hitherto, I have considered this new project as it is, according to its true nature and character, and what it must inevitably become. I have not examined it as it is not, but as its friends would represent it to be. They hold out the idea that it is a simple contrivance to collect, to keep and to disburse the public revenue. In that view of it, every consideration of safety and security recommends the agency of responsible corporations, rather than the employment of particular individuals. It has been shown during the course of this debate, that the amount which has been lost by the defalcation of individuals, has exceeded three or four times the amount of all that has been lost by the local banks, although the sums confided to the care of individuals have not been probably one-tenth part of the amount that has been in the custody of the local banks. And we all know that, during the forty years of the existence of the two banks of the United States, not one cent was lost of the public revenue.

I have been curious, Mr. President, to know, whence this idea of receivers general was derived. It has been supposed to have been borrowed from France. I required all the power of that most extraordinary man that ever lived, Napoleon Bonaparte, when he was in his meridian greatness, to displace the farmers general, and to substitute in their place the receivers general. The new system requires, I think I have heard it stated, something like 100,000 employees to have it executed. And, notwithstanding the modesty of the infant promises of this new project, I have no doubt that ultimately we shall have to employ a number of persons approximating to that which is retained in France. That will undoubtedly be the case whenever we shall revive the system of internal taxation. In France, what reconciled them to the system was, that Napoleon first, and the Bourbons afterwards, were pleased with the immense patronage which it gave them. They liked to have 100,000 dependants to add strength to the throne, which had been recently constructed or reascended. I thought, however, that the learned chairman of the committee on finance must have had some other besides the French model for his receivers general; and, accordingly, upon looking into Smith's history of his own state, I found that, when it was yet a colony, some century and a half ago, and when its present noble capital still retained the name of New Amsterdam, the historian says: "Among the principal laws enacted at this session, we may mention that for establishing the revenue, which was drawn into precedent. The sums raised by it were made payable into the hands of receivers general, and issued by the governor's warrant. By this means the governor became, for a season independent of the people, and hence we find frequent instances of the assemblies contending with him for the discharge of debts to private persons contracted on the faith of the government." The then governor of the colony was a man of great violence of temper, and arbitrary in his conduct. How the sub-treasury system of that day operated, the same historian informs us in a subsequent part of his work. "The revenue," he says, "established the last year, was at this session continued five years longer than was originally intended. This was rendering the governor independent of the people. For, at that day, the assembly had no treasure, but the amount of all taxes went, of course, into the hands of the receiver general, who was appointed by the crown. Out of this fund, moneys were only issuable by the governor's warrant, so that every officer in the government, from Mr. Blaihwat, who drew annually five per cent. out of the revenue, as auditor general, down to the meanest servant of the public, became dependent, solely, on the governor. And hence we find the house, at the close of every session, humbly addressing his excellency for the trifling wages of their own clerk." And, Mr. President, if this measure should unhappily pass, the day may come when the senate of the United States will have humbly to implore some future president of the United States to grant it money to pay the wages of its own sergeant-at-arms and do-keeper.

Who, Mr. President, are the most conspicuous of those who perseveringly pressed this bill, upon congress and the American people? Its drawer is the distinguished gentleman in the white house not far off; its endorser is the distinguished senator from South Carolina, here present. What the drawer thinks of the endorser, his cautious reserve and stifled enmity prevent us from knowing. But the frankness of the endorser has not left us in the same ignorance with respect to his opinion of the drawer. He has often expressed it upon the floor of the senate. On an occasion not very distant, denying him any of the nobler qualities of the royal beast of the forest, he attributed to him those which belong to the most crafty, most skulking, and one of the meanest of the quadruped tribe. Mr. President, it is due to myself to say that I do not altogether share with the senator from South Carolina in this opinion of the president of the United States. I have always found him, in his manners and deportment, civil, courteous, and gentlemanly; and he dispenses, in the noble mansion which he now occupies, one worthy the residence of the chief magistrate of a great people, a generous and liberal hospitality. An acquaintance with him of more than twenty years' duration has inspired me with a respect for the man, although, I regret to be compelled to say, I detest the magistrate.

The eloquent senator from South Carolina has intimated that the course of my friends and myself, in opposing this bill, was unpatriotic, and that we ought to have followed in his lead; and, in a late letter of his, he has spoken of his alliance with us, and of his motives for quitting it. I cannot admit the justice of his reproach. We united, if, indeed, there were any alliance in the case, to restrain the enormous expansion of executive power; to arrest the progress of corruption; to rebuke usurpation; and to drive the Goths and Vandals from the capital; to expel Brennus and his horde from Rome, who, when he threw his sword into the scale, to augment the ransom demanded from the mistress of the world, showed his preference for gold; that he was a hard-money chieftain. It was by the much more valuable metal of iron that he was driven from her gates. And how often have we witnessed the senator from South Carolina, with wolf countenance, and in doleful strains, pouring forth touching and mournful eloquence on the degeneracy of the times, and the downward tendency of the republic? Day after day, in the senate, have we seen the displays of his lofty and impassioned eloquence. Although I shared largely with the senator in his apprehension for the purity of our institutions, and the permanency of our civil liberty, disposed always to look at the brighter side of human affairs, I was sometimes inclined to hope that the vivid imagination of the senator had depicted the dangers by which we were encompassed in somewhat stronger colors than they justified. The arduous contest in which we were so long engaged was about to terminate in a glorious victory. The very object for which the alliance was formed was about to be accomplished. At this critical moment the senator left us; he left us for the very purpose of preventing the success of the common cause. He took up his musket, knapsack, and shot-pouch, and joined the other party. He went, horse, foot, and dragon, and he himself composed the whole corps. He went as his present most distinguished ally commenced with his expunging resolution, solitary and alone. The earliest instance recorded in history, within my recollection, of an ally drawing off his forces from the combined army, was that of Achilles at the siege of Troy. He withdrew, with all his troops, and remained in the neighborhood, in sulken and dignified inactivity. But he did not join the Trojan forces; and when, during the progress of the siege, his faithful friend fell in battle, he raised his avenging arm, drove the Trojans back into the gates of Troy, and satiated his vengeance by slaying Priam's noblest and dearest son, the finest hero in the immortal liad. But Achilles had been wronged, or imagined himself wronged in the person of the fair and beautiful Briseis. We did no wrong to the distinguished senator from South Carolina. On the contrary, we respected him, confided in his great and acknowledged ability, his uncommon genius, his extensive experience, his supposed patriotism; above all, we confided in his stern and inflexible fidelity. Nevertheless, he left us, and joined our common opponents, distrustful and distrusted. He left us, as he tells us in the Edgefield letter, because the victory which our common arms were about to achieve, was not to enure to him and his party, but exclusively to the benefit of his allies and their cause. I thought that, actuated by patriotism, (that noblest of human virtues,) we had been contending together for our common country, for her violated rights, her threatened liberties, her prostrate constitution. Never did I suppose that personal or party considerations entered into our views. Whether, if victory shall ever again be about to perch upon the standard of the apollis party, (the denomination which the senator from South Carolina has so often given to his present allies,) he will not feel himself constrained, by the principles on which he has acted, to leave them because it may not enure to the benefit of himself and his party, I leave to be adjudged between themselves.

The speech of the senator from South Carolina, was plausible, ingenious, abstract, metaphysical, and generalizing. It did not appear to me to be adapted to the business and business of human life. It was aerial, and not very high up in the air, Mr. President, either, not quite as high as Mr. Clayton was in his last ascension in his balloon. The senator announced that there was a single alternative, and no escape from one or the other branch of it. He stated that we must take the bill under consideration, or the substitute proposed by the senator from Virginia. I do not concur in that statement of the case. There is another course embraced in neither branch of the senator's alternative; and that course is to do nothing; always the wisest when you are not certain what you ought to do. Let us suppose that neither branch of the alternative is accepted, and that nothing is done. What, then, would be the consequence? There would be a restoration of the law of 1793, with all its cautious provisions and securities, provided by the wisdom of our ancestors, which has been so trampled upon by the late and present administrations. By that law, establishing the treasury department, the treasure of the United States is to be received, kept, and disbursed by the treasurer, under a bond with ample security, under a large penalty fixed by law, and not left, as this bill leaves it, to the uncertain discretion of a secretary of the treasury. If, therefore, we were to do nothing, that law would be revived; the treasurer would have the custody, as he ought to have, of the public money, and doubtless he would make special deposits of it in all instances with safe and sound state banks, as in some cases the secretary of the treasury is now obliged to do. Thus, we should have in operation that very special deposit system, so much desired by some gentlemen, by which the public money would remain separate and unmixed with the money of banks. There is yet another course, unembraced by either branch of the alternative presented by the senator from South Carolina; and that is to establish a bank of the United States, constituted according to the old and approved method of forming such an institution, tested and sanctioned by experience; a bank of the United States which should blend public and private interests, and be subject to public and private control, united together in such manner as to present safe and salutary checks against all abuses. The senator mistakes his own abandonment of that institution as ours. I know that the party in power has barricaded itself against the establishment of such a bank. It adopted, at the last extra session, the extraordinary and unprecedented resolution, that the people of the United States should not have such a bank, although it might be manifest that there was a clear majority of them demanding it. But the day may come, and I trust is not distant, when the will of the people must prevail in the councils of her own government; and when it does arrive a bank will be established.

The senator from South Carolina reminds us that we denounced the pet bank system; and so we did, and so we do. But does it therefore follow that, bad as that system was, we must be driven into the acceptance of a system infinitely worse? He tells us that the bill under consideration takes the public funds out of the hands of the executive, and places them in the hands of the law. It does no such thing. They are now without law, it is true, in the custody of the executive; and the bill proposes by law to confirm them in that custody, and to convey new and enormous powers of control to the executive over them. Every custodian of the public funds provided by the bill is a creature of the executive, dependent upon his breath, and subject to the same breath for removal, whenever the executive, from caprice, from tyranny, or from party motives, shall choose to order it. What safety is there for the public money, if there were a hundred subordinate executive officers charged with its care, whilst the doctrine of the absolute unity of the whole executive power, promulgated by the last administration, and persisted in by this, remains unrevoked and unbroken?

Whilst the senator from South Carolina professes to be the friend of state banks, he has attacked the whole banking system of the United States. He is their friend; he only thinks they are all unconstitutional! Why? Because the coining power is possessed by the general government, and that coining power, he argues, was intended to supply a currency of the precious metals; but the state banks absorb the precious metals, and withdrew them from circulation, and, therefore, are in conflict with the coining power. That power, according to my view of it, is nothing but a naked authority to stamp certain pieces of the precious metals in fixed proportions of alloy and pure metal pressed by law, so that their exact value be known. When that office is performed, the power is functus officio; the money passes out of the mint, and becomes the lawful property of those who legally acquire it. They may do with it as they please, throw it into the ocean, bury it in the earth, or melt it in a crucible, without violating any law. When it has once left the vaults of the mint, the law maker has nothing to do with it, but to protect it against those who attempt to debase or counterfeit, and, subsequently, to pass it as lawful money. In the sense in which the senator supposes banks to conflict with the coining power, foreign commerce, and especially our commerce with China, conflicts with it much more extensively. That is the great absorbent of the precious metals, and is therefore much more unconstitutional than the state banks. Foreign commerce sends them out of the country; banks retain them within it. The distinguished senator is no enemy to the banks; he merely thinks them injurious to the morals and industry of the country. He likes them very well, but he nevertheless believes that they levy a tax of twenty-five millions annually on the industry of the country! Let us examine, Mr. President, and see how this enormous and iniquitous assessment is made, according to the argument of the senator from South Carolina. He states that there is a mass of debt due from the community to the banks, amounting to $475,000,000, the interest upon which, constituting about that sum of $25,000,000, forms the exceptionable tax. Now, this sum is not paid by the whole community, but only by those individuals who obtain discounts from the banks. They borrow money at six per cent. interest, and invest it in profitable adventures, or otherwise employ it. They would not borrow it if they did not suppose they could make profit by it; and the probability is that they do make profit by it. Instead, therefore, of there being any loss in the operation, there is an actual gain to the community, by the excess of profit made beyond six per cent. interest, which they pay. What are banks? They are mere organized agencies for the loan of money and the transaction of monetary business; regulated agencies acting under the prescriptions of law, and subject to a responsibility, moral and legal, far transcending that under which any private capitalist operates. A number of persons, not choosing to lend out their money privately, associate together, bring their respective capitals into a common stock, which is controlled and managed by the corporate government of a bank. If no association whatever had been formed, a large portion of this capital, therefore, of that very debt of $475,000,000, would still exist, in the shape of private loans.

The senator from South Carolina might as well collect the aggregate amount of all the mortgages, bonds, and notes, which have been executed in the United States for loans, and assert that the interest paid upon the total sum constituted a tax levied upon the community.

In the liquidation of the debt due to the banks from the community, and from banks to the community, there would not be as much difficulty as the senator seems to apprehend. From the mass of debts due to the banks are to be deducted, first, the amount of subscriptions which constitute their capitals; secondly, the amount of deposits to the credit of individuals in their custody; and thirdly, the amount of their notes in circulation. How easily will these mutual debts neutralize each other! The same person, in numberless instances, will combine in himself the relations both of creditor and debtor.

The only general operation of banks beyond their discounts and deposits, which pervades the whole community, is that of furnishing a circulation in redeemable paper, beyond the amount of specie to redeem it in their vaults. And can it be doubted that this additional supply of money furnishes a powerful stimulus to industry and production, fully compensating any casual inconvenience, which sometimes, though rarely, occur? Banks reduce the rate of interest, and repress inordinate usury. The salutary influence of banking operations is demonstrated in countries and sections of country where they prevail, when contrasted with those in which they are not found. In the former, all is bustle, activity, general prosperity. The country is beautified and adorned by the noble works of internal improvements; the cities are filled with splendid edifices, and the wharves covered with the rich productions of our own and of foreign climates. In the latter, all is sluggishness, slothfulness, and inactivity. England, in modern times, illustrates the great advantages of banks, of credit, and of stimulated industry. Contrast her with Spain, destitute of all those advantages. In ancient times, Athens would present an image of full and active employment of all the energies of man, carried to the highest point of civilization, whilst her neighbor, Sparta, with her iron money, affords another of the boasted benefits of metallic circulation.

The senator from South Carolina would do the banks no harm; but they are deemed by him highly injurious to the planting interest! According to him, they inflate prices, and the poor planter sells his productions for hard money, and has to purchase his supplies at the swollen prices produced by a paper medium. Now, I must dissent altogether from the senator's statement of the case. England, the principal customer of the planter, is quite as much, if not more, a paper country than ours. And the paper-money prices of the one country are neutralized by the paper-money prices of the other country. If the argument were true, that a paper-money country trades disadvantageously with a hard-money country, we ought to continue to employ a paper medium, to counterbalance the paper medium of England. And if we were to banish our paper, and substitute altogether a metallic currency, we should be exposed to the very inequality which has been insisted upon. But there is nothing in that view of the matter which is presented by the senator from South Carolina. If, as he asserts, prices were always inflated in this country beyond their standard in England, the rate of exchange would be constantly against us. An examination, however, into the actual state of exchange between the two countries, for a long series of years, evinces that it has generally been in our favor. In the direct trade between England and this country, I have no doubt, there is a large annual balance against us; but that balance is adjusted and liquidated by balances in our favor in other branches of our foreign trade, which have been finally concentrated in England, as the great centre of the commercial world.

Of all the interests and branches of industry in this country, none has profited more by the use and employment of credit and capital derived from the banks and other sources, than the planting interest. It habitually employs credit in all countries where planting agriculture prevails. The states of Alabama, Mississippi, Arkansas, and Louisiana, have almost sprung into existence, as it were, by magic, or, at least, have been vastly improved and extended, under the influence of the credit system. Lands, slaves, utensils, beasts of burden, and other supplies, have been constantly bought, and still continue to be purchased, upon credit; and bank agency is all-essential to give the most beneficial operation to these credits. But the argument of the senator from South Carolina, which I am combating, would not be correct, if it were true that we have inflated prices on this side of the Atlantic, without a corresponding inflation of price on the other side; because the planter generally selling at home, and buying at home, the proceeds of his sale, whatever they may be, constitute the means by which he effects his purchases, and consequently neutralizes each other. In what do we of the west receive payment for the immense quantity of live stock and other produce of our industry, which we annually sell to the south and southwest, but that paper medium now so much decried and denounced? The senator from South Carolina is very fond of the state banks; but he thinks there is no legitimate currency except that of the constitution. He contends that the power which the government possesses to impose taxes restricts it, in their payment, to the receipt of the precious metals. But the constitution does not say so. The power is given in broad and unrestricted terms; and the government is left at liberty to collect the taxes in whatever medium or commodity, from the exigencies of the case, it can collect them. It is, doubtless, much the most convenient to collect them in money, because that represents, or can command, every thing, the want of which is implied by the power of taxation. But suppose there was no money in the country, none whatever, to be extorted by the tax-gatherer from an impoverished people? Is the power of government to cease, and the people to be thrown back into a state of nature? The senator asks if taxes could be levied and collected in tobacco, in cotton, and other commodities? Undoubtedly they could, if the necessity existed for such an inconvenient imposition. Such a case of necessity did exist in the colony of Virginia, and other colonies, prior to the revolution, and taxes were accordingly levied in tobacco or other commodities, as wolf-skins, even at this day, compose a part of the revenue of more than one state.

The argument, then, of the senator against the right of the government to receive bank notes in payment of public dues, a practice coeval with the existence of the government, does not seem to me to be sound. It is not accurate, for another reason. Bank notes, when convertible at the will of the holder into specie, are so much counted or told specie, like the specie which is counted and put in marked kegs, denoting the quantity of their contents. The senator tells us that it has been only within a few days that he has discovered that it is illegal to receive bank notes in payment of public dues. Does he think that the usage of the government under all its administrations, and with every party in power, which has prevailed for fifty years, ought to be set aside by a novel theory of his, just dreamed into existence, even if it possess the merit of ingenuity? The bill under consideration, which has been eulogized by the senator as perfect in its structure and details, contains a provision that bank notes shall be received in diminished proportions, during a term of six years. He himself introduced the identical principle. It is the only part of the bill that is emphatically his. How, then, can he contend that it is unconstitutional to receive bank notes in payment of public dues? I appeal from himself to himself. The senator further contends, that general deposits cannot be made with banks, and be thus confounded with the general mass of the funds on which they transact business. The argument supposes that the money collected for taxes must be preserved in identity; but that is impossible, often, to do. May not a collector give the small change which he has received from one tax-payer to another tax-payer to enable him to effect his payment? May he not change gold for silver, or vice versa, or both, if he be a distant collector, to obtain an undoubted remittance to the public treasury? What, Mr. President, is the process of making deposits with banks? The deposit is made, and a credit is entered for its amount to the government. That credit is supposed to be the exact equivalent of the amount deposited, ready and forthcoming to the government whenever it is wanted for the purposes of disbursement. It is immaterial to the government whether it receives back again the identical money put in, or other money of equal value. All that it wants is what it put in the bank, or its equivalent; and that, in ordinary times, with such prudent banks as alone ought to be selected, it is sure of getting. Again: the treasury has frequently to make remittances to foreign countries, to meet the expenditure necessary there for our naval squadrons, and other purposes. They are made to the bankers, to the Barings or the Rothschilds, in the form of bills of exchange purchased in the market by the agents of the government here, with money drawn out of the treasury. Here is one conversion of the money received from the tax-gatherer into the treasury. The bills are transmitted to the bankers, honored, paid, and the amount credited by them to the United States. Are the bankers bound to retain the proceeds of the bills in identity? Are they bound to do more than credit the government for an equal amount, for which they stand responsible whenever it is wanted? If they should happen to use any portion of those very proceeds of bills remitted to them in their banking operations, would it be drawing money from the treasury, contrary to the provisions of the constitution?

The senator from South Carolina contends that there is no constitutional power to contract with the twenty-five selected banks, as proposed in the substitute; yet the deposit act of 1836, which obtained the hearty approbation of that senator, contained a similar provision; and the very bill under consideration, so warmly supported by him, provides, under certain contingencies, for contracts to be made with state banks, to receive deposits of the public money upon compensation. He objects to the substitute, that it converts twenty-five state banks into a system of federal institutions; but the employment of state institutions by the federal authority no more makes them federal, than the employment of federal institutions by the states converts them into state institutions. This mutual aid, and this reciprocal employment of the several institutions of the general and particular governments, is one of the results and beauties of our admirable though complex system of government. The general government has the use of the capital, court-houses, prisons, and penitentiaries, in the several states. Do they, therefore, cease to appertain to the states? It is to be borne in mind that, although the state banks may occasionally be used by the federal authority, their legal responsibility to the several states remains unimpaired. They continue to be accountable to them, and their existence can only be terminated or prolonged by the state authority. And being governed, as they are, by corporate authority emanating from, and amenable to, state jurisdiction, and not under the control of the executive of the United States, constitutes at once a greater security for the public money, and more safety to the public liberty. It has been argued that a separation of the government from the banks will diminish the executive power. It must be admitted that the custody of the public money in various banks, subject to the control of state authority, furnishes some check upon the possible abuses of the executive government. But the argument maintains that the executive has least power when it has most complete possession of the public treasury! The senator from South Carolina contends that the separation in question being once effected, the relation of the federal government and the state banks will be antagonistical. I believe so Mr. President. This is the very thing I wish to prevent. I want them to live in peace, harmony, and friendship. If they are antagonists, how is it possible that the state banks can maintain their existence against the tremendous influence of this government? Especially, if this government should be backed by such a vast treasury bank as I verily believe this bill is intended to create? And what becomes of the argument urged by the senator from South Carolina, and the abolition resolutions offered by him at an early period of the session, asserting that the general government is bound to protect the domestic institutions of the several states?

The substitute is not, I think, what the welfare of the country requires. It may serve the purpose of a good half-way house. Its accommodations appear fair, and, with the feelings of a wearied traveller, one may be tempted to stop awhile and refresh himself there. I shall vote for it as an amendment to the bill, because I believe it the least of two evils, if it should, indeed, inflict any evil; or rather, because I feel myself in the position of a patient to whom the physician presents in one hand a cup of arsenic, and in the other a cup of poison: I reject the first, because of the instant death with which it is charged; I take the latter, as being, at the most, harmless, and depend upon the vis medicatrix naturæ. It would have been a great improvement, in my opinion, if the mode of bringing about the resumption of specie payments, contained in the substitute, were reversed: that is to say, if, instead of fixing on the 1st of July for resumption, it had provided that the notes of a certain number of safe, sound, and unquestionable banks to be selected, should be forthwith received, by the general government, in payment of all public dues; and that if the selected banks did not resume, by a future designated day, their notes should cease to be taken. Several immediate effects would follow: 1st. The government would withdraw from the market as a competitor with the banks for specie, and they would be left undisturbed to strengthen themselves. And, 2dly, confidence would be restored by taking off the discredit and discountenance thrown upon all banks by the government. And why should these notes not be so received? They are as good as treasury notes, if not better. They answer all the purposes of the state governments and the people. They now would buy as much as specie could have commanded at the period of suspension. They could be disbursed by the government. And, finally, the measure would be temporary.

But the true and only efficacious and permanent remedy, I solemnly believe, is to be found in a bank of the United States, properly organized and constituted. We are told that such a bank is fraught with indescribable danger; and that the government must, in the sequel, get possession of the bank, or the bank of the government. I oppose to these imaginary terrors the practical experience of forty years. I oppose to them the issue of the memorable contest, commenced by the late president of the United States, against the late Bank of the United States. The administration of that bank had been without serious fault. It had given no just offence to the government, towards which it had faithfully performed every financial duty. Under its able and enlightened president, it had fulfilled every anticipation which had been formed by those who created it; president Jackson pronounced the edict that it must fall, and it did fall, against the wishes of an immense majority of the people of the United States; against the convictions of its utility entertained by a large majority of the states; and to the prejudice of the best interests of the whole country. If an innocent, unoffending, and highly beneficial institution could be thus easily destroyed by the power of one man, where would be the difficulty of crushing it, if it had given any real cause for just animadversion? Finally, I oppose to these imaginary terrors the example deducible from English history. There a bank has existed since the year 1694, and neither has the bank got possession of the government, nor the government of the bank. They have existed in harmony together, both conducing to the prosperity of that great country; and they have so existed, and so contributed, because each has avoided cherishing towards the other that wanton and unnecessary spirit of hostility which was unfortunately engendered in the bosom of the late president of the United States.

I am admonished, sir, by my exhausted strength, and by, I fear your more exhausted patience, to hasten to a close. Mr. President, a great, novel, and untried measure is perseveringly urged upon the acceptance of congress. That it is pregnant with tremendous consequences, for good or evil, is undeniable, and admitted by all. We firmly believe that it will be fatal to the best interests of this country, and ultimately subversive of its liberties. You, who have been greatly disappointed in other measures of equal promise, can only hope, in the doubtful and uncertain future, that its operation may prove salutary. Since it was first proposed at the extra session, the whole people have not had an opportunity of passing in judgment upon it at their elections. As far as they have, they have expressed their unqualified disapprobation. From Maine to the State of Mississippi, its condemnation has been loudly thundered forth. In every intervening election, the administration has been defeated, or its former majorities neutralized. Maine has spoken; New York, Pennsylvania, Maryland, Ohio, Rhode Island, Mississippi, and Michigan, all these states, in tones and terms not to be misunderstood, have denounced the measure. The Keystone state (God bless her) has twice proclaimed her rejection of it; once at the polls, and once through her legislature. Friends and foes of the administration have united in condemning it. And, at the very moment when I am addressing you, a large meeting of the late supporters of the administration, headed by the distinguished gentleman who presided in the electoral college which gave the vote of that patriotic state to president Van Buren, are assembling in Philadelphia, to protest solemnly against the passage of this bill. Is it right that, under such circumstances, it should be forced upon a reluctant but free and intelligent people? Is it right that this senate, constituted as it now is, should give its sanction to the measure? I say it in no disrespectful or taunting sense, but we are entitled, according to the latest expressions of the popular will, and in virtue of manifestations of opinion deliberately expressed by state legislatures, to a vote of thirty-five against the bill; and I am ready to enter, with any senator friendly to the administration, into details to prove the assertion. Will the senate, then, bring upon itself the odium of passing this bill? I implore it to forbear, forbear, forbear! I appeal to the instructed senators. Is this government made for us, or for the people and the states, whose agents we are? Are we not bound so to administer it as to advance their welfare, promote their prosperity, and give general satisfaction? Will that sacred trust be fulfilled, if the known sentiments of large and respectable communities are despised and contemned by those whom they have sent here? I call upon the honorable senator from Alabama, (Mr. King,) with whom I have so long stood in the public councils, shoulder to shoulder, bearing up the honor and the glory of this great people, to come now to their rescue. I call upon all the senators; let us bury, deep and forever, the character of the partisan, rise up patriots and statesmen, break the vile chains of party, throw the fragments to the winds, and feel the proud satisfaction that we have made but a small sacrifice to the paramount obligations which we owe our common country.

TWENTY-FIFTH CONGRESS.

SECOND SESSION—SENATE.

March 22. After a number of petitions had been presented, on motion of Mr. Davis, the committee on commerce were instructed to inquire into the expediency of importing one or more models of improved light-house radiators; and also to inquire whether a better system for light-houses in this country might not be devised.

Mr. Tipton, from the committee on military affairs, reported without amendment the joint resolution referred to them, directing the expenditure of an appropriation heretofore made for the removal of the United States troops from Fort Gibson. This bill, by consent, was taken up and considered.

Mr. Grundy moved to amend the bill by inserting the word near, so as to require the site of the new fort to be at or near old Fort Smith.

This amendment was discussed by Messrs. Grundy, Tipton, King, Sevier, Fulton, and Preston, on the ground that the site of Fort Smith was the only proper one, and that the sum of $15,000, required for that site, was not a sufficient consideration for choosing a worse one.

The amendment was adopted—ayes 24, noes not counted—and the bill, so amended, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

On motion of Mr. Walker, the bill authorizing a township in Mississippi to change the 16th section for better land, for the use of schools, was taken up, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The senate resumed the consideration of the sub-treasury bill.

Mr. Calhoun spoke more than two hours in reply to Mr. Webster.

Mr. Webster spoke an hour and a half in rejoinder.

Mr. Calhoun spoke a short time, chiefly in explanation of some of the acts and opinions of his public life.

Mr. Clay, in reply to an insinuation by Mr. Calhoun, of concert between him and Mr. Webster, in relation to Mr. Calhoun, denied that there was any ground whatever for such a charge. There had been neither counsel nor concert between them on the subject.

Mr. Wall obtaining the floor, the senate adjourned after a short executive session.

March 23. After the presentation of a number of petitions, the bill to restore circuit jurisdiction to the district court of the western district of Virginia, was taken up, discussed by Messrs. Grundy, White and Roane, and, after being amended, ordered to a third reading. [Passed next day and sent to the house.]

The bill for the relief of the heirs of Joseph Leiber, and the joint resolution to direct the expenditure of an appropriation heretofore made for the removal of the United States troops from Fort Gibson, were severally read a third time, and passed.

The bill for the improvement of the Wabash river, was taken up, and gave rise to a discussion—during which Messrs. King and Hubbard opposed it, and Mr. Tipton advocated it. It was then informally laid on the table for the present.

The senate then resumed the consideration of the sub-treasury bill, when

Mr. Wall rose, and spoke five hours in favor of the bill, and especially in vindication of his course in opposition to the resolutions lately sent to congress by the legislature of New Jersey.

Mr. Wright, (rising at the same time with Mr. Hubbard,) said he should ask and urge that the question on this bill should be decided to-morrow; and, on his motion,

The senate adjourned.

March 24. After the transaction of some business of minor importance, the senate resumed the consideration of the sub-treasury bill.

Mr. Southard and Mr. Wall successively addressed the senate, chiefly on subjects respecting their relations to parties and to the state which they represent.

Mr. White then spoke until near six in opposition to the bill, as unconstitutional, and as injurious and dangerous in its effects.

Mr. King moved to amend the 23d section of the bill, (gradually prohibiting the government from receiving bank notes at all,) by placing the beginning of this gradual process in 1839, instead of 1838, simply delaying the process one year.

This amendment was carried by the following vote:

YEAS.—Messrs. Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Knight, Linn, Lumpkin, Lyon, McKean, Merrick, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Prentiss, Preston, Roane, Robbins, Robinson, Ruggles, Sevier, Smith, of Indiana, Southard, Strange, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Trotter, Walker, Wall, White, Williams, Wright, Young—42.

YAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benton, Crittenden, Davis, Morris, Smith, of Conn., Spence, Webster—9.

The question then recurring on Mr. Cuthbert's motion to strike out this 23d section altogether, it was carried in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Buchanan, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Davis, Fulton, Grundy, Knight, McKean, Merrick, Morris, Nicholas, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Robbins, Robinson, Ruggles, Sevier, Smith, of Indiana, Southard, Spence, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Wall, Webster, White, Williams—31.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Lyon, Mouton, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Roane, Smith, of Conn., Strange, Trotter, Walker, Wright, Young—21.

Mr. Tipton moved to insert a clause, containing a positive requisition that the government shall receive in all public dues the notes of specie paying banks. [This amendment having a special reference to the specie circular of July, 1837, and intending to repeal it.]

An earnest discussion followed on this amendment, by Messrs. Rives and Tipton in favor of it, and by Messrs. Benton, Sevier, Roane, and Walker, in opposition.

The amendment was lost, as follows:

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Lyon, Morris, Mouton, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Smith, of Connecticut, Strange, Trotter, Walker, Wall, Williams, Wright, Young, —30.

Mr. Webster, having made a few introductory remarks, moved to amend the bill by a requisition that no distinction should be made or exist hereafter between the different branches of the revenue, as to the money or medium in which the debts or dues of the government should be paid or discharged.

Mr. Benton opposed this amendment at much length, and with great vehemence.

Mr. Webster modified his amendment so as to prohibit the secretary of the treasury from issuing any general order [as the specie circular] making any discrimination as to the funds or medium in which debts to the United States should be paid.

Messrs. Calhoun, Wall and Benton, spoke against the amendment as modified, and Messrs. Webster, Walker and King, in its favor.

Mr. Benton moved to amend the amendment, by requiring that there should not be any difference between the times and terms of credit, and of payment for customs and for public lands.

Mr. Young offered as a substitute for this, which Mr. Benton accepted, a proviso that all the public dues should be received in cash or otherwise, in the same medium and manner as payments at the time may be required for the public lands, (thus placing the customs on the same footing with the payments for the public lands, whatever that may be.)

This amendment, after a brief debate, was lost as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Linn, Morris, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Smith, of Connecticut, Young—8.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Davis, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Knight, Lumpkin, Lyon, McKean, Merrick, Mouton, Nicholas, Prentiss, Preston, Roane, Robbins, Robinson, Ruggles, Sevier, Smith, of Indiana, Southard, Spence, Strange, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Trotter, Walker, Wall, Webster, White, Williams, Wright—44.

The question recurring on Mr. Webster's amendment, forbidding discrimination in the kind of money or medium to be received in paying government dues, it was decided in the affirmative by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Brown, Buchanan, Clay, of Alabama, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Fulton, Grundy, King, Knight, Lyon, McKean, Merrick, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Roane, Robbins, Robinson, Ruggles, Sevier, Smith, of Indiana, Southard, Spence, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Trotter, Walker, Webster, White, Young—37.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Calhoun, Cuthbert, Hubbard, Linn, Lumpkin, Morris, Niles, Pierce, Smith, of Conn., Strange, Wall, Wright—14.

Mr. Calhoun, at some length, assigned his reasons why he should now vote against the bill.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Clay, of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Lyon, Morris, Mouton, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Smith, of Connecticut, Strange, Trotter, Walker, Wall, Williams, Wright, Young—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Grundy, Knight, McKean, Merrick, Nicholas, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Robbins, Ruggles, Smith, of Indiana, Southard, Spence, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Webster, White—25.

On motion of Mr. Morris, the bill as amended, was ordered to be printed.

The senate then adjourned after 9 o'clock.

March 26. After several petitions, &c. had been presented,

Mr. Southard presented a memorial, addressed to congress and signed by the deputation of the Cherokee Indians now in Washington, making representations and complaints in regard to their situation under the late alleged treaty, and praying congress in some mode to interfere for their relief.

Also, a memorial against the enforcement of the treaty, directly from the Cherokee nation, with the signatures of 15,665 persons of that nation.

Mr. S. moved that these memorials be printed, and referred to the committee on Indian affairs.

This motion gave rise to an animated debate between Messrs. Lumpkin, Clay, of Ala. Southard, King, Grundy, and White. Finally the whole subject was laid on the table on the motion of Mr. Clay, of Ala.—yeas 37, nays 10.

[We will publish the debate on this subject, which was highly interesting, hereafter.]

The sub-treasury bill having been taken up and read a third time,

Mr. McKean said he thought it his duty, and he therefore renewed the motion to postpone this bill to the first Monday in December next, on which question he called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and the motion was negatived, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Buchanan, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Grundy, Knight, McKean, Merrick, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Robbins, Ruggles, Smith, of Ind., Southard, Spence, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Webster, White—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Calhoun, Clay, of Ala. Cuthbert, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Lyon, Morris, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Smith, of Conn., Strange, Trotter, Walker, Wall, Williams, Wright, Young—29.

The bill was then passed (the yeas and nays having been ordered on the call of Mr. Norvell) by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Clay, of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Lyon, Morris, Mouton, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Smith, of Connecticut, Strange, Trotter, Walker, Wall, Williams, Wright, Young—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Grundy, Knight, McKean, Merrick, Nicholas, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Robbins, Ruggles, Smith, of Indiana, Southard, Spence, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Webster, White—25.

The bill was then sent down to the other house for concurrence.

[For the bill as it passed the senate, see page 66.]

The bills for the relief of Daniel Davis, and of Obed P. Lacy, were severally read a third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. Bayard, the 47th rule of the senate, with the resolution of Mr. Tipton for printing it, was, after a short conversation, referred to a select committee of five, to be appointed by the chair for the purpose of revising the rule itself, and making a new determination as to what persons shall be admitted on the floor of the senate.

A number of private bills were read a second time, when the senate, after a short executive session, adjourned.

March 27. The bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the United States for 1838 was received from the house, read twice, and referred to the committee on finance.

The following, among other petitions, &c. were presented.

By Mr. Clay, of Kentucky: A small bill, vulgarly called a shin-plaster, from citizens of Hampshire county, in Virginia, in confirmation of a statement made by them in a memorial formerly presented from them, that such bills were issued by Stockton and Stokes, which statement had been denied. Mr. Clay moved that this bill be referred to the same committee with the above memorial.

Mr. King, of Alabama, desired that the senator would not present a shin-plaster to the senate; he trusted that, on a moment's reflection, he would withdraw it.

Mr. Clay said he had obeyed the request of the good people who had before sent a memorial, one alleged fact of which having been denied, they had now sent this bill as a voucher, to be referred with the petition.

The bill was read, on the call of Mr. Grundy, and was understood to be signed by W. L. Stokes, and countersigned by certain initials.

Mr. Buchanan said he thought it right to observe that this was a distinct firm from that of Stockton and Stokes.

Mr. Clay said the committee could determine whether the signatures were evasive.

A number of bills were reported and ordered to a second reading.

After some unimportant business, the chair presented a communication from the treasury department, with a supplement of the annual report of the commissioner of the general land office, in relation to surveys and reservations of land. Referred.

The following bills were read a third time, and passed:

To authorize the correction of certain errors in the payment of French indemnities; for the relief of John H. Jacobs; and of the legal representatives of George Duvall, and others.

On motion of Mr. Tipton, the senate took up the bill for the continuation of the Cumberland road through Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois.

The subject of this bill was discussed by Messrs. Norvell, Tipton, Strange, Calhoun, Smith, of Indiana, Morris, Buchanan, Smith, of Conn. Robinson, Walker, Hubbard, Clay, of Kentucky, Young, Clay, of Alabama, King.

The bill was opposed mainly on the ground of the existing embarrassments and bankruptcy of the government; partly on that of the want of sufficient information, and partly on that of the inequality and injustice of the appropriation which it involved.

On motion of Mr. Hubbard, the bill was laid on the table; whereupon,

On motion of Mr. Buchanan, the secretary of war was directed to inform the senate what portions of the estimate for the construction of the Cumberland road, in Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, might be dispensed with without injury to the road, and without violating existing contracts.

The senate adjourned, after an executive session.

March 28. Among the petitions presented today, was one by Mr. Allen from a meeting in Cleveland, Ohio, praying congress to take measures of redress for the outrage committed by the British, in the destruction of the steamboat Caroline, at Schlosser. Referred.

[Mr. Buchanan remarked, on the subject of this memorial, that he had no objection to its reference; but he wished it to be generally understood that the subject of the alleged outrage at Schlosser, was now in a course of investigation, and the subject of correspondence between the executive authorities of the two nations, and he believed justice would be done. But in any case, while this negotiation should be pending, it would be improper for the committee on foreign relations to do any thing upon it. But if ever the time should come when it would be necessary for the committee to act on the subject, he had no doubt they would do their duty.]

After several private bills had been reported, the senate, on motion of Mr. Norvell, took up the resolution formerly offered by him, instructing the committee for the District of Columbia to enquire into the expediency of authorizing the people of the District to send a delegate to the other house of congress.

Mr. Roane said he was by no means opposed to the proposition for a delegate; but the subject had been agitated among the citizens of the district themselves, and he thought it would be time enough to act when they should present their petition on the subject.

Mr. Grundy said he thought the senate had nothing to do on the subject, till they should receive a proposition from the other house, to whom the delegate would be sent. The senate had no right to intrude a delegate on the other house, and should act only by virtue of application from that body.

Mr. Norvell said he believed the measure, would have a salutary effect on the affairs of the district; and the chairman of the committee for the district in the other house had recommended that it should be first taken up in the senate.

On motion of Mr. Grundy, the resolution was laid upon the table.

Mr. Davis offered a resolution, which lies over one day, (and which Mr. D. stated had reference to the subject of economy, much insisted on yesterday in the case of the Cumberland road,) calling on the secretary of war for information as to the number of fortifications completed, of those commenced and unfinished, of those not commenced, but contemplated, to complete the system, with other particulars respecting them; and whether in his judgment, if a system of steam batteries should be adopted, many such fortifications could either be dispensed with or diminished.

Also, inquiring of the secretary of the navy whether in his judgment a system of defence by armed steamers would not be more efficient than any other, and requiring from him an estimate of the expense of a system of defence by armed steamers.

The senate then took up and discussed at great length the bill for the relief of William R. Taylor, involving the question of the allowance of interest on money due from the government.

[The rule of the senate on this subject has been to allow no interest on any debt due from the government prior to the time when the claim is presented, nor even afterwards, except in cases of culpable refusal or neglect on the part of government authorities to pay or to examine the claim. The alleged ground of this rule is, that without it the public creditors might leave their dues in the hands of the government for the very purpose of securing the money, and drawing interest upon it.]

The motion by Mr. Hubbard, from the committee, to postpone the bill indefinitely, was negative: Yeas 10, nays 21. [This vote was understood as not infringing the above rule, but as depending on peculiar circumstances and on difference of opinion respecting them.]

The bill was then ordered to a third reading.

The senate concurred in the amendment of the house to the senate bill for the relief of Michael Cassidy.

Several bills from the house were read twice, and referred.

The bill to revive and continue in force the act allowing pensions to persons disabled by wounds received during the revolutionary war, was considered, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The senate adjourned, after an executive session. March 29. Among the petitions, &c. were the following:

By Mr. Fulton: from the legislature of Arkansas, joint resolutions urging the establishment of the boundary line between that state and Texas. Referred.

On motion of Mr. Linn, the committee on private land claims were instructed to inquire into the expediency of confirming the claim of Francis Le Clerc to an island in the Mississippi.

The bill to give effect to the 8th article of the treaty of 1819 with Spain was considered, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The senate took up the bill making appropriations for the construction of certain roads in Wisconsin.

The bill was discussed at much length by Messrs. Walker, Norvell, Linn, King, White, Sevier, Tipson and Young, chiefly on the objection that commencing roads by congress had been construed by some into a virtual contract for their completion; and on the ground, in favor of the bill, that those who denied the right of congress to construct roads within the states had heretofore admitted the right in relation to the territories.

The bill was amended, on motion of Mr. Lyon, by appropriating $500 for the survey of a route for a road from Green Bay to the Mississippi; and, on motion of Mr. White, by providing that said survey should not be construed as imposing any obligation on congress to construct said road. Yeas 23, nays 17.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The senate proceeded to consider the bill to reduce and graduate the price of the public lands.

Mr. Clay, of Alabama, spoke, at some length, in favor of the bill.

The amendment from committee was read, proposing to strike out that portion of the bill which provided for reducing the price of all lands ten cents for every four years that they might be in market, till the price should sink to the minimum of fifty cents; and to insert a substitute providing for a due estimate of the various refuse lands, for their classification according to value, and for a reduction less gradual than the preceding, to the minimum price of fifty cents per acre.

At the desire of Mr. Clay, of Kentucky, the bill was then laid on the table, with the understanding that it would be called up on Monday next.

The senate took up the bill to prohibit the giving and receiving of challenges to duels within the district of Columbia, and for the punishment thereof.

Mr. Clayton, of the judiciary committee, explained the provisions of the bill, and the amendments reported to it by the committee on the judiciary, one of which substitutes for the punishment of death, confinement from ten to twenty years in the penitentiary; and the other amendment provides that persons going out of the District with a view to evade the provisions of this bill should still be punished in the same manner as if they had remained in the District.

Mr. Prentiss spoke briefly in favor of the constitutional power of congress to pass this bill, and to have it carried into effect.

Mr. Norvell, expressed some doubt in relation to such power.

Mr. Roane was understood to start a difficulty in relation to punishing a crime consummated in Virginia or Maryland, in which states process against the perpetrators might at the same time be issued. He was also understood to doubt or deny the constitutional power of congress to enact the above second amendment offered from committee.

Mr. Morris argued also against such supposed constitutional power.

Mr. Smith, of Connecticut, insisted on the power of Congress to pass the bill and the amendments, inasmuch as congress have as good a right to punish the first moiety of a crime as a state to punish the latter moiety.

Mr. Grundy explained the manner in which the above and other difficulties might be obviated, and argued in favor of the constitutional power of congress over the subject.

Mr. Smith, of Indiana, was decidedly in favor of the objects of this bill. He felt disposed to go all constitutional lengths to suppress this cruel and inhuman practice of duelling—a practice at once in violation of all laws, human and divine. He had examined this bill carefully, and he had exerted his mind to approve of that part of the bill which punished the offence of leaving the District where the crime was committed in the states. He had great doubts on the question of conflicting jurisdiction, for the offence of killing in a duel in Maryland was murder. The bill punishes, as amended, with penitentiary. What would be the state of the case if the criminal was confined in our penitentiary for twenty years, and the state of Maryland should convict him, and order him to be hung? Would he serve out his time in the penitentiary first, or what would be done with the case? He threw out these suggestions for the purpose of having the difficulties removed by argument. He should certainly do all in his power as a senator to suppress duelling here and elsewhere.

Mr. Grundy argued that if a man should steal a horse in the District, and ride him into Maryland, he would be guilty of larceny in both; and when he had been punished by the authorities of one who first got hold of him, it could not be much cause of regret if he should be punished also by the other.

Mr. Clayton distinguished more nicely the precise objects of the bill. It pretended to no jurisdiction over anything not done in the District: the bill expressly and only provided to punish for what should be actually done in the District. The punishment might in some cases seem disproportioned to the offence; but it could not be so regarded if the intent, by which all crimes are measured, should be taken into the account.

Mr. Knight split the difference of the supposed concurrent jurisdiction, by adducing a supposed example of a man's robbing the mail in the District, and then killing the driver in Virginia, in which case he should be punished in the District for robbery, and in Virginia for murder.

Mr. Niles spoke for some time in favor of taking all practicable measures to put down the practice of duelling, urging as motives all the considerations of honor, decency, respectability, civilization, duty, and humanity. He also argued that there was no want of power in congress; they might even punish an individual for simply going out of the District, if he should go with a known intent to commit a crime.

Mr. Strange argued that the propensity to duelling was so strong in the community, that duels, more or less, would be fought, in violation of all laws, however severe, divine and human; but on this very account, especially in consideration of its collateral and consequent evils, the laws against it could not well be too severe, unless their severity should prevent their being carried into execution. But he believed the moral sense of every community, in the country would pronounce the provisions of this bill, as amended, rather too lenient than too severe. He also argued that the constitutional power of congress over the subject was clear, inasmuch as they would provide for the punishment of no crime committed except those within the limits of their jurisdiction, which would be aggravated by the degree of the evil intent.

The bill being still up, the senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Thursday, March 22. A number of gentlemen having memorials on the subject of the late duel, obtained leave to present them; and they were referred to the select committee on that subject.

Mr. Henry presented the petition of a number of the citizens of Mercer county, Pennsylvania, praying for an investigation of the late duel that resulted in the death of the hon. J. Cilley, and that efficient means may be adopted to put a stop in future to this murderous practice; which, on motion of Mr. H. was referred to the select committee to which that subject is referred.

Mr. Davies presented the petition of David Witmer and 53 others, citizens of Lancaster county, Penn., and the petition of Robert Jenkins and 33 others, of the same county, praying for the passage of a law to prevent the inhuman practice of duelling.

Mr. C. Morris, of Ohio, asked and obtained leave to present the petition of John C. McCoy and 98 others, of Washington county, Ohio, on the subject of the late duel; which was referred to the select committee on that subject.

A number of committees made reports upon private claims, &c.

On motion of Mr. Hopkins,

Resolved, That the committee on the post office and post roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for additional compensation to postmasters whose commissions are unequal to the duties which they perform.

The Speaker laid before the house a letter from col. Hunter, assistant doorkeeper, announcing the death of Overton Carr, late doorkeeper of this house, on Wednesday last; whereupon,

Mr. Mercer offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the house will adjourn at four o'clock this afternoon, to attend the funeral of their deceased doorkeeper, Overton Carr; that the expenses thereof be defrayed out of the contingent funds, and that his widow be paid the salary of the deceased for the present session of congress.

The resolution was agreed to without a division.

The residue of the morning hour was occupied by Mr. W. Cost Johnson, in continuation and conclusion of the discussion, on his part of the resolution moved by him on the subject of an appropriation of land for the promotion of education in the old states.

The Speaker laid before the house a communication from the secretary of war, transmitting a copy of his answer to the letter of major general Jesup, dated Fort Jupiter, Feb. 11, 1838, called for by a resolution of the house of representatives on the 19th instant.

Also, a communication from the secretary of war, transmitting reports and statements prepared by the adjutant general and the paymaster general of the army, in reply to the resolution of the house of the 19th ult., respecting the number of volunteers and militia engaged in the service of the United States within the last six years, and the relative cost of their employment and that of the troops of the regular army. Laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

The house then again went into committee of the whole on the state of the union, (Mr. Casey in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the appropriation bill for the civil and diplomatic expenses of government; and the question still being on the motion to strike out an item of $4,000 for a jet d'eau on the grounds of the capitol.

Mr. Halsted, of N. J., again addressed the house on that subject, and in rejoinder to the remarks of Mr. Lincoln, expressing the astonishment which an attack from that quarter had occasioned; avowing his attachment to the state from which that gentleman came, as well as high respect for himself; disclaiming all purpose of allusion to him in his speech of yesterday, since, when he made it, he did not even know that that gentleman belonged to the committee on the public grounds; but still insisting on his objection to the appropriation, both for the jet d'eau and the printing and papering done in the president's house. To the repairs of the roof, &c. he had not intended then, or now, to object. He regretted that he had interfered with a favorite proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts, since he might as well have based his speech, which was intended to be a general attack on extravagant expenditures under the existing administration, on some other objectionable item of the bill.

He replied to Mr. Cambreleng's objection as to the urgency of the wants of the treasury, by noticing the constant recurrence of that objection whenever an investigation was proposed of the measures of government. It never recurred the right time.

Mr. Boon commented with very great severity on Mr. Halsted's speech of yesterday, and avowed his intention "to skin" that gentleman. He said his speech evinced the advantage of being high born and college bred; characterized its strain of language as low and vulgar, and every way unworthy of a representative: referred to Mr. Halsted's consumption of pens and paper as being ten times greater than his own; he remarked upon his dress as being that of a dandy, &c. and concluded by comparing the whole speech to butter churned without a cover, which splashed on all around, &c. &c.

Mr. Lincoln made a very brief reply to the remarks of Mr. Halsted, explaining that the chief reason of his former remarks had been an unwillingness to see others attacked on the ground of a measure which he had himself proposed.

Mr. Ewing made a very spirited reply to the remarks of Mr. Boon, and in support of the ground taken by Mr. Halsted, to whom he returned his cordial thanks for his speech. It had been unfortunate as interfering with Mr. Lincoln, but well merited by the extravagance of an administration which had come into power on promises of economy. He referred to an implied threat of personal violence in the speech, of Mr. Bynum yesterday, on which subject he said he was entitled to speak, during one suffered in that way, being taken unprepared; but it should be the last time he would be caught in that situation.

The debate on this item was closed by a motion of Mr. Mercer to amend it by striking out the detail, and inserting a gross sum for completing the improvement of the public grounds according to a plan adopted by the last congress; which was agreed to.

Mr. McKay moved to amend the bill farther by striking out the item for clerk hire and the salary of a messenger in the "clothing bureau," and increasing, to the same amount, the appropriation for the office of commissary general of purchases: which amendment, while it left the expenditure the same, would avoid any implied sanction, by the house, of the establishment of a new bureau by the simple authority of the head of a department.

Mr. Mallory, of Virginia, took the present occasion to read a communication addressed to him by commodore Dallas, in consequence of certain animadversions in a speech made by him at the September session, accompanied by certain statements of lieutenants McIntosh and Saunders: by all which Mr. M. declared himself not convinced.

Mr. Bell renewed the presentation of his amendment to reduce all salaries one-fourth; but modified by admitting the contingencies formerly inserted as a condition, viz. that the sub-treasury bill should pass.

The Chair still persisted in the opinion that the amendment, even in this form, was still not strictly in order.

After a brief discussion of the point of order by Messrs. Haynes and Bell, the decision of the chair was sustained by the house.

Mr. Bell then moved to amend the bill by striking out $567,687 for pay and mileage of members, and inserting $425,760. Also by striking out $40,400 for the clerks and officers of both houses, and inserting $30,300.

Mr. B. had no wish to commence with these items, but as they were the first in order, he had been compelled to do so; he wished to proceed and propose a similar reduction in all the salaries throughout the government with the exception of the president, vice president, and judges. He was not opposed to liberal allowances for public services, nor desirous of reduction for its own sake, but he thought the great disparity between the salaries of state and federal officers called for some measure of the kind. It would be vain to rely on state rights as a bulwark against the encroachments of the general government, while that disparity continued. It was gradually, in practice, working a change in our institutions; as an instance of which, he alluded to the fact of an ex-governor of a state accepting a subordinate station in one of our departments, or in the custom-house. But whether the sub-treasury bill should pass or no, the thing it proposes to authorize did already exist in fact; and its effect had been, by paying government officers in gold and silver, to raise, virtually, the salaries they received, and in the same proportion to diminish the means enjoyed by the debtor class in the community to pay their debts. The reduction was, therefore, perfectly fair; and if excessive banking was hereafter to be curtailed, the reduction ought, of right, to be permanent. He was content, at present, to make it a temporary arrangement.

Mr. Mercer, though not disapproving the gentleman's object, could not support his motion, as it was not according to usage to reduce salaries by an appropriation bill; it ought to be done, if at all, by law.

Mr. Reed regretted the debate; but how could it be avoided? Which was the proper place and the fitting opportunity to animadvert upon the measures of the administration, and the extravagances of the government, if not upon the appropriation bills? He referred to abuses in the post office department, and in the proportion of collectors' salaries; but could not support Mr. Bell's proposal to reduce all in the same proportion; some ought to be reduced one half, but others should not be diminished at all.

Mr. Williams, of N. C. thought it according to law and usage to reduce salaries as well by an appropriation bill as in any other manner.

Mr. Bell remonstrated with warmth against Mr. Mercer's position. The appropriation bills were the great citadels of the people, in resisting the oppressions of government. This had been admitted even in aristocratic, monarchical England; how much more should the doctrine be cherished under our own free government! He lamented that it seemed his fate always to be resisted by his own political friends and allies.

Mr. Mercer explained. He did not deny the naked power, but only the previous usage of the government.

The question being put on Mr. Bell's amendment, it was rejected.

The committee then rose, and reported the bill, and the house adjourned.

Friday, March 23. Mr. McKennan offered a resolution, fixing Monday next, at two o'clock, for the choice of a doorkeeper, vice Overton Carr, esq. deceased.

Mr. Lewis Williams moved to postpone the consideration of the resolution until Monday week.

Mr. Wm. Cost Johnson, suggesting that the committee on accounts intended to make some proposition regarding the police of the house, named next Wednesday.

Mr. Boon proposed to postpone the further consideration of the resolution until the first Monday in December next.

The latter motion, having precedence, was decided in the negative. Mr. Williams's motion, to postpone the consideration of the resolution till Monday week, was agreed to.

The following among other reports from committees, were made by Mr. Cambreleng, from the committee of ways and means, reported a bill to authorize the issuing of treasury notes.

This bill being read twice—

Mr. Cambreleng said that a report accompanied it, disclosing the necessity for the adoption of the measure recommended, and this report, with the bill, he moved to have referred to the committee of the whole, and that both be printed; which was ordered.

Mr. Sergeant presented a report of the views of the minority of the committee of ways and means in relation to the sub-treasury bill. He moved its printing, and reference to the committee of the whole, to which that of the majority had already been referred. Ordered accordingly.

Mr. Rives, of Virginia, moved that 10,000 extra copies of each report be printed; which motion prevailed.

[We will publish the bill of the committee, with both reports in the next "REGISTER."]

A number of memorials, &c. were presented and referred.

Mr. Hall of Vermont, sent to the chair a statement from the "Globe," in reference to a former vote on the sub-treasury bill, and went into an explanation in reference to it, for all which we will try and find room in our next.

The resolution of Mr. W. Cost Johnson in relation to this subject, and upon which the mover had occupied the morning hour for several days, coming up in order—

Mr. Lawler, of Alabama, took the floor in reply to the remarks of Mr. Johnson, and occupied it till the expiration of the morning hour, without concluding. [These remarks, as well as those of Mr. Johnson, will be given hereafter.]

The Speaker laid before the house a letter from the secretary of war, in reply to the resolution of the house of the 19th inst. calling for a copy of the answer to a letter of gen. Jesup, of the 20th December, 1837.

The secretary states, that the letter of gen. Jesup did not, in the opinion of the department, require any reply, and consequently was not answered.

Also, a letter from the secretary of war, transmitting copies of papers relating to the title of the United States to Friend's Ore Bank, near Harper's Ferry, required by the resolution of the 19th instant.

Also, a letter from the secretary of war, transmitting a report from the commissioner of indian affairs, accompanied by copies of a contract made between gen. Jesup, certain creek chiefs, and J. C. Watson, & co.

Also, a letter from the secretary of the treasury, transmitting a report from the director of the mint at Philadelphia, containing the information called for by the resolution of the house of the 5th inst. relative to the cost of erecting and establishing the principal mint and its branches, fixtures, &c.

The bill, making appropriation for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the government for the current year, again came up for consideration, as amended in committee of the whole.

After several amendments had been adopted, and while the consideration of the items of the appropriation for the post office department were under consideration,

Mr. Cambreleng proposed an amendment to this section, by which the specifications were to be stricken out, and the appropriation for all the items there named were to be stated collectively, with the aggregate of the sums affixed thereto. This amendment, together with a communication from the post office department, in relation to the subject, he moved to have printed; which being ordered, he was about to propose an adjournment, when

Mr. Underwood gave notice of an amendment it was his intention to offer to the bill, whereby the salaries of government officers, employed in the various states, were to be reduced, and restricted to the amount of salaries received by the judicial officers of those states.

The Chair said that an amendment to an amendment, (moved by Mr. Cambreleng,) was pending; and that any other amendment was of course, at that moment, not in order.

Mr. Underwood had intended to give notice only of his intention to offer the proposition he had read. He would be glad to have the opinion of the chair on the question of order, supposing the amendment in time.

The Speaker said that he had no difficulty in making up his opinion on that point. Under the rules, he considered the amendment proposed to be decidedly not in order.

Mr. Underwood. Then of course it is of no use for me to move for its printing.

Pending Mr. Cambreleng's proposition to amend the amendment, (to wit, the above section,) the house, on motion, adjourned, at half past four o'clock.

Saturday, March 24. Among the reports presented was the following by Mr. Patton from the library, which was read and postponed to Tuesday next, after Mr. McKay of North Carolina, had given notice that he would oppose it.

Resolved, That the clerk of the house of representatives be directed to subscribe for ten numbers of "Niles's Register," for each member of the house, to be delivered once a week; provided the editor of said Register will agree to publish in, or as a part of said work, at least once a week, under the direction of the clerk of the house, the journals of the house, with the yeas and nays on all questions. Provided, further, that the editor of said Register will also agree to publish at the end of every session of congress, under the direction of the said officer of the house, a supplement to said work, containing all the laws passed thereat, and treaties ratified by the senate, to which shall be prefixed a copious index, to be approved of by said officer, and furnish one copy thereof, free of charge, to each member of congress for the time being.

A letter of the secretary of war, transmitting copies of papers relating to the title of the United States to Friends' Ore Bank, near Harper's Ferry, required by the resolution of the 19th instant, was laid before the house yesterday, and, with the papers, was referred to the select committee on the national foundry.

To-day, Mr. Mercer moved a re-consideration of the vote (which prevailed,) for the purpose of moving the reference of the subject to the committee on the judiciary; inasmuch as there was a question of legal title involved in it.

Mr. McClure was in favor of the reference as made yesterday. There was no question of title involved.

Mr. Thomas and W. Cost Johnson were in favor of the reference proposed by Mr. Mercer, whose motion prevailed.

The Speaker laid before the house a communication from the secretary of war, transmitting a report from the acting quarter master general, in reply to a resolution of the 5th instant, requiring various information respecting the measures taken to carry into effect the act of July 2, 1836, authorizing the laying out of a military road along the western frontier, and the erection of posts thereon.

The Speaker also laid before the house a letter from the secretary of war, transmitting the report and estimates of lieut. Stockton, superintendent of public works of Michigan city and St. Joseph's, required by the resolution of the house of the 19th.

Mr. Cambreleng moved that the house take up the general appropriation bill.

Mr. Rice Garland claimed the day for the consideration of private claims, under the rules of the house. About six hundred bills were to be acted on; and it was not, in his opinion, doing justice to the country to postpone the consideration of that business.

But the house, on motion of Mr. Cambreleng, decided that the rules be suspended—Yeas 94, noes 39.

The house then took up the general appropriation bill, the amendment moved yesterday by Mr. Cambreleng to the section in reference to the post office department being under consideration, Mr. Adams arose and commented at some length upon the amendment and "the extraordinary document" from the postmaster general in which it was recommended; which went to the annihilation of every thing like specifications or appropriations. We will give place to Mr. A.'s remarks hereafter.

The amendment was also opposed by Messrs. Whittlesey, Tillinghast, Ewing, and Rice Garland, and advocated by Messrs. Cambreleng and Connor. Finally, the amendment of Mr. Cambreleng was rejected—yeas 64, noes 66, and the amendment reported by the committee of the whole, agreed to.

A motion of Mr. Robertson to strike out the item of $40,000 for miscellaneous expenses was rejected.

Mr. Rariden moved to recommit the bill to the committee of the whole on the state of the union, with instructions to strike out $225,000 for stationery, &c. for the house, and insert $273,000, so as to cover an appropriation to pay for printed debates and documents ordered to be supplied to the members.

On this motion a call of the house was moved by Mr. Cambreleng, and refused; when, before taking the question, and after a resolution had been adopted, on motion of Mr. Bell, calling for information on the subject of treasury notes,

The house adjourned.

Monday, March 26 A large number of petitions were presented, and referred.

The following among other resolutions were offered:

On motion of Mr. Ogle,

Resolved, That the secretary of state of the United States be directed to communicate to this house the names of all ministers and other diplomatic agents of the United States in foreign countries on the 4th March, 1829; the names and grade of all who have been recalled since that date; the names, grade, and date of subsequent appointments; the several periods of service of the persons so appointed; the sum allowed to each for such service respectively, as well as the amount of contingent expenses paid to each.

On motion of Mr. Sergeant,

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of encouraging and aiding meteorological observations throughout the United States.

The bill for the restoration of certain courts to the western district of Virginia, which had passed the house, came up, as amended, in a single particular, from the senate.

Mr. Garland, of Virginia, moved that the house do disagree with the senate in its amendment; which motion prevailed.

The Speaker laid before the house a communication from the secretary of the treasury, in answer to a resolution of the 19th instant, directing the secretary to report the names of such of the deposit banks as have availed themselves of the benefits of the first section of the act of the 12th of October last, by giving the requisite security, &c.

The house then, upon motion, resumed the consideration of the general appropriation bill.

Mr. Rariden moved to recommit the bill to the committee of the whole, with instructions to report an amendment, striking out $225,000 for stationery, &c. for the house, and inserting $273,000, so as to cover an appropriation to pay for printed debates and documents, ordered to be supplied to the members.

Mr. Williams opposed this motion.

Mr. Cambreleng wished to know if the motion were in order.

The Speaker decided it to be in order.

Mr. Cambreleng appealed from the decision. He thought it clashed with the requisitions of the 63d rule of the house. The object of the amendment was inconsistent with the whole course of the former action of the house in regard to supplying members with books.

The Speaker defended his decision. There was nothing in the pending proposition that looked like the object alluded to by the gentleman last up. It was a simple proposition to amend that section of the bill which appropriates money for the contingent fund.

Mr. Cambreleng, at the suggestion of Mr. Howard, withdrew his appeal.

Mr. Cushman moved the previous question (which would be on the engrossment of the bill, cutting off the motion to commit.)

Upon seconding this motion, by tellers, the division was—yeas 47, noes not counted. So there was no second.

Upon the motion of Mr. Rariden to recommit, the vote (the yeas and nays having been ordered,) was as follows—Yeas 71, noes 96. So the motion to recommit the bill was rejected.

Mr. Reed moved to amend by adding an appropriation of $52,040 for additional light-houses in certain states, being the same amendment as that member offered in committee of the whole.

Mr. Ingham proposed to amend this amendment by stating the several objects of the proposed additional appropriation, with the several specific sums to be appropriated to each.

Mr. Reed explained the proposed amendment, and showed the interest that the people in twenty states had in its adoption.

Mr. Whittlesey, of Ohio, made some remarks to show the great necessity which exists for the adoption of the proposed amendment, either in this or some other bill.

Mr. Ingham contended that this is the proper bill for the proposed appropriation. All these works have been ordered and begun, and no new original proposition was made. He urged the great importance and necessity of the amendment.

Mr. Cambreleng thought the light-house bill, or the supplemental appropriation bill, hereafter to be presented to the house, would be the proper bill into which to introduce the proposed amendment.

Mr. Cushman moved the previous question. On seconding this motion, the division was (by tellers) yeas 73, noes 42, no quorum voting. On the second count, the vote on seconding was as follows: yeas 72, noes 67; so there was a second; and the previous question being ordered, the question recurred on engrossing the bill for a third reading, which was carried; and the bill was read a third time.

Pending the question of its final passage Mr. Garland, of Louisiana, moved to recommit the bill to the committee of the whole, with instructions to report it with certain amendments; and on this motion he demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

Mr. Garland defended his proposition at some length. He dwelt particularly upon the custom of keeping up appropriations for temporary service of clerks, &c. in the different departments, and thought that custom should be discontinued.

Mr. Cambreleng opposed the motion, and defended the practice alluded to, so far as it had obtained, as a matter of absolute necessity, under the circumstances of those cases in which it did so obtain.

Mr. Conner demanded the previous question, on seconding which the following division (by tellers) took place: yeas 69, noes 57. So the previous question was seconded, and the house decided that the main question be put, which being done, the bill was passed, and ordered to be sent to the senate for concurrence.

At 5 o'clock the house adjourned.

Tuesday, March 27. Mr. Paynter, of Pennsylvania, presented a petition from a number of citizens of Philadelphia on the subject of the late duel, which was referred to the select committee on that subject.

The report of the library committee, in relation to Niles' Register, coming up in order, the report was read at the clerk's table.

Mr. Patton, from the committee, explained and defended the report, arguing to show that the usual objections to the purchase and distribution of books among the members did not apply in this case, inasmuch as a number of copies were proposed to be furnished to each member, not for his own personal advantages, but for distribution among his constituents. The effect of the measure would be to disseminate full copies of the house journal and of all the laws to 6,000 persons, at the aggregate expense of $5,000 per annum. The publication of the laws alone, in newspaper and in pamphlet form, and for the use of the officers of the government costs now three times that sum. The additional expense to the editor would nearly equal the whole amount of subscription now proposed; but the additional popularity of his paper was deemed by him a sufficient inducement. The subscription, therefore, was not a gratuity either to him or to members of congress, but an expedient and cheap mode of disseminating useful information among the people generally. The journals of congress had never been, to this day, so published as to meet the spirit of the direction of the constitution on that subject.

Mr. Parker, of New York, opposed the resolution. The subscription would amount to $12,100*. If the resolution was to pass, he would move to strike out "Niles' Register" and insert "the Democratic Review." In conclusion, he moved to lay the resolution on the table, and demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and, being taken, stood as follows: Yeas 86, nays 79. So the resolution was laid on the table.

The following reports from standing committees of the house were received:

Mr. Whittlesey, from the committee of claims, made an unfavorable report upon the case of col. Joseph Brown.

Mr. Smith, from the committee on commerce, reported a bill making appropriations for the erection of custom-houses at New Orleans, Philadelphia, and Savannah.

Mr. Sherrod Williams moved a reconsideration of the vote by which the house laid the report of the library committee on the table.

Mr. Boon moved to lay this motion on the table, and demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and resulted as follows: Yeas 88, nays 84. So the motion of Mr. Boon was decided in the affirmative.

The Speaker laid before the house a letter from the secretary of the treasury, transmitting a supplement to the annual report of the commissioner of the general land office, in relation to the preservation of the evidences of the surveys of the public lands in charge of the surveyor general; which was referred to the committee on public lands, and ordered to be printed.

The Chair having reported to the house, among other senate bills sent to the house for concurrence, the bill known by the name of the sub-treasury bill—

Mr. Cambreleng moved that that bill be referred to the committee of ways and means.

Mr. Pickens said that, before that motion should be acted upon, he desired, considering the great importance of the subject, to be informed as to one or two preliminary points. He must apologise to the house for thus interposing, nor should he have done it, but for an article which appeared in the official paper of this morning, which seemed to him to have an ominous bearing. He desired to know from the chairman of the committee of ways and means whether it was the intention of that committee to give this bill from the senate any, the least, degree of preference over a bill on the same subject, which had been reported by that committee to this house? In the article he had alluded to, he perceived there was an intimation that perhaps some of the obnoxious features might be stricken from the bill, or the same purpose accomplished by having an independent or supplementary bill. In the whole article there was not the slightest reference to the bill of house. Now, Mr. P. considered the entire subject as one peculiarly within the jurisdiction of the house; and on that ground alone, if on no other, he should prefer that the action of this body should be had on its own bill, rather than on that from the other legislative branch. He anxiously desired to know which of the two bills was to have priority? He put this inquiry honestly, for information, not having had the slightest communication or concert with the honorable chairman on the matter. He thought the information he asked for due to the house and to the country. He wanted to know whether this emulated thing, which, though in the shape of a man, was destitute of all manliness, and all the spirit of a man—a eunuch, in all its attributes—was to be preferred to the house bill on the same subject.

Mr. Cambreleng would answer the gentleman most cheerfully. For himself, as a member of the committee of ways and means, and he thought he could almost answer for every one of his colleagues on that committee, that he and they did infinitely prefer the bill reported to this house to the bill of the senate. They had seriously and thoroughly examined all the provisions of the latter, and they had serious objections to many of its details; for some of its details besides those advocated by the gentleman from South Carolina, involving principles of very grave importance; and the bill reported from the committee of ways and means was, almost two-thirds of it, a new bill entirely. For one, he should not depart from one single section or feature of that bill, and should certainly feel it his duty, as a measure of this character should emanate from the house, to give the house bill the preference.

Mr. Cambreleng said that of course he did not mean to include those who were opposed to the measure.

Mr. Sergeant resumed. He, for one, certainly was not among those who "infinitely" preferred the bill of the house to that of the senate, for he really did not know which of them was the worst: and that was about the amount, at present, of any opinion he had on the matter. If the bill from the senate was what the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. Pickens) had stated it to be, it was a sort of thing to which treasure was often committed in some parts of the world; (a laugh;) and if he believed it to be really as impotent as that gentleman represented it to be, he should have less objection to it: but he could not but think it still possessed sufficient vigor to do much mischief. It was possible, for those who were entrusted, even with gold and silver, sometimes did great harm by betraying those who trusted them. The machinery proposed to be employed was the same in both bills: only by the one it was to be employed in keeping bank notes, and by the other, in keeping gold and silver, if we could get any. For himself, he had no "infinite preference" for either, but, on the contrary, was at a loss, as he had said, to determine which was the worst of the two.

Mr. Haynes here rose and said, that though he had not been expressly called upon, he would say that he had a decided preference for the bill from the committee of ways and means. He had a strong desire to answer the remarks of the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, but this was not the time. He then resumed his seat.

Mr. Patton said he was opposed to this untried experiment, in any of its forms; and he objected to the reference of this bill to the committee of ways and means, because it was wholly unnecessary. The subject had been twice referred to them, and the house had received, in the form of a bill, the result of their labors and meditations. It was extremely important to the best interests of the country that this question should be decided promptly; and it was his purpose, before he resumed his seat, to make a motion which, he hoped, would bring to the test what was the judgment of a majority of the house on the principle of this measure. In order to quiet the apprehensions of the country, which had been justly excited by the continued confidence of gentlemen in a measure which must be productive of extensive mischiefs to the great business community, aside from its relations as a political measure, the question ought to be decided promptly and speedily. This object could not be obtained save by a vote which, though not an actual rejection of the bill, should give a decisive indication of the opinion of a majority of the house in opposition to any and every bill which should contain the principle which distinguished this. He did not urge the fact that the chairman of the committee of ways and means had told the house that a majority of that committee had examined this bill and were opposed to it; because he did not desire that the vote upon his motion should depend on any difference of opinion as to particular details, and which did not reach the great principles of the measure.

Mr. P. said he was aware that there were gentlemen present who had various propositions which they were desirous of presenting to the house as substitutes for the bill, which went essentially to change, and some of them to defeat, its present provisions; and such gentlemen might, at first, feel opposed to the motion he was about to make. But he desired them to recollect that there were several other bills which would come up for discussion, under which they could debate at large this entire subject of the currency, and that, therefore, they had no good reason for opposing a motion to lay the present bill on the table, and thereby show to the country that there was a majority of the house of representatives decidedly opposed to the measure it proposed. Such a step would be attended with this additional advantage: as long as the friends of this bill retained the faintest hope of carrying it through, they would strenuously resist all substituted propositions which should go to attack the vitals of the measure; but if the house gave, at once, a decided indication that such a bill as this could not pass, they would then be prepared to transfer their support to the next best measure, if there were any such, to be resorted to with a view to the purification of the currency. With these views, he moved to lay this bill upon the table.

Mr. Glascok appealed to Mr. Patton, as he had now had an opportunity to make such remarks as he chose, not to prevent others from a reply; and he therefore hoped he would consent to withdraw the motion for that purpose.

Mr. Patton said that he had not discussed the bill.

Mr. Glascok pressed his request, and promised, if it were granted, to renew the motion to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. Patton, on that condition, consented, and withdrew the motion accordingly.

Mr. Glascok regretted exceedingly that this motion to lay on the table had been made at the present time; and he regretted the more to see the motion come from the quarter it did. The house was well apprised of the situation which the gentleman from Virginia occupied at the present time. It is well known that that gentleman had been provided for by his own state; and it is a question whether, whenever any action shall be had on this bill here, he will be representing the majority of his constituents, which an election, however, to fill his vacancy will test. But independent of these considerations, it is well known that at the present time one of the states of the union is unrepresented. It is well known that there are certain districts in different states unrepresented; and it is equally well known that at this present time, there were a large number of the representatives of the people absent, from the indisposition of their families and other causes, absent and necessarily absent of this city, and from the house. If we are to have this question tested, and fairly tested, let us have it taken when every member is in his seat. Where is the necessity of the motion which had been made by the gentleman from Virginia at this time? Has it been made because the gentleman is himself about to take a farewell from us all, and is it from such motives as these, that he now asks us to take this question, when he well knows there are many individuals friendly to this bill not present to vote, and are particularly anxious to do so? If the gentleman exercised that courtesy which is usual, on all great national questions, he would have delayed his motion until every member could be here in his place to represent his constituency. He asked the house, whether it was not best to act on whatever bill the committee of ways and means may report, at a time when there may be a full and fair attendance of the representatives of the people present. He knew not what effect this might have on the minds of others, but he was prepared to say for himself, that this movement, at the present crisis, was far from being such a one as he had expected from the gentleman from Virginia, for on all other occasions he had looked upon that gentleman as acting with candor and fairness. At this very moment there are some twenty or thirty members absent from their seats—in fact, it had been suggested by some gentlemen near him, that there were at least forty who were absent. No such proposition as this had been anticipated by those gentlemen, and it is a question on which it is expected by the whole country, that every member should be present to give his vote. He would ask the gentleman then, whether in order, that absent members might be present, and to have a full vote of the house on the question, he would not consent to withdraw his motion, and permit the bill to go to the committee of ways and means, and be reported upon by that committee, in order that some measure might be brought before the house, in order that the people of the country might see whether a majority of the house were not opposed to the principle contained in the bill: namely, the divorce of the government and banks. He knew there were some who were in favor of the principle of this measure, but who differed as to details, and all he asked was, that the country might be properly informed, whether there was, or was not, a majority in favor of the principle which he had referred to. On this subject, he must avail himself of the privilege he now had of showing the impression attempted to be made on the people of the "Old Dominion." A report had gone forth, stating that there were fifteen or twenty of a majority in this house opposed to the divorce. Then, sir, if the gentleman from Virginia intends that the people of his state shall be fairly informed on this important subject, let the question be brought up fairly, and let us have such a vote as will truly test the principle. Do this, and he [Mr. G.] had nothing to fear; and so far as it was concerned, he hesitated not in giving it as his decided opinion that there was a majority in favor of a divorce of government and banks, notwithstanding all that had been said in certain papers to the contrary.

Mr. Mercer rose to order. He wished to know whether the remarks of the gentleman were pertinent to the question under consideration.

The Chair was of opinion that the gentleman from Georgia, as well as the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. Patton,] had not confined themselves strictly to the question pending. Mr. Glascok, in conclusion, would only say that he regretted that this motion had been made, as it was an evidence of unfairness which he little expected from the gentleman from Virginia. He should renew the motion, as he had pledged himself to do it, but he did it with the greatest reluctance, because whatever vote was now taken could not be considered a fair test of the question. He looked upon the motion as an act of illiberality towards the absent members, and as an act of injustice to the states and districts which were now unrepresented, and from causes well known to all. Mr. G. then renewed the motion to lay on the table. Mr. Adams hoped the gentleman would withdraw this motion, so that his remarks might be answered. Mr. Glascok said he would not do this, unless the gentleman from Virginia and others agreed to have it withdrawn for a general discussion of the subject. Mr. Cushman called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered. Mr. Filmore moved a call of the house, which was ordered.

The call was then proceeded in for some time, when Mr. Cushman moved that it be further dispensed with.

Mr. Patton said he hoped the motion would not prevail, especially after the very rude reply of the gentleman from Georgia, and the allusions in which that gentleman had indulged, and which he must pronounce to be wholly unfounded. Mr. Patton had not taken the least pains to ascertain who were absent and who were present; and he desired the call should proceed with the express view of ascertaining who were absent; and if it should be found that any injustice to any gentleman would result from the motion he had made, he should be entirely willing to withdraw it, so far as depended on him; though he would not ask the gentleman from Georgia to withdraw it, after the rude and uncourteous reply of that gentleman.

Mr. Duncan, with some emotion, wanted to know why others could not have withdrawn it?

Mr. Pickens said that he hoped the motion of the gentleman from New Hampshire (Mr. Cushman) would prevail. This could not, under the circumstances, be considered as a test vote on the general question.

Mr. Grennell demanded the yeas and nays on the motion to suspend further proceeding in the call, which, being taken, were—Yeas 92, nays 94; so the motion was negatived, and the call proceeded.

The doors of the house were closed.

The absentees having then, in part, been called, and having nearly all been excused,

Mr. Harlan moved that farther proceedings be suspended; which was agreed to; and the doors were opened.

The question was thereupon put from the chair on laying the senate's sub-treasury bill upon the table, and decided in the affirmative by yeas and nays as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Alexander, H. Allen, J. W. Allen, Aycrigg, Bell, Biddle, Bond, W. B. Calhoun, J. Calhoun, Wm. B. Campbell, W. B. So the bill was laid upon the table.

Mr. Gray, of New York, gave notice of a motion to reconsider this vote.

Various senate bills having been read and referred, and several house bills having received their third reading and passed,

The house went into committee of the whole on the state of the union, (Mr. Dromgoole in the chair,) when Mr. Cambreleng moved the consideration of the bill directing a transfer of moneys, unclaimed by pensioners, to the treasury; which was passed through committee without opposition, read a third time in the house and passed.

The committee then took up the military appropriation bill; which was passed through committee without amendment, and reported to the house.

The house then adjourned.

Wednesday, March 23. A number of memorials were presented on the subject of the late duel, and referred to the select committee on the subject.

Among the bills reported was one by Mr. Whittlesey, from the committee on claims, to establish a board of commissioners to examine and decide certain claims against the United States; which was twice read, referred to a committee of the whole, and made the special order of the day for Friday week.

After some business of minor importance,

Mr. Bell, from the committee on Indian affairs, moved that that committee be discharged from the consideration of the memorial of John Ross and others, remonstrating against the Cherokee treaty of 1836, and that the said memorial do lie upon the table.

After a debate, of which a brief notice is necessarily deferred to-day, the motion of Mr. Bell was agreed to.

The residue of the day was spent in consideration, in committee of the whole, of the military appropriation bill; which was still left in the committee of the whole when the committee rose, and

The house adjourned.

Thursday, March 29. Messrs. Adams, Birdsall, and De Graff, presented memorials in relation to the late duel, which were referred to the select committee on this subject.

Reports of committees were next called for, when the following, among others were presented.

Mr. Coles, from the committee on military affairs, reported a bill to authorize, for a limited time, two additional clerks in the office of the commissary general of subsistence; and against the resolution of the house of the 6th instant, relative to assimilated pay of officers of the army and navy.

Mr. Lincoln, from the committee on the public buildings, reported a bill providing for the removal of the walls of the treasury building, and for the erection of a fire-proof building for the post office department.

On motion of Mr. Craig,

Resolved, That the committee on revolutionary claims be instructed to inquire into the expediency of placing the officers of the United States navy, engaged in the war of the revolution, on the same footing in respect to commutation, bounty land, and half-pay, with the officers of the army of the revolution.

Mr. Howard, from the committee on foreign affairs, moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That the bill "to provide for the satisfaction of claims due to certain American citizens for spoliations committed on their commerce prior to the 31st of July, 1801," be taken up for consideration at the hour of one o'clock on Friday and Saturday, the 18th and 14th days of April next.

Mr. Cambreleng opposed the resolution, and called for the yeas and nays upon agreeing to it.

After a remark or two from Messrs. Mercer and Williams, of North Carolina, the question was put, and the resolution was rejected by yeas and nays, as follows, viz. Yeas 79, nays 62, (not two-thirds.)

Mr. Lincoln moved that the bill providing for the removal of the walls of the new treasury building, and for the erection of a fire-proof building for the post office department on the site of that recently destroyed by fire, be made the order of the day for Tuesday next. (The bill proposes an appropriation of $150,000, and directs the use of the old materials in the construction of the new building.)

Mr. Cambreleng remonstrated, and Mr. Lincoln modified his motion so as to refer the bill to the committee of the whole on the state of the union; in which form it was agreed to.

On a motion made by Mr. Hopkins, of Va., to reconsider the adoption of Mr. Slade's resolution calling on the land office for certain information touching the pre-emption laws and the sales of lands in the different states and territories, a brief discussion arose, in which Messrs. Slade, Hopkins, of Va., Lyon, of Ala., Boon, of Indiana, and Williams, of North Carolina, took part. In the course of this discussion—

Mr. Lyon, of Alabama, said the motion to reconsider the vote of the house on the adoption of the resolution under consideration was made at his instance, and he would state the reasons why, in his opinion, the resolution, in its present form, ought not to be adopted. If the mover would modify it so as to call for the aggregate quantity of land disposed of under the several pre-emption laws, he would willingly vote for it. But if the call is made so as to require a report of the particular quantity disposed of in each state and territory under each one of the several pre-emption laws heretofore passed, it would, in his judgment, impose unnecessary labor upon the land office, and interfere with the disposition of other more important matters of business.

He had no objection whatever to a full report upon each and all the branches of inquiry embraced in the resolution; but he could see no reason for requiring information as to the particular quantity of land disposed of under each of the several laws, embracing a period of 15 or 20 years. He supposed the object of the mover would be attained by a report showing the aggregate quantity sold under the pre-emption system since it was commenced, but if the report is to designate the particular quantity under each law, an examination would have to be gone into of the returns made by registers and receivers for many years past, and he was convinced that this examination would require much time and occupy a large number of the clerks of the office, to the exclusion of other necessary business. All the pre-emption laws, he believed, granted to settlers the same quantity of land 160 acres, and he saw no particular benefit to result from the labor and delay necessary to ascertain the quantity sold under each law. He hoped, therefore, the vote of the house would be considered, and the resolution modified.

He said a call had already been made for information as to the quantity of public and heretofore sold, the quantity remaining unsold in each state and territory, &c. and his only object was that the present call should be confined to necessary information, and he believed a report showing the quantity of land sold under the pre-emption system, and the quantity disposed of under the auction system, would be sufficient for all useful purposes. He said his constituents had complained, in some instances, of the delay which had occurred in issuing their patents, and in transacting other matters of business, in which they were interested, at the general land office; and if such calls as the one embraced by the resolution before the house are made, requiring, as he thought, unnecessary detail, there would be still greater delay in transacting the ordinary and necessary business of the office. For this reason alone he desired the resolution to be modified.

The resolution was opposed on the ground of the vast amount of labor required by the resolution to no valuable purpose. An answer to this call would, of itself alone, occupy the whole force of the land office more than two months.

Mr. Slade advocated it as necessary to expose the system which was growing up in the management of our public lands, and whereby the sales of land were likely to be in the end, wholly superseded by the pre-emption laws.

The reconsideration did not prevail.

The Speaker laid before the house a letter from the secretary of the treasury, in obedience to the resolution of the 24th inst. relative to the treasury notes, &c. Of the contents of this letter, the following is an abstract:

Amount of notes issued on the 24th instant was	$7,116,683 75
Amount received in payment of public dues to 24th instant	3,241,000
Amount of moneys received on account of customs during last quarter of 1837 was	2,115,958 78
On account of public lands, same time	901,857 99

Amount of moneys on account of customs, first quarter of the present year, about

2,560,000

On account of public lands, same time

384,560

Whole amount of money in the treasury available is, nominally

2,299,544 00

But deducting $592,212, which belongs to certain trust funds, and 400,000, which is deposited in the mint, and the balance available is

1,307,332 00

The house then again went into committee of the whole on the state of the union, (Mr. Dromgoole in the chair,) on

The bill having been gone through in the course of the sitting, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read a third time, passed, and sent the senate for concurrence.

The house began on the navy appropriation bill, and occupied the remainder of the day's sitting upon it.

The question pending when the house adjourned was upon a motion of Mr. Montgomery, of North Carolina, to recommit the bill for the purpose of striking out so much of it as proposes appropriations for the expenses of the exploring expedition. In the course of debate on this motion, Mr. W. intimated a purpose to move such amendments as would convert the exploring squadron into a squadron for coast survey.

And then the house adjourned.

Villainy Extra. The Detroit Daily Advertiser of the 12th inst. states that on the Saturday evening preceding, a number of vagabonds thought proper to amuse themselves by firing muskets and pistols at the town or village of Windsor, on the Canada side, from which the fire was returned. Governor Mason was quickly on the spot, and brought the folly to a close. Whether any mischief was done at Windsor was not known. Some of the balls fired there, struck the buildings on the Detroit side. We do not find that any body was arrested.

The United States frigate Constitution, commodore Elliott, was at Mahon when the Shark sailed. The United States, captain Wilkinson, was at Cadiz, January 19. All well.

They also ordered the bill for establishing the great south-western railroad, to be engrossed."

PHILADELPHIA BANKS. The Philadelphia U. S. Gazette of Thursday says:—"We understand that the banks in the city of Philadelphia and districts have unanimously decided that it is inexpedient to send delegates to the adjourned meeting at New York of the bank convention, on the 11th of this month."

At a meeting of the directors of the Suffolk bank, held at 1 o'clock, P. M. on Saturday, 31st March, 1838, it was Voted, That it is the unanimous opinion of the board that it is inexpedient for the banks in Boston to resume specie payments, unless the banks in New York and Philadelphia will resume at the same time.

Voted, That the cashier be requested to furnish the delegates appointed to attend the convention, to be held at New York on the 11th proximo, with a copy of the foregoing vote, and to send a copy of the same to each of the banks in this city.

The same paper adds that "there is every reason to believe the convention will fix upon some certain day for resumption. Perhaps it will not be as early as the banks of New York have specified—possibly, it may be some months later, &c."

THE MANDAMUS. In conformity with the decision of the supreme court of the United States in the case of Stockton & Stokes relators, against the postmaster general, a writ of mandamus was on Friday last, issued by the circuit court for the District of Columbia, returnable on Tuesday the 3d inst. To that writ, return was made to the court on Tuesday, by the following endorsement upon the copy of the writ served upon the postmaster general:

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT, April 3, 1838.
Having communicated the awards of the solicitor of the treasury, referred to in the within writ, to the auditor of the treasury, for the post office department, who has the legal custody of the books in which the accounts of this department are kept, I have received from him official information that the balance of said awards, viz. thirty-nine thousand four hundred and seventy-two dollars and forty-seven cents, ($39,472 47,) has been entered to the credit of the claimants on said books.

AMOS KENDALL, postmaster general.

This being read in court—
Mr. R. S. Cox, for the plaintiffs, gave notice that he should on the following day move to quash the return as unsatisfactory and insufficient.

[In the course of the day the plaintiffs received at the treasury the principal amount of the award made under the act of congress, by the solicitor of the treasury. So, to this extent, the act of congress, and the decree of the circuit court, affirmed by the supreme court, have at length been carried into effect, though not respected, as it was the duty of the postmaster general, in common with all other good and orderly citizens of the United States, to have respected, first the act of congress; secondly, the mandamus of the circuit court; and, thirdly, the decision of the highest judicial tribunal.]

Yesterday, in accordance with the notice given, Mr. Cox made a motion to quash the return upon the writ of mandamus against the postmaster general.

The manner of the return, Mr. C. argued (in supporting this motion) was a gross contempt of court; for the postmaster general puts himself, in his reply to the writ, on the very ground over-ruled by this court, and abandoned by his own counsel before the supreme court. The court, he said, could hardly consider the return sufficient, without admitting that the postmaster general was right in his original ground, and that the court was wrong in deciding against it. That the tenor of this reply on the part of the postmaster general was entirely inconsistent with his own previous action: for that when the award of the solicitor of the treasury, under the act of congress, first came into his hands, he undertook to give instructions how, and to what extent, the award should be executed by the auditor; and it was not until a fortnight after the decision of the supreme court in the case, that he found out he had nothing to do with it, and that the auditor had exclusive control over it. Mr. C. further suggested that, with regard to this matter, the postmaster general had not certified any one thing which the writ of mandamus required him to certify. This, however, he said, was a matter for the court itself to decide upon, in which the relators had no interest, further than to see the dignity of the court sustained.

On the part of the relators, he maintained that in point of substance the return was wholly insufficient because, it had been now only certified that a balance was due which had been reported to be due sixteen or seventeen months ago, say in November, 1836. The award made by the solicitor comprehended the interest due on the balance up to the date of the award. The postmaster general objected to the award of the solicitor, that he had transcended the authority of the act of congress, and one of the specific objections was the allowing of interest on these claims. This court, by deciding that the solicitor had not transcended his jurisdiction, and the supreme court by the unanimous adoption of the same doctrine, had decided that the plaintiffs were entitled to interest, and, consequently, the payments that have been made, including interest only to November, 1836, are payments on account, and not in full compliance with the writ of mandamus.

For these and other reasons, Mr. Cox moved to quash the return as insufficient.

The court took time to consider the motion.

GEN. SCOTT. The Toronto Patriot contains a copy of a despatch from sir Francis B. Head, written previous to his departure from Upper Canada, to the British minister at Washington. The intemperate spirit it displays will, we are convinced, be properly rebuked by his government, the prime minister, lord Melbourne, having already found it necessary, in the house of lords, to plead in extenuation of the language of a former communication of sir Francis Head, his fondness for an epigrammatic style of writing. It is not required of us to defend the conduct of gen. Scott against the censures of a foreigner. The approval of his country, which it has and ever had, will be all-sufficient for him; we therefore confine ourselves, in this respect, to the publication of the following from the pen of the gallant col. Worth [N. Y. Courier and Enquirer.

"The Toronto Patriot, of the 23d instant, publishes a letter from his excellency the late lieutenant governor of Upper Canada, to the minister of the British government, at Washington, in which the actions of major general Scott, during his personal superintendence of the military operations on the frontier, recently made in aid of the civil authorities, and in support of the laws, are severely criticised, and the motives of that distinguished officer called in question.

"In the same remarkable paper, his excellency is pleased to contrast and commend the acts of another officer, in connexion with the same service, who, of all men in this country, must derive the most pain from so unjust and unnatural a position.

"Having this moment, and for the first time, seen the letter of his excellency, that officer, while he volunteers no defence of conduct, on the part of his distinguished commander, which is so far from needing one, deems it due to truth, to justice, and to his personal honor, to say, that what his excellency has been pleased to visit with his commendation, was the mere and literal performance, by a subaltern, of the precise orders of his chief, major general Scott."

THE BILL FOR AN INDEPENDENT TREASURY.

The important bill to render the treasury independent of banks passed to-day by a majority of two votes.

We regret to see that it lost some of its warmest supporters, in consequence of one or two amendments, which were introduced before the vote was taken.

In order that the community may understand the effect of those amendments, and the provisions of the bill as it now stands, a few explanatory remarks may be useful.

When most of the banks in the country, last spring suspended specie payments, and thus withheld the public money, a separation of the keeping of that money in future from the use and discounts of the banks appeared to have become indispensable, not only for its safety, but for the prompt, efficient, and faithful payment of the public creditors.

This was the leading object to be attained. The bill reported last September, at the special session, applied to this purpose alone. It provided for a total divorce between the treasury and the banks, so far as regarded the use of the public money, and there stopped.

Another desirable object to be attained was an improvement in the currency, as well as in the mode of keeping the public money.

Many were anxious to increase still more the specie portion of it, and in order to effect that gradually and extensively, to introduce legal provisions, rendering it imperative, in time, to receive only specie in payment of all public dues.

This would leave the states and individuals to continue to receive what they deemed proper, but would take away the discretion before exercised by the public officers of the general government, under the acts of congress of 1789 and 1820, as well as the joint resolution of 1816, to receive bank paper when deemed safe.

Accordingly, Mr. Calhoun, instead of offering a separate bill for that object, moved an amendment to the bill for keeping the public money, which directed that the kind of money received should, in time, be specie alone.

This amendment then prevailed in the senate; but the bill, so amended, was laid on the table, and not acted on finally in the house of representatives.

At this session the committee reported the bill, incorporating into it a clause similar to that amendment, instead of leaving it to be offered as an amendment, or leaving the kind of money to be legislated on in a separate bill. The senate have now stricken that provision out.

This leaves the bill, on principle, as it originally stood in September, when first reported by the committee. It is confined entirely to the safe-keeping of the public money, or to the divorce between the treasury and banks.

The only exception to this remark is a new amendment offered by Mr. Webster, requiring that the same kind of money shall be received for all public dues, but not prescribing what that kind of money shall be. That is left to the former laws and resolutions of congress—construed, as they always have been, by the executive, the treasury, the United States Bank, and the attorney general, that it must be specie; except where congress has otherwise directed as to treasury notes, or United States bank notes, and where, in the opinion of the executive or the treasury department, some other medium was safe, and equivalent to specie.

We are free to say, that, in regard to this last topic, our own views are, that too much discretion is now confided to the executive, and that congress would act wisely to further limit and regulate that discretion.

We think there was much soundness in general Jackson's objections to Mr. Rives's bill on this point in 1837: that it did not explicitly state whether the choice as to the payment of bank notes or specie was to be given to the debtor, and thus the treasury be obliged to take, in Missouri, the bank notes of Delaware, though at such a distance, and much under par; or to be given to the public officer, and he be required to take bank notes only when at par where offered, and when convertible into specie without discount or delay.

Such, only, in our humble opinion, should have been any new regulation, as to bank notes. Such, and going further in future, and in gradual proportions, until the public dues are all conducted in a constitutional currency, we hope will be some new legislation at the present session, in a separate bill, or in connection with some other appropriate act. We know that inherent difficulties and differences of opinion exist on this point. We are charitable to others who disagree, and ask only a like courtesy in return.

As specie was not, by Mr. Calhoun's amendment, required absolutely to be taken at all till 1838, and then only in gradual proportions for five or six years, there is still ample time to legislate in favor of this or some similar measure at the present or the next session.

The mode of effecting the object is of little consequence, compared with the importance of the object itself.

But we sincerely hope that it will in due season be effected. We trust that a larger portion of specie will gradually and inflexibly be required in public payments. We have no doubt it would operate in a salutary manner on the whole currency of the country, and essentially tend to prevent over-issues and explosions.

The bill, as it now stands, reaches and cures one evil—the unnatural and injurious connection between the money in the treasury and the private loans of the banks. It is very perfect in that respect, and allows no special deposits to be made, except in specie or treasury notes. Frequent settlements with the banks of any of their notes taken, and not soon paid out, would tend to check excesses, and will doubtless be the practice.

But, with all due respect to the views of others from whom we have the misfortune to differ, we should be happy to see more specie in use, imperatively required by express law. We like the honest face of an eagle or half-eagle, and even of old Mr. Nathaniel Macon's favorite silver dollar.

We trust more will be done on this point, either in a separate bill, or by an amendment to some other bill, before congress adjourns.

Much will be gained by accomplishing one great object—the independent keeping of the public money. We feel gratified at the prospect of success in that, and are not inclined to under-estimate or reject one blessing, as to an independent treasury, because we are unable to obtain another, at the same moment, in respect to the currency.

But this other we have no doubt will be obtained soon, if not at this session. Public sentiment is aroused, and is, we believe, sound on that, as well as on the independent treasury. Whatever obstacles may be interposed by the management of interested politicians out of doors, or whatever honest doubts may be entertained as to the people's views by any of their representatives in either house, we can see a tide swelling over the whole country, and gradually reaching every hill and valley, in favor of a sound and constitutional currency. The public are sick to the heart of paper—paper—mere paper. They abhor depreciations and the whole race of shin-plasters, and want something solid, valuable and safe.

SUPPOSED SUB-TREASURY VOTE IN 1835.

Correction of error in the Globe of March 22, 1838.

In the house of representatives, March 23. Mr. Hall, of Vermont, having obtained leave of the house, sent to the chair the Globe of last evening (March 22) from which the clerk read as follows:

"On the 11th February, 1835, when the bill reported by the committee of ways and means for regulating the deposit of the money of the United States in certain local banks was before the house of representatives, Mr. Robertson moved that the bill be recommitted, with instructions to the committee of ways and means so to amend the same as to dispense with the agency or instrumentality of banks in the fiscal operations of the government.

"In favor of this motion the votes of the following gentlemen are recorded on the journal (page 359) in the affirmative:

"Messrs. John Q. Adams, Heman Allen, John J. Allen, Chilton Allan, Archer, Ashley, Banks, Barber, Barnitz, Barringer, Bates, Baylies, Beale, Beatty, Bell, Binney, Briggs, Burges, Campbell, Chambers, Chilton, Claiborne, Clarke, Clayton, Corwin, Crane, Crockett, Darlington, Davis, Davenport, Deberry, Denny, Dickson, Evans, Everett, Ewing, Filmore, Foster, Gamble, Garland, Gholson, Gordon, Gorham, Grayson, Grennell, Griffin, Hiland Hall, Hard, Hardin, Harper, Hazeltine, Heath, Hiester, William Jackson, Ebenezer Jackson, James, Henry Johnson, Seaborn Jones, Letcher, Lewis, Lincoln, Love, Martindale, Marshal, McComas, McKennan, Mercer, Milligan, Miner, Moore, Phillips, Pickens, Potts, Reed, Robertson, William B. Shepard, Slade, Spangler, Steele, William P. Taylor, Tompkins, Trumbull, Tweedy, Vance, Vinton, Watmough, Wilde, Williams, Wilson, Wise, and Young."

Mr. Hall said he would not ask for the further reading of the paragraph. The article proceeded to state that the gentlemen whose names had just been read, himself among the number, having thus, in 1835, voted in favor of dispensing with the agency of banks in the fiscal operations of the government, were now, in 1838, opposing a measure of the same character; and then followed a dissertation upon "federal patriotism," "federal consistency," &c. &c. with which it was unnecessary to trouble the house. Mr. H. said a statement similar to that in the Globe had been published in some of the papers in his own state, and his object now was to set the matter right before his constituents and the country. He never did, on that or any other occasion, give any such vote as that represented in the Globe. In order to meet the evidence fully, he would call for the reading of the journal, to which the article in the Globe referred. The journal was accordingly read by the clerk, as follows:

"The house resumed the consideration of the bill (No. 563) regulating the deposit of money of the United States in certain local banks. The question recurred on the motion made by Mr. Robertson, that the said bill be recommitted to the committee of ways and means, with instructions so to amend the same as to dispense with the agency or instrumentality of banks in the fiscal operations of the government.

And, after debate, the question was put on the motion made by Mr. Robertson for the recommitment of the bill, and it was decided in the negative—Yeas 91, nays 115."

Mr. H. said the journal might perhaps be considered sustaining the view taken by the Globe; but he should show that the journal, if it bore such a construction, was erroneous. The fact was, no vote whatever was taken on the instructions moved by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. Robertson,) but the vote which is recorded on the journal was taken on the naked question of recommitting the bill to the committee of ways and means—no vote whatever having been taken on the instructions.

Before the vote on Mr. Robertson's proposition was put, Mr. Filmore, of New York, required, as any member, by the rules of the house, had a right to do, that the question of commitment should be separated from the question of instructions, and, the question being divided, the votes for commitment were, yeas 91, nays 115; the 91 yeas being the same gentlemen whose names are given in the Globe. The motion to commit being lost, no question could possibly be put on the instructions. In proof of the facts just stated, Mr. H. read extracts from the three daily papers then published in Washington, giving an account of the proceedings of that day. The extracts were as follows:

"The question being on Mr. Robertson's motion to recommit the (deposit) bill to the committee of ways and means, with instructions, &c. Mr. Filmore asked for a division of the question to recommit with instructions. The question was then taken by yeas and nays, which had been previously ordered, on the motion to recommit the bill, and decided in the negative—Yeas 91, nays 115."—Globe, Feb. 12, 1835.

"Mr. Filmore called for a division of the question, and which, having been put on that part of the motion, viz: 'to recommit the bill,' the motion was rejected—Yeas 91, nays 115."—Telegraph, Feb. 12, 1835.

"Mr. Filmore now demanded a division of the question, and it was accordingly put; first, simply on recommitment, and decided by yeas and nays as follows, viz: Yeas 91, nays 115. So the house refused to recommit the bill."—Intelligencer, Feb. 12, 1835.

Mr. Hall said he had called the attention of the clerk of the house to this subject, who, on examination, had ascertained that a memorandum of the fact of Mr. Filmore's requiring a division had been made on the minute book kept at the clerk's desk on that day, but that, by inadvertence, a notice of the division was omitted to be inserted in writing out the journal. The facts he now stated would appear from a correspondence he had held with the clerk, which was now read as follows:

House of Representatives United States, December 19, 1837.

Sir: I have received your communication of this day's date. I handed it over for answer to Mr. Burch, the chief clerk of my office, who writes up the journal of the house.

Office House of Representatives United States, December 19, 1837.

Sir: In answer to the letter of the hon. Hiland Hall, of this date, addressed to you, and which you have referred to me, in which he states that "it appears from the printed journal of the house of February 11, 1835, the bill regulating the deposit of the money of the United States in certain local banks being under consideration, that a question was taken on the motion of Mr. Robertson that the said bill be recommitted to the committee of ways and means, with instructions so to amend the same as to dispense with the agency of banks; and that, on the question to recommit with such instructions, the yeas were 91, nays 115; and suggesting that there is some error in the printed journal, as he is confident he did not give such a vote, I make the following explanatory statement:

I have referred to the printed journal of the 11th of February, 1835, and find it stated that the house resumed the consideration of the bill mentioned by Mr. Hall, and that the question recurred on the motion made by Mr. Robertson on the preceding day, that the bill be recommitted to the committee of ways and means, with the instructions so to amend the same as to dispense with the agency or instrumentality of banks in the fiscal operations of the government, and that the question was put on the motion for "recommitment of the bill," and was decided as Mr. Hall has stated—Yeas 91, nays 115. The entry does not show, as is mentioned in Mr. Hall's letter, that the instructions were involved in the vote, nor was it intended to show it.

I have also referred to the short notes or minutes taken by you at the table in the house; from these it appears that immediately previous to the putting the question, Mr. Filmore, of New York, called for a division, so as that the question be put separately on recommitment and on the instructions.

Mr. Filmore's call for the division is not stated on the printed journal, but there it is distinctly stated that the question was on recommitment; that question failing, the separate question on the instructions could not, consequently, be put.

The only error, if error it is, is in the omission to set forth Mr. Filmore's call for the division; this is sometimes done, as the entries themselves commonly show the fact that a question had been divided; in the present case, the question is expressly stated to have been on the recommitment. If the question had involved more than the recommitment, the entry would have gone on to say, with the instructions aforesaid. If the question on the recommitment had been decided in the affirmative instead of the negative, the question would then have been, of course, put on the instructions; which would have made it apparent that the question had been divided. In writing up the journal, often at a late hour at night, the different views which it seems now may be taken of the subject did not occur to me; and hence, to save what I then deemed superfluous writing, the omission to enter the call for the division of the question.

Your obedient servant,
SAMUEL BURCH.

Col. WALTER S. FRANKLIN,
Clerk of the House of Reps. U. S.

Mr. H. did not wish to be understood as intending to cast the slightest imputation on the clerk. He had no doubt whatever that the omission was unintentional, and the explanation of the clerk was perfectly satisfactory. Nor did he wish to be misunderstood in any other particular. In making this explanation of his own vote, he did not mean to intimate an opinion that if, on the occasion referred to, he had voted to recommit the bill with the instructions, that it would necessarily follow he was in favor of passing a bill in conformity with the instructions. On the contrary, he knew that it was a legitimate and parliamentary mode of making opposition to a measure, to endeavor to amend it in such manner that it would lose the support of its original friends, and become unsatisfactory to all sides of the house. He might have given such vote, though opposed to a bill of the character specified in the instructions, as the most effectual means of defeating the bill then under consideration. And there were, doubtless, other grounds on which a vote on a collateral question of this description might be given, without any intention of supporting the bill when it had assumed its amended form. But he would not dwell on this matter.

Mr. H. said it was not his intention to occupy the time of the house in commenting on the evidence he had introduced to show the falsity of the statement in the Globe. He had shown, he trusted, to the entire satisfaction of the house, that in giving his vote on the 11th of February, 1835, in favor of recommitting a bill, to which he was opposed, to the committee which had reported it—the question being simply "shall the bill be committed?" he had not voted, as had been represented in that paper, "in favor of dispensing with the agency of banks in the fiscal operations of the government;" in fact, had not voted at all on that question, and for one of the best reasons in the world, that no such question had been put. The object he had in view being thus answered, he would detain the house no longer.

REPORT ON THE STATE OF THE TREASURY.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, MARCH 28, 1838.

Mr. Cambreleng, from the committee of ways and means, submitted the following report:

The committee of ways and means submit the following report on the probable receipts and expenditures for the year 1838:

By the act of October last, the ten millions of treasury notes authorized to be issued were made receivable in payment for public lands, and for duties. More than three millions of these notes have been already returned in lieu of revenue, and it is probable that, under the operation of this provision, a very large reduction will be made in the revenue of the present year, which must be provided for, either by an authority to reissue the treasury notes received, or by an issue of others in their place.

The Indian branch of the public service still calls, as it has done for some years past, for extraordinary appropriations for removal, subsistence, and hostilities. The annual estimates submitted by the secretary of the treasury in December last, embraced no estimate of the amount which would be required for preventing and suppressing Indian hostilities in 1838. There was drawn from the treasury during the last year for these expenditures $5,600,000, and of the million appropriated at this session for this branch of the service, $900,000 at least were paid for the arrearages of 1837; making $6,500,000 for that year. The estimates of the war department, already submitted to the house, for the expenses of preventing and suppressing Indian hostilities in 1838, amount to $5,235,000.—An extraordinary appropriation has been also required, and has been authorized, of $625,000, for the protection of our Canadian frontier. Notwithstanding these additional estimates, the current resources of the year would, with proper economy, be equal to all the demands upon the treasury, whether for ordinary or extraordinary purposes, but for two provisions of the treasury-note act referred to; the one authorizing their receipt in payment of public dues, and the other prohibiting the treasury from re-issuing them. The result is, that they are returned to the treasury almost as fast as they are issued; and, before the close of the year, the revenue might be thus reduced to the amount of $10,000,000.

If the treasury notes authorized by the act of October last were not receivable in payment of public dues, the following statements would exhibit the condition of our finances for the present year:

State of the Treasury on the 1st January last. The amount which stood, on that day, to the credit of the treasurer, exclusive of the $1,100,000 of unavailing funds of long standing, was

Deduct the drafts of the treasurer, prior to the 1st January, on the late deposit banks, and on all other depositories, on account of the above balance	1,514,723 42
Deposites with the States	28,101,644 91
	29,616,368 33

Balance undrawn for on Jan. 1, 1838

Composed of the following items:
Balance due from the late deposit banks	6,428,121 87
Deduct the drafts which had been drawn prior to the 1st January	1,011,757 36
	5,416,364 51

Amount in the treasury held in trust for indemnities, investments for Indian tribes, &c.	573,207 00
Balance, viz.

In the mint, for the special service of that establishment	385,560 92
Applicable to public expenditures	469,653 51

To prevent erroneous estimates, founded upon treasury statements which are apparently contradictory, it is proper to add that there are two dis-ting adjustments of this balance made at the department. The preceding statement includes all the returns of public money known to the treasurer on the 1st of January, and all his drafts prior to that date, whether they had been presented at the various depositories, or were still in circulation.—This gives the correct view of the balance which the treasurer could on that day draw for, and is made the basis of our financial estimates for each year. Subsequent to that adjustment, the amounts have been received from the various depositories to the end of the year, which exhibit a balance in favor of the treasury, including the deposits with the states, of $35,961,872 79, instead of $34,940,430 85; making an apparent difference of more than one million of dollars. This is easily explained. Of the drafts drawn by the treasurer before the 1st of January, and deducted in the foregoing statement, $740,000 had not been presented and paid prior to that date, and are consequently not charged in the accounts of the depositories, though credited by the treasurer as outstanding.—And there had been deposited before the 1st of January $280,000 of public money, of which no returns had been received by the treasurer when the balance was ascertained at the treasury, on the 1st of January last. These two items, amounting to $1,020,000, constitute the difference between the two statements. Our estimates must always be founded on the balance as ascertained at the treasury at any particular period, and not on the accounts of the depositories, which exclude all outstanding drafts, and include moneys not reported to the department.

It is also proper to state that there was to the credit of the post office department, on the 1st of January, $457,933 86; which under the act of 1836, is not blended with other money in the treasury, but is held for, and exclusively applied to, the service of that department.

Besides these resources, the treasury held four millions of postponed custom-house bonds, and six millions of United States bank bonds, exclusive of interest. These, with the balances in the treasury, in the mint, and due from the late deposit banks, made an aggregate of more than sixteen millions, independent of the unavailable twenty-eight millions deposited with the states.

The following are the estimated resources of the year:

Balance in the treasury, applicable to public expenditures, say	$500,000 00
Treasury notes, not issued on the 1st January last	7,000,000 00
Probable amount which may be received from the late deposit banks, exclusive of the amount drawn for prior to the 1st January, and includes the July installment	2,000,000 00
Bond of the bank of the United States, with interest due the 1st October	2,300,000 00
Custom-house bonds postponed	4,000,000 00
Revenue from customs	13,000,000 00
Revenue from lands	3,000,000 00
	$31,800,000 00

The first item of charges upon the treasury is the unexpended balances of appropriations for the preceding and former years, which had not been drawn from the treasury prior to the 1st of January last. Two different statements are made by the departments of these unexpended balances: one is made at the second comptroller's office, the other at the register's. The former includes the requisition as soon as they issue from the departments, the latter the warrants after they are issued upon the requisitions. The consequence is a constant and material variation. The statements of these unexpended balances, annually transmitted by the war and navy departments, are of the requisitions upon, and not of, money actually drawn from the treasury. They also embrace the balances which will have been unexpended for more than two years, and which go to the surplus fund at the close of the year. The register's statement exhibits the amount remaining actually undrawn from the treasury at the close of the year, and of the amount carried to the surplus fund; the former amounted to $16,628,845 65, and the latter to $648,450 24; leaving a balance of $16,080,395 41 of undrawn appropriations chargeable upon the treasury on the 1st day of January last.

Of which there will probably remain undrawn at the close of the year	11,000,000
Probable amount of charges upon the treasury in 1838	$32,230,000

If all the foregoing appropriations are authorized by congress, the demands upon the treasury might exceed the receipts about half a million of dollars, independent of the amount of treasury notes received in lieu of revenue. But the extraordinary amount of the unexpended balances of appropriations, makes it necessary to restrict new appropriations, as far as it may be practicable, to such amounts as may be expended within the year or early in the next. They have not been hitherto made sufficiently with a view to the current expenditure of the year. Large sums have been appropriated, whether the money would be drawn from the treasury in one or more years. At the present time, when almost all our officers are employed in active military service, many of our public works cannot be prosecuted with advantage. Some of these appropriations, if authorized, must consequently remain almost wholly unexpended during the present year. Some may, therefore, be suspended, and others reduced to the extent of one or two millions, without detriment to the public service, as it is impracticable, at this time, to devote to these branches of our expenditure the skill and talents of our most efficient officers.

With a very moderate reduction of the appropriations for the present year, it will only be necessary to provide means equal to the amount of treasury notes which have been and may be received at our custom-houses and land offices in lieu of revenue. It is not possible to estimate what amount may be thus returned to the treasury and cancelled. Of the six million eight hundred thousand dollars heretofore issued, upwards of three millions have been already paid in, three or four millions more may be, and it is possible that the whole ten millions might be returned to the treasury and cancelled before the end of the year. Those which bear a low rate of interest, amounting now to $4,500,000, will certainly be returned; besides others at five per cent., the term of which will have expired, when the interest ceases, according to the act of October last. Any sudden, though temporary revival of trade, creating a desire to make other investments, would throw almost the whole ten millions into the treasury. It would be unsafe, under such circumstances, not to authorize the notes issued, or to be hereafter issued, under the act of October last, to be again paid out, or to provide for an issue of treasury notes equal to the ten millions authorized by that act. The treasury may not require more than six or seven millions to replace the notes paid in and cancelled, but the authority should be extended to ten millions to meet any unexpected reduction in our receipts. There is no certainty that the late deposit banks will reduce their debt to the extent estimated; and in the present state of trade, it is impossible to make any sure calculations on the revenue from customs or public lands for the present year. The former is estimated at $13,000,000, the latter at $3,000,000. The receipts from both sources, in the first two months, were very considerable, and the treasury must depend almost entirely upon the revenue to be received in the last half of the year. Upon the income of the whole year from these sources no estimate can be made which can be relied upon with confidence.

It would appear to be most simple and economical to repeal the restriction in the act of October last, and permit the treasury to reissue the notes then authorized. But that act directed them to be cancelled when paid in, as some of them have been; and as the interest on the five per cent. notes ceases after twelve months, they would be unavailable. If it were otherwise, however, and they could be paid out or disposed of in any other manner, it would be inexpedient to authorize it, as they would be immediately returned to the treasury, rendering it necessary to issue them for the third time. Such a process of payments and receipts would be particularly embarrassing to the treasury, as the notes will soon bear no interest at all. The committee, therefore, recommend that authority be given to issue treasury notes to such an amount as the public exigency may require, not to exceed ten millions, at an interest not exceeding six per centum per annum, and payable, one-third of them in twelve months, one-third in eighteen months, and one-third in two years; to be disposed of only to supply the wants of the treasury, and as the money may be required. For their redemption, it is proposed to pledge the balances due from all the banks, together with the faith of the United States. The amount which will be payable by the late deposit banks in 1839, probably about four millions, including interest, and the bonds of the Bank of the United States, equal, with interest, to near five millions, payable in 1839, and 1840, will anticipate and be applied to the redemption of the treasury notes now proposed, without any additional charge upon the revenue of either of those years.

The committee respectfully submit a bill authorizing an issue of treasury notes, in case the public interests should require it, and to replace those which have been or may be received for public dues into the treasury, according to the provisions of the act of October last.

The following is a copy of the bill which accompanied the above report:

A bill to authorize the issuing of treasury notes.

Be it enacted, &c. That the president of the United States is hereby authorized to cause treasury notes for such sum or sums as the exigencies of the government may require, but not exceeding, in the whole amount of notes issued, the sum of ten millions of dollars, and of denominations not less than one hundred dollars for any one note, to be prepared, signed, and issued in the manner hereinafter provided.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the treasury notes, authorized to be issued by the first section of this act, shall be made payable or redeemable by the United States, one-third of them in twelve months, one-third in eighteen months, and one-third in two years from the dates on which they shall be issued, respectively; from which said dates, for the terms as aforesaid, and no longer, the said notes shall bear an interest not exceeding six per centum per annum, and shall be made payable to order, and transferred by delivery and assignment endorsed on the same. The payment of the said notes, herein provided for, and the interest which may be due thereon, shall be made at the treasury of the United States, to the holders of the said notes, respectively, upon presentment; and for the redemption of the same, the balances due the United States, by bond, or otherwise, from the Bank of the United States of Pennsylvania, and from the late deposit banks, together with the faith of the United States, are hereby solemnly pledged.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the treasury notes, authorized by this act, shall be issued at such times and in such amounts as the public exigencies may require, and shall be paid to the public creditors or disposed of in such manner as the secretary of the treasury, with the approbation of the president of the United States, may prescribe; and that the secretary of the treasury shall lay before congress, at the commencement of the next session, an account of all the money obtained by the sale of the said treasury notes, together with a statement of the rate or rates at which the same may have been sold.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the said treasury notes shall be prepared under the direction of the secretary of the treasury, and shall be signed, on behalf of the United States, by the treasurer thereof, and countersigned by the register of the treasury; and that those officers, respectively, shall, as checks upon each other, and to secure the public safety, keep separate, full, and accurate accounts of the number, date, denomination, and amount of all the notes signed and countersigned by them, respectively; which said accounts shall be carefully preserved and placed on file in the treasury department; and, also, similar accounts, kept and preserved in the same manner, of all the said notes redeemed, as the same shall be returned and cancelled; and the treasurer shall further account quarterly for all such notes delivered to him for signature, or issued by the register. The treasurer, and register of the treasury are hereby authorized, by and with the consent and approbation of the secretary of the treasury, to employ the same temporary clerks as were authorized and are now employed under the third section of the act "to authorize the issuing of treasury notes," approved the twelfth of October last, and at the same salaries.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the secretary of the treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to reimburse and pay the principal and interest of the treasury notes which may be issued by virtue of this act, at the several time and times when the same, according to the provisions of this act, should be thus reimbursed and paid, and to pay the interest annually on such as are payable in eighteen months and two years. And the said secretary is further authorized to make purchases of the said notes, at par, for the amount of the principal and interest due at the time of purchase on said notes. And so much of any unappropriated money in the treasury as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated for paying the interest or principal and interest, or for the purchase of said notes as aforesaid.

[Sections 6, 7, 8, and 9 appropriate for expense of printing, &c. of the notes; provide punishment for forgery, &c. of the notes; and require monthly statement of issues to be published.]

THE CONSTITUTION

Of the commonwealth of Pennsylvania, as amended by the convention of 1837-'38.

We, the people, of the commonwealth of Pennsylvania, ordain and establish this constitution for its government.

ARTICLE I.

Sec. I. The legislative power of this commonwealth shall be vested in a general assembly, which shall consist of a senate and house of representatives.

Sec. II. The representatives shall be chosen annually by the citizens of Philadelphia, and of each county respectfully, on the second Tuesday of October.

Sec. III. No person shall be a representative who shall not have obtained the age of twenty one years, and have been a citizen and inhabitant of the state three years next preceding his election, and the last year thereof an inhabitant of the [district] in [and for] which he shall be chosen [a representative], unless he shall have been absent on the public business of the United States, or of this state.

Sec. IV. Within three years after the first meeting of the general assembly, and within every subsequent term of seven years, an enumeration of the taxable inhabitants shall be made in such manner as shall be directed by law. The number of representatives shall at the several periods of making such enumeration, be fixed by the legislature, and apportioned among the city of Philadelphia and the several counties, according to the number of taxable inhabitants in each. And shall never be less than sixty nor greater than one hundred. Each county shall have at least one representative, but no county hereafter erected shall be entitled to a separate representation until a sufficient number of taxable inhabitants shall be contained within it, to entitle them to one representative, agreeably to the ratio which shall then be established.

Sec. V. The senators shall be chosen for [three] years, by the citizens of Philadelphia and of the several counties at the same time, in the same manner, and at the same places where they shall vote for representatives.

Sec. VI. The number of senators shall, at the several periods of making the enumeration before mentioned, be fixed by the legislature, and apportioned among the districts formed as hereinafter directed, according to the number of taxable inhabitants in each; and shall never be less than one-fourth, nor greater than one-third, of the number of representatives.

Sec. VII. The senators shall be chosen in districts, to be formed by the legislature; [but no district shall be so formed as to entitle it to elect more than two senators, unless the number of taxable inhabitants in any city or county shall, at any time, be such as to enable it to elect more than two, but no city or county shall be entitled to elect more than four senators;] when a district shall be composed of two or more counties, they shall be adjoining: neither the city of Philadelphia nor any county shall be divided in forming a district.

Sec. VIII. No person shall be a senator who shall not have attained the age of twenty-five years, and have been a citizen and inhabitant of the state four years next before his election, and the last year thereof an inhabitant of the district for which he shall be chosen, unless he shall have been absent on the public business of the United States, or of this state; [and no person elected as aforesaid shall hold said office after he shall have removed from such district.]

Sec. IX. [The senators who may be elected at the first general election after the adoption of the amendments to the constitution, shall be divided by lot into three classes. The seats of the senators of the first class shall be vacated at the expiration of the first year; of the second class at the expiration of the second year; and of the third class at the expiration of the third year; so that thereafter one-third of the whole number of senators may be chosen every year. The senators elected before the amendments to the constitution shall be adopted, shall hold their offices during the terms for which they shall respectively have been elected.]

Sec. X. The general assembly shall meet on the first Tuesday of [January,] in every year, unless sooner convened by the governor.

Sec. XI. Each house shall choose its speaker and other officers; and the senate shall also choose a speaker pro tempore, when the speaker shall exercise the office of governor.

Sec. XII. Each house shall judge of the qualifications of its members. Contested elections shall be determined by a committee, to be selected, formed, and regulated, in such manner as shall be directed by law. A majority of each house shall constitute a quorum to do business; but a small number may adjourn from day to day, and may be authorized by law to compel the attendance of absent members, in such manner and under such penalties as may be provided.

Sec. XIII. Each house may determine the rules of its proceedings, punish its members for disorderly behaviour, and with the concurrence of two-thirds, expel a member, but not a second time for the same cause; and shall have all other powers necessary for a branch of the legislature of a free state.

Sec. XIV. [The legislature shall not have power to enact laws annulling the contract of marriage in any case where, by law, the courts of this commonwealth are, or hereafter may be, empowered to decree a divorce.]

Sec. XV. Each house shall keep a journal of its proceedings, and publish them weekly, except such parts as may require secrecy; and the yeas and nays of the members on any question shall, at the desire of two of them, be entered on the journal.

Sec. XVI. The doors of each house and of committees of the whole shall be open, unless when the business shall be such as ought to be kept secret.

Sec. XVII. Neither house shall, without the consent of the other, adjourn for more than three days, nor to any other place than that in which the two houses shall be sitting.

Sec. XVIII. The senators and representatives shall receive a compensation for their services to be ascertained by law, and paid out of the treasury of the commonwealth. They shall in all cases, except treason, felony and breach of surety of the peace, be privileged from arrest during their attendance at the session of their respective houses, and in going to and returning from the same. And for any speech or debate in either house they shall not be questioned in any other place.

Sec. XIX. No senator or representative shall, during the time for which he shall have been elected, be appointed to any civil office under the commonwealth, which shall have been created, or the emoluments of which shall have been increased during such time; and no member of congress or other person holding any office (except of attorney at law, and in militia) under the United States or in this commonwealth, shall be a member of either house during his continuance in congress or in office.

Sec. XX. When vacancies happen in either house, the speaker shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies.

Sec. XXI. All bills for raising revenue shall originate in the house of representatives, but the senate may propose amendments as in other bills.

Sec. XXII. No money shall be drawn from the treasury but in consequence of appropriation made by law.

Sec. XXIII. Every bill which shall have passed both houses shall be presented to the governor. If he approve he shall sign it, but if he shall not approve it he shall return it with his objections to the house in which it shall have originated, who shall enter the objections at large upon their journals and proceed to reconsider it. If, after such reconsideration two-thirds of that house shall agree to pass the bill, it shall be sent with the objections to the other house, by which likewise it shall be reconsidered, and if approved by two-thirds of that house, it shall be a law. But in such cases the votes of both houses shall be determined by yeas and nays, and the names of the persons voting for or against the bill, shall be entered on the journals of each house respectively. If any bill shall not be returned by the governor within ten days (Sundays excepted) after it shall have been presented to him, it shall be a law in like manner as if he had signed it, unless the general assembly, by their adjournment, prevented its return, in which case it shall be a law, unless sent back within three days after their next meeting.

Sec. XXIV. Every order, resolution or vote to which the concurrence of both houses may be necessary (except on a question of adjournment) shall be presented to the governor, and before it shall take effect, be approved by him, or being disapproved, shall be repassed by two thirds of both houses, according to the rules and limitations prescribed in case of a bill.

Sec. XXV. [No corporate body shall be hereafter created, renewed or extended with banking or discounting privileges, without six months' previous public notice of the application for the same, in such manner as shall be prescribed by law. Nor shall any charter for the purposes aforesaid, be granted for a longer period than twenty years, and every such charter shall contain a clause reserving to the legislature the power to alter, revoke or annul the same, whenever in their opinion it may be injurious to the citizens of the commonwealth, in such manner, however, that no injustice shall be done to the corporators. No law hereafter enacted, shall create, renew or extend the charter of more than one corporation.]

ARTICLE II.

Sec. I. The supreme executive power of this commonwealth shall be vested in a governor.

Sec. II. The governor shall be chosen on the second Tuesday of October, by the citizens of the commonwealth, at the places where they shall respectively vote for representatives. The returns of every election for governor shall be sealed up, and transmitted to the seat of government, directed to the speaker of the senate, who shall open and publish them in the presence of the members of both houses of the legislature. The person having the highest number of votes shall be governor. But if two or more shall be equal and highest in votes, one of them shall be chosen governor by the joint vote of the members of both houses. Contested elections shall be determined by a committee to be selected from both houses of the legislature, and formed and regulated in such manner as shall be directed by law.

Sec. III. The governor shall hold his office during three years from the third Tuesday of [January] next ensuing his election, and shall not be capable of holding it longer than [six] in any term of [nine] years.

Sec. IV. He shall be at least thirty years of age, and have been a citizen and an inhabitant of this state seven years next before his election; unless he shall have been absent on the public business of the United States, or of this State.

Sec. V. No member of congress, or person holding any office under the United States, or this state, shall exercise the office of governor.

Sec. VI. The governor shall at stated times receive for his services, a compensation, which shall be neither increased nor diminished during the period for which he shall have been elected.

Sec. VII. He shall be commander-in-chief of the army and navy of this commonwealth, and of the militia, except when they shall be called into the actual service of the United States.

He shall have power to fill all vacancies that may happen in such judicial offices during the recess of the senate, by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of their next session:] Provided, [That in acting on executive nominations the senate shall sit with open doors, and in confirming or rejecting the nominations of the governor, the vote shall be taken by yeas and nays.]

Sec. XII. He may, on extraordinary occasions, convene the general assembly; and in case of disagreement between the two houses, with respect to the time of adjournment, adjourn them to such time as he shall think proper, not exceeding four months.

Sec. XIII. He shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed.

Sec. XIV. In case of the death or resignation of the governor, or his removal from office, the speaker of the senate shall exercise the office of governor, until another governor shall be duly qualified; [but in such case another governor shall be chosen at the next annual election of representatives, unless such death, resignation or removal shall occur within three calendar months immediately preceding such next annual election, in which case a governor shall be chosen at the second succeeding annual election of representatives.] And if the trial of a contested election shall continue longer than until [the third Monday of January] next ensuing the election of governor, the governor of the last year, or the speaker of the senate who may be in the exercise of the executive authority shall continue therein until the determination of such contested election, and until a governor shall be [duly] qualified as aforesaid.

But a citizen of the United States, who had previously been a qualified voter of this state, and removed therefrom and returned, and who shall have resided in the election district, and paid taxes as aforesaid, shall be entitled to vote, after residing in the state six months:] Provided, [That white freemen, citizens of the United States, between the ages of twenty-one and twenty-two years, and having resided in the state one year, and in the election district ten days as aforesaid, shall be entitled to a vote, although they shall not have paid taxes.]

They shall hold their offices for three years, if they shall so long behave themselves well, and until their successors shall be duly qualified. The legislature shall provide by law the number of persons in each county who shall hold said offices, and how many, and which of said offices, shall be held by one person. Vacancies in any of the said offices shall be filled by appointments to be made by the governor, to continue until the next general election, and until successors shall be elected and qualified as aforesaid.]

Sec. IV. Prothonotaries, clerks of the peace and orphans' courts, recorders of deeds, registers of wills and sheriffs, shall keep their offices in the county town of the county in which they, respectively, shall be officers, unless, when the governor shall, for special reasons, dispense therewith, for any term not exceeding five years after the county shall have been erected.

Sec. V. All commissions shall be in the name and by the authority of the commonwealth of Pennsylvania, and be sealed with the state seal, and signed by the governor.

Sec. VI. [A] state treasurer shall be [elected] annually, by joint vote of [both branches of the legislature.]

Sec. VII. [Justices of the peace, or aldermen, shall be elected in the several wards, boroughs and townships, at the time of the election of constables, by the qualified voters thereof, in such number as shall be directed by law, and shall be commissioned by the governor for a term of five years. But no township, ward or borough shall elect more than two justices of the peace or aldermen without the consent of a majority of the qualified electors within such township, ward or borough.]

Sec. VIII. [All officers whose election or appointment is not provided for in this constitution, shall be elected or appointed as shall be directed by law. No person shall be appointed to any office within any county, who shall have not been a citizen and an inhabitant therein one year next before his appointment, if the county shall have been so long erected; but if it shall not have been so long erected, then within the limits of the county or counties out of which it shall have been taken. No member of congress from this state, or any person holding or exercising any office of appointment of trust or profit under the United States, shall at the same time hold or exercise any office in this state, to which a salary is, or fees or perquisites are by law annexed: and the legislature may by law declare what state officers are incompatible. No member of the senate or of the house of representatives shall be appointed by the governor to any office during the term for which he shall have been elected.]

Sec. IX. [All officers for a term of years shall hold their offices for the term respectively specified, only on the condition that they so long behave themselves well; and shall be removed on conviction of misbehavior in office, or of any infamous crime.]

Sec. X. [Any person who shall, after the adoption of the amendments proposed by this convention to the constitution, fight a duel, or send a challenge for that purpose, or be aider or abettor in fighting a duel, shall be deprived of the right of holding any office of honor or profit in this state, and shall be punished otherwise in such manner as is, or may be prescribed by law; but the executive may remit the said offence and all its disqualifications.]

ARTICLE VIII.

Members of the general assembly, and all officers, executive and judicial; shall be bound by oath or affirmation to support the constitution of this commonwealth and to perform the duties of their respective offices with fidelity.

That the general, great and essential principles of liberty and free government, may be recognized and unalterably established, we declare,

Sec. I. That all men are born equally free and independent, and have certain inherent and inalienable rights; among which are those of enjoying and defending life and liberty, of acquiring, possessing and protecting property and reputation, and of pursuing their own happiness.

Sec. III. That all men have a natural and indefeasible right to worship Almighty God according to the dictates of their own consciences; that no man can, of right, be compelled to attend, erect or support any place of worship, or to maintain any ministry against his consent; that no human authority can, in any case whatever, control or interfere with the rights of conscience; and that no preference shall ever be given by law, to any religious establishments or modes of worship.

Sec. V. That elections shall be free and equal.

Sec. VI. That trial by jury shall be as heretofore, and the right thereof remain inviolate.

Sec. VII. That the printing presses shall be free to every person who undertakes to examine the proceedings of the legislature or any branch of the government: and no law shall be made to restrain the right thereof. The free communication of thoughts and opinions is one of the invaluable rights of man; and every citizen may freely speak, write and print on any subject, being responsible for the abuse of that liberty. In prosecutions for the publication of papers, investigating the official conduct of officers, or men in a public capacity, or where the matter published is proper for public information, the truth thereof may be given in evidence, and, in all indictments for libels, the jury shall have a right to determine the law and the facts under the direction of the courts as in other cases.

Sec. VIII. That the people shall be secure in their persons, houses, papers and possessions, from unreasonable searches and seizures, and that no warrant to search any place, or to seize any person or things, shall issue without describing them as nearly as may be, nor without probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation.

Sec. IX. That in all criminal prosecutions, the accused hath a right to be heard by himself and his counsel, to demand the nature and cause of the accusation against him, to meet the witness face to face, to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and in prosecutions by indictment or information, a speedy trial by an impartial jury of the vicinage: That he cannot be compelled to give evidence against himself, nor can he be deprived of his life, liberty or property, unless by the judgment of his peers or the law of the land.

Sec. X. No person shall, for any indictable offence, be proceeded against criminally by information, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia when in actual service in the time of war or public danger; or by leave of the court for oppression and misdemeanor in office.

No person shall for the same offence be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall any man's property be taken, or applied to public use, without the consent of his representatives, and without just compensation being made.

Sec. XI. That all courts shall be open, and every man for an injury done him in his lands, goods, person or reputation, shall have remedy by the due course of law, and the right and justice administered, without sale, denial or delay. Suits may be brought against the commonwealth in such manner, in such courts, and in such cases, as the legislature may, by law, direct.

Sec. XII. That no power of suspending laws shall be exercised, unless by the legislature, or its authority.

Sec. XIII. That excessive bail shall not be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel punishments inflicted.

Sec. XIV. That all prisoners shall be bailable by sufficient sureties, unless for capital offences, when the proof is evident or presumption great: and the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended, unless when in cases of rebellion or invasion the public safety may require it.

Sec. XV. That no commission of oyer and terminer or jail delivery shall be issued.

Sec. XVI. That the person of a debtor, where there is not strong presumption of fraud shall not be continued in prison after delivering up his estate for the benefit of his creditors in such manner as shall be prescribed by law.

Sec. XVII. No ex post facto law, nor any law impairing contracts shall be made.

Sec. XVIII. No person shall be attainted of treason or felony by the legislature.

Sec. XIX. That no attainder shall work corruption of blood; nor, except during the life of the offender, forfeiture of estate to the commonwealth: that the estates of such persons as shall destroy their own lives, shall descend or vest as in case of natural death; and if any person shall be killed by casualty, there shall be no forfeiture by reason thereof.

Sec. XX. That the citizens have a right in a peaceable manner, to assemble together for their common good, and to apply to those invested with the powers of government for redress of grievances, or other proper purposes, by petition, redress or remonstrance.

Sec. XXI. That the right of the citizens to bear arms, in defence of themselves and the state, shall not be questioned.

Sec. XXII. That no standing army shall, in time of peace, be kept up, without the consent of the legislature; and the military shall in all cases and at all times be in strict subordination to the civil power.

Sec. XXIII. No soldier shall, in time of peace, be quartered in any house, without the consent of the owner, nor in time of war but in a manner to be prescribed by law.

Sec. XXIV. That the legislature shall not grant any title of nobility or hereditary distinction, nor create any office the appointment to which shall be for a longer term than during good behaviour.

Sec. XXV. That emigration from the state shall not be prohibited.

Sec. XXVI. To guard against transgressions of the high powers which we have delegated, we declare, that every thing in this article is excepted out of the general powers of government, and shall forever remain inviolate.

ARTICLE IX.

[Any amendment or amendments to this constitution, may be proposed in the senate or house of representatives, and if the same shall be agreed to by a majority of the members elected to each house, such proposed amendments shall be entered on their journals with the yeas and nays taken thereon, and the secretary of the commonwealth shall cause the same to be published three months before the next election, in at least one newspaper in every county in which a newspaper shall be established; and if in the legislature next afterwards chosen, such proposed amendment or amendments shall be agreed to by a majority of the members elected to each house, the secretary of the commonwealth shall cause the same again to be published in manner aforesaid and such proposed amendment or amendments shall be submitted to the people in such manner, and at such time, at least three months after being so agreed to by the two houses, as the legislature shall prescribe; and if the people shall approve and ratify such amendment or amendments by a majority of the qualified voters of this state voting thereon, such amendment or amendments shall become a part of the constitution, but no amendment or amendments shall be submitted to the people oftener than once in five years: Provided, that if more than one amendment be submitted, they shall be submitted in such manner and form, that the people may vote for or against each amendment separately and distinctly.

GENERAL SCOTT.

It gives us much pleasure to lay before our readers the manly and soldier-like communication of general Scott to colonel Hughes, commanding her majesty's forces on the Niagara frontier. Although a spirit of becoming courtesy and forbearance pervades the letter, yet it has all the attributes which have hitherto denoted the lofty American character of the writer. Its tone and sentiments afford an ample refutation of the false and malicious charges against general Scott, made by speaker McNabb, and the members of the provincial house of assembly. [Alex. Gaz.]

From the Montreal Gazette of the 24th ult.

Headquarters, eastern division U. S. army,
Buffalo, Jan. 29, 1838.

Sir: I had the honor to receive, by the hand of captain Maitland, your letter of the 16th inst. which enclosed one of the same date from captain Drew, of the royal navy, and I have since received the communication of colonel McNabb, commanding her majesty's militia and naval forces on the Niagara frontier, dated the 18th.

I begged capt. Maitland to offer you my numerous and pressing engagements, as an apology for not giving, at the time, a more formal acknowledgment of the first and second notes: and the same apology was repeated through captain Glasgow, whom I have since had the pleasure to receive as a visitor.

Both captains Maitland and Glasgow had opportunities (and I was pleased that it was so) to witness the character of my occupations, which had for their object the defeat, by harmonizing all the authorities, civil and military, both of the general and state governments, of the hostile expedition on foot, within our jurisdiction, against her majesty's neighboring provinces.

From the measures taken, and ready to be applied, I am happy to repeat what I orally communicated through captains Maitland and Glasgow, that I entertain a well grounded hope that we shall be able to prevent the embarkation of any considerable portion of the men and arms of that expedition on this side of Cleveland; and brig. gen. Brady, U. S. army, under my command at Detroit, has taken measures, in conjunction with his excellency the governor of Michigan, to maintain the obligations of neutrality in that quarter.

At this place, I think, we shall be able to prevent any hostile embarkation; and the steamer Barcelona has already been out, and will proceed again, the moment the wind shall permit, with a detachment of the United States troops, and the proper civil officers, as high up the lake as Dunkirk, looking into Cattaraugus and Silver creeks on the way. Another and a better steamer, the Robert Fulton, will follow to-night, or early in the morning, with a large detachment. The latter may go as far as Detroit, and certainly, the weather permitting, as high as Cleveland. The object of both boats and detachments is the same—to prevent the embarkation of the hostile expedition.

As was explained to captains Maitland and Glasgow, my powers to effect that object have been much enlarged since I had the honor to address you my former note, and we (the civil authorities and myself) are daily in expectation of receiving a new act of congress, giving us yet more ample authority.

The steamer New England, lying in this port, and understood to be engaged to take off portions of the hostile expedition from points above, we hope to find the means of detaining. I have, in the act of writing this sentence, the further hope of hiring and taking her into the service of the United States.

I give these details in the spirit of national amity, and in the sincere hope that the neutral relations of the two countries may long be maintained.

It is with reluctance that I advert, and I shall merely advert, to certain points in the three communications acknowledged above.

I cannot stipulate, as you have proposed, as the price of your respecting the sovereignty of the United States, "to stop the Barcelona, or any vessel which may be employed in the same cause, and have her examined, to ascertain whether or not they may have any of the rebels on board lately in arms upon Navy Island, or any of their arms or munitions of war," and so I said orally, through captain Maitland, and added, that, while I should be happy to do all that our laws would permit to maintain our neutral relations with Great Britain, I had another high duty to perform—that of preventing, by all the means I could command, the violation of the sovereignty of the United States.

I said, in my note of the 15th instant to the commanding officer of the armed British vessels in the Niagara, that it gave me pain to perceive the armed vessels anchored in our waters, with the probable intention to fire upon the expedition moving within the same waters, and that I should be obliged to consider a discharge of shot or shell from or into our waters, from the armed schooners of her majesty, as an act too seriously compromising the neutrality of the two nations.

Capt. Drew, in the reply which I am thus acknowledging, has been pleased to mistake my point, and to raise another, which, certainly, in time of peace, no functionary in the United States will ever question, viz. the common right of both nations to navigate, in all their breadth, the waters of the Niagara.

Col. McNabb (who will pardon me for not addressing myself directly to him—indeed, I have not the time, without neglecting some urgent duty of neutrality) has opened upon me a wide field of complaint and controversy. With what may be his peculiar views of international law as applicable to recent and present circumstances on this frontier, I have, in the way of discussion, nothing to do. That code is always open to me, and I shall not fail, regardless of his admonitions, to apply it to current events.

I will, however, state to you, in the spirit of amity, that I knew when the steamer, the Barcelona, was, on the 15th, 16th, and 17th instant, passing up from Grand Island to this port, she had no part of the personal or material of the hostile expedition on board.

Col. McNabb tells me that "but for an unfortunate misapprehension of the orders given by capt. Drew," that vessel (she alone passed up) would have been assailed. More pacific than the colonel, I shall call that misapprehension a most fortunate event, and only regret that some equally kind influence did not preside over the friendly relations of the two countries on the night of the unhappy affair of the Caroline.

As to the alleged discharge of arms from grand Island, on the 13th instant, by a party of New York militia, upon the boat of lieut. Emaly, of the royal navy, and the correspondence which ensued between col. McNabb and col. Ayres, of the New York militia, upon the subject, I have no knowledge except through col. McNabb. I shall inquire for that correspondence, and refer the whole subject for investigation to the proper state authority now present, only remarking at this time, that col. Ayres was not then, nor is yet, taken into the service of the United States, or under my command. I have no doubt that all that is proper will be done in the case, and to that end I shall give my attention.

Gen. Arcularius, who has, I know not how, got into correspondence with her majesty's authorities on this frontier, has, I believe, returned to Albany. He held no command on this frontier, either under the state or general government, being here, I learn, as the agent of the former, to claim and to get possession of certain arms purloined from the state arsenals. Many of these cannon and muskets have already been recovered, and we hope soon to recover the remainder.

I have received a note from Lewiston, stating that a ferry boat belonging to that place and Queenston, has for some cause or other, been detained on your side of the river, to the great inconvenience of our people in that neighborhood. I make no complaint on the subject, because I am ignorant of all the material circumstances; but will suggest whether it may not contribute to the restoration of good feelings on both sides to permit the ferry boat to resume her usual trips, particularly as I think I can assure you all the navy island people have advanced up the country to this place and beyond.

I have the honor, &c.

WINFIELD SCOTT.

P. S. I have engaged the New England, and a party of troops has just gone down to take possession of her. The hostile expedition can now obtain no boat this side of Erie.

MR. WEBSTER'S SECOND SPEECH

ON THE SUB-TREASURY BILL.

Delivered in the Senate of the United States, March 12, 1838.

MR. PRESIDENT: Having at an early stage of the debate expressed, in a general manner, my opposition to this bill, I must find an apology for again addressing the senate, in the acknowledged importance of the measure, the novelty of its character, and the division of opinion respecting it which is known to exist in both houses of congress.

To be able, in this state of things, to give a preponderance to that side of the question which I embrace, is, perhaps, more than I ought to hope; but I do not feel that I have done all which my duty demands, until I make another effort.

The functions of this government which, in time of peace, most materially affect the happiness of the people, are those which respect commerce and revenue. The bill before us touches both these great interests. It proposes to act directly on the revenue and expenditure of government, and it is expected to act, also, indirectly, on commerce and currency; while its friends and supporters altogether abstain from other measures, deemed by a great portion of congress and of the country, to be indispensably demanded by the present exigency.

We have arrived, Mr. President, towards the close of a half century from the adoption of the constitution. During the progress of these years, our population has increased from three to four millions to thirteen or fourteen millions; our commerce, from little or nothing, to an export of a hundred and ninety millions, and an import of a hundred and twenty-eight and a half millions, in the year 1836. Our mercantile tonnage approaches near to two millions. We have a revenue, and an expenditure, of thirty millions a year. The manufactures of the country have attained very great importance, and, up to the commencement of the derangement of the currency, were in a prosperous and growing state. The produce of the fisheries has become vast; and the general production of the labor and capital of the country is increasing, far beyond all example in other countries, or other times, and has already reached an amount which, to those who have not investigated the subject, would seem incredible.

The commerce of the United States, sir, is spread over the globe. It pursues its objects in all seas, and finds its way into every port which the laws of trade do not shut against its approach. With all the disadvantages of more costly materials, and of higher wages, and often in despite of unequal and unfavorable commercial regulations of other states, the enterprise, vigor, and economy which distinguish our navigating interest, enable it to show our flag, in competition with the most favored and the most skillful, in the various quarters of the world. In the mean time, internal activity does not lag nor loiter. New and useful modes of intercourse and facilities of transportation are established, or are in progress, everywhere. Public works are projected and pushed forward, in a spirit, which grasps at high and vast objects, with a bold defiance of all expense. The aggregate value of the property of the country is augmented daily. A constant demand for new capital exists, although a debt has already been contracted in Europe, for sums advanced to states, corporations, and individuals, for purposes connected with internal improvement; which debt cannot now be less than a hundred millions of dollars. Spreading over a great extent, embracing different climates, and with vast variety of products, we find an intensely excited spirit of industry and enterprise to pervade the whole country; while its external commerce, as I have already said, sweeps over all seas. We are connected with all commercial countries, and, most of all, with that which has established and sustained the most stupendous system of commerce and manufactures, and which collects and disburses an incredible amount of annual revenue; and which uses, to this end, and as means of currency and circulation, a mixed money of metal and paper.

Such a mixed system, sir, has also prevailed with us, from the beginning. Gold and silver, and convertible bank paper, have always constituted our actual money. The people are used to this system. It has hitherto commanded their confidence, and fulfilled their expectations. We have had, in succession, two national banks; each for a period of twenty years. Local or state banks have, at the same time, been in operation; and no man of intelligence or candor can deny that, during these forty years, and with the operation of a national and these state institutions, the currency of the country, upon the whole, has been safe, cheap, convenient, and satisfactory. When the government was established, it found convertible bank paper, issued by state banks, already in circulation; and with this circulation it did not interfere. The United States, indeed, had themselves established a bank, under the old confederation, with authority to issue paper. A system of mixed circulation, therefore, was exactly that system which this constitution, at its adoption, found already in existence. There is not the slightest evidence of any intention, in establishing the constitution, to overthrow or abolish this system, although it certainly was the object of the constitution to abolish bills of credit, and all paper intended for circulation, issued upon the faith of the states alone. Inasmuch as whatever then existed, of the nature of money or currency, rested on state legislation; and as it was not possible that uniformity, general credit, and general confidence could result from local and separate acts of the states, there is evidence—I think abundant evidence—that it was the intention of the framers of the constitution to give to congress a controlling power over the whole subject, to the end that there should be, for the whole country, a currency of uniform value. Congress has heretofore exercised this authority, and fulfilled the corresponding duties. It has maintained, for forty years out of forty-nine, a national institution, proceeding from its power, and responsible to the general government. With intervals of derangement, brought about by war and other occurrences, this whole system, taken altogether, has been greatly successful in its actual operation. We have found occasion to create no difference between government and people—between money for revenue, and money for the general use of the country.—Until the commencement of the last session, government had manifested no disposition to look out for itself exclusively. What was good enough for the people, was good enough for government. No condescending and gracious preference had, before that period, ever been tendered to members of congress, over other persons having claims upon the public funds. Such a singular spectacle had never been exhibited, as an amicable, disinterested, and patriotic understanding, between those who are to vote taxes on the people, for the purpose of replenishing the treasury, and those who, from the treasury, dispense the money back again among those who have claims on it. In that respect I think the secretary stands alone. He is the first, as far as I know, in our long list of able heads of departments, who has thought it a delicate and skilful touch, in financial administration, to be particularly kind and complaisant to the interest of the law-makers,—those who hold the tax-laying power; the first whose great deference and cordial regard for members of congress have led him to provide, for them, as the medium of payment and receipt, something more valuable than is provided, at the same time, for the army, the navy, the judges, the revolutionary pensioners, and the various classes of laborers in the pay of government.

Through our whole history, sir, we have found a convertible paper currency, under proper control, highly useful, by its pliability to circumstances, and by its capacity of enlargement, in a reasonable degree, to meet the demands of a new and enterprising community. As I have already said, sir, we owe a permanent debt of a hundred millions abroad; and the present abundance of money in England, and the state of demand here, this amount will probably be increased. But it must be evident to every one, that, so long as, by a safe use of paper, we give some reasonable expansion to our own circulation, or at least do not reasonably contract it, we do, to that extent, create or maintain an ability for loans among ourselves, and so far diminish the amount of annual interest paid abroad.

But let me now, Mr. President, ask the attention of the senate to another subject, upon which, indeed, much has already been said. I mean that which is usually called the CREDIT SYSTEM.

Sir, what is that system? Why is credit a word of so much solid importance, and of so powerful charm, in the United States? Why is it that a shock has been felt through all classes and all interests, the first moment that this credit has been disturbed? Does its importance belong, equally, to all commercial states? Or are there peculiarities in our condition, our habits, and modes of business, which make credit more indispensable, and mingle it more naturally, more intimately, with the life-blood of our system?

A full and philosophical answer to these inquiries, Mr. President, would demand that I should set forth both the ground-work and the structure of our social system. It would show that the wealth and prosperity of the country have as broad a foundation as its popular constitutions. Undoubtedly there are peculiarities in that system, resulting from the nature of our political institutions, from our elementary laws, and from the general character of the people. These peculiarities most unquestionably give to credit, or to those means and those arrangements, by whatever names we call them, which are calculated to keep the whole, or by far the greater part, of the capital of the country in a state of constant activity, a degree of importance far exceeding what is experienced elsewhere.

In the old countries of Europe there is a clear and well-defined line, between capital and labor: a line which strikes through society with a horizontal sweep, leaving on one side wealth, in masses, held by few hands, and those having little participation in the laborious pursuits of life; on the other, the thronging multitudes of labor, with here and there, only, an instance of such accumulation of earnings as to deserve the name of capital.—This distinction, indeed, is not universal and absolute in any of the commercial states of Europe, and it grows less and less definite as commerce advances; the effect of commerce and manufactures, as all history shows, being every where, to diffuse wealth, and not to aid its accumulation in few hands. But still the line is greatly more broad, marked, and visible in European nations, than in the United States. In those nations the gains of capital, and wages, or the earnings of labor, are not only distinct in idea, as elements of the science of political economy, but, to a great degree, also, distinct in fact; and their respective claims, and merits, and modes of relative adjustment, become subjects of discussion and of public regulation. Now, sir, every body may see that that is a state of things which does not exist with us. We have no such visible and broad distinction between capital and labor; and much of the general happiness of all classes results from this. With us, labor is every day augmenting its means by its own industry; not in all cases, indeed, but in very many. Its savings of yesterday become its capital, therefore, of to-day. On the other hand, vastly the greater portion of the property of the country exists in such small quantities that its holders cannot dispense altogether with their own personal industry; or if, in some instances, capital be accumulated till it rises to what may be called affluence, it is usually disintegrated and broken into particles again, in one or two generations. The abolition of the rights of primogeniture; the descent of property of every sort to females as well as males; the cheap and easy means by which property is transferred and conveyed; the high price of labor; the low price of land; the genius of our political institutions; in fine, every thing belonging to us, counteracts large accumulation. This is our actual system.—Our politics, our constitutions, our elementary laws, our habits, all centre in this point, or tend to this result. From where I now stand, to the extremity of the northeast, vastly the greatest part of the property of the country is in the hands and ownership of those whose personal industry is employed in some form of productive labor. General competence, general education, enterprise, activity, and industry, such as never before pervaded any society, are the characteristics which distinguish the people who live, and move, and act in this state of things, such as I have described it.

Now, sir, if this view be true, as I think it is, all must perceive that, in the United States, capital cannot say to labor and industry, "stand ye yonder, while I come up hither;" but labor and industry lay hold on capital, break it into parcels, use it, diffuse it widely, and, instead of leaving it to repose in its own inertness, compel it to act at once as their own stimulus and their own instrument.

But, sir, this is not all. There is another view still more immediately affecting the operation and use of credit. In every wealthy community, however equally property may be divided, there will always be some property-holders who live on its income. If this property be land, they live on rent; if it be money, they live on its interest. The amount of real estate held in this country on lease, is comparatively very small, except in the cities. But there are individuals and families, trustees and guardians, and various literary and charitable institutions, who have occasion to invest funds for the purpose of annual moneyed income. Where do they invest? Where can they invest? The answer to these questions shows at once a mighty difference between the state of things here, and that in England. Here, these investments, to produce a moneyed income, are made in banks, insurance companies, canal and railroad corporations, and other similar institutions. Placed thus immediately in active hands, this capital, it is evident, becomes at once the basis of business; it gives occupation, pays labor, excites enterprise, and performs, in short, all the functions of employed money. But, in England, investments for such purposes usually take another direction. There is, in England, a vast amount of public stocks, as eight or nine hundred millions sterling of public debt actually exists, constituting, to the amount of its annual interest, a charge on the active capital and industry of the country. In the hands of individuals, portions of this debt are capital; that is, they produce income to the proprietors, and income without labor; while in a national point of view, it is mere debt. What was obtained for it, or that on account of which it was contracted, has been spent in the long and arduous wars, which the country has sustained, from the time of king William the third, to our own days. There are thousands of individuals, therefore, whose fixed income arises, not from the active use of property, either in their own hands, or the hands of others, but from the interest on that part of this national charge to which they are entitled. If, therefore, we use the term capital not in the sense of political economy exactly, but as implying whatever returns income to individuals, we find an almost incalculable mass so circumstanced as not to be the basis of active operations.

To illustrate this idea further, sir, let us suppose that, by some occurrence, (such as is certainly never to be expected,) this debt should be paid off; suppose its holders were to receive, to-morrow, their full amounts; what would they do with them? Why, sir, if they were obliged to loan the one-quarter part into the hands of the industrious classes, for the purposes of employment in active business; and if this operation could be accompanied by the same intelligence and industry among the people which prevail with us, the result would do more toward raising the character of the laboring classes, than all reforms in parliament, and other general political operations. It would be as if this debt had never been contracted; as if the money had never been spent, and now remained part of the active capital of the country, employed in the business of life. But this debt, sir, has created an enormous amount of private property, upon the income of which its owners live, which does not require their own active labor or that of others. We have no such debt; we have no such mode of investment; and this circumstance gives quite a different aspect and a different reality to our condition.

Now, Mr. President, what I understand by the credit system is, that which thus connects labor and capital, by giving to labor the use of capital. In other words, intelligence, good character, and good morals bestow on those who have not capital, a power, a trust, a confidence, which enables them to obtain it, and to employ it usefully for themselves and others. These active men of business build their hopes of success on their attentiveness, their economy, and their integrity. A wider theatre for useful activity is under their feet, and around them, than was ever spread before the eyes of the young and enterprising generations of men, on any other spot enlightened by the sun. Before them is the ocean. Every thing in that direction invites them to efforts of enterprise and industry in the pursuits of commerce and the fisheries. Around them, on all hands, are thriving and prosperous manufactures: an improving agriculture, and the daily presentation of new objects of internal improvement: while behind them is almost half a continent of the richest land, at the cheapest prices, under healthful climates, and washed by the most magnificent rivers that on any part of the globe pay their homage to the sea. In the midst of all these glowing and glorious prospects, they are neither restrained by ignorance nor smitten down by the penury of personal circumstances. They are not compelled to contemplate, in hopelessness and despair, all the advantages thus bestowed on their condition by Providence. Capital though they may have little or none, CREDIT supplies its place; not as the refuge of the prodigal and the reckless; not as gratifying present wants with the certainty of future absolute ruin; but as the genius of honorable trust and confidence; as the blessing, voluntarily offered to good character and to good conduct; as the beneficent agent, which assists honesty and enterprise in obtaining comfort and independence.

Mr. President, take away this credit, and what remains? I do not ask what remains to the few, but to the many? Take away this system of credit, and then tell me what is left for labor and industry, but mere manual toil and daily drudgery? If we adopt a system that withdraws capital from active employment, do we not diminish the rates of wages? If we curtail the general business of society, does not every laboring man find his condition grow daily worse? In the politics of the day, sir, we hear much said about divorces; and when we abolish credit, we shall divorce labor from capital; and, depend on it, sir, when we divorce labor from capital, capital is hoarded, and labor starves.

The declaration, so often quoted, that "all who trade on borrowed capital ought to break," is the most aristocratic sentiment ever uttered in this country. It is a sentiment which, if carried out by political arrangement, would condemn the great majority of mankind to the perpetual condition of mere day-laborers. It goes to take away from them all that solace and hope which arises from possessing something which they can call their own. A man loves his own; it is fit and natural that he should do so; and he will love his country and its institutions, if he have some stake in it, although it be but a very small part of the general mass of property. If it be but a cottage, an acre, a garden, its possession raises him, gives him self-respect, and strengthens his attachment to his country. It is our happy condition, by the blessings of providence, that almost every man of sound health, industrious habits, and good morals, can ordinarily attain, at least, to this degree of comfort and respectability; and it is a result devoutly to be wished, both for its individual and its general consequences.

But even to this degree of acquisition, that credit, of which I have already said so much, (as its general effect is to raise the price of wages, and render industry productive,) is highly important. There is no condition so low, if it be attended with industry and economy, which this credit does not benefit, as any one will find, if he will examine and follow out its operations.

Such, Mr. President, being the credit system in the United States, as I understand it, I now add, that the banks have been the agents and their circulation the instrument, by which the general operations of this credit have been conducted. Much of the capital of the country, placed at interest, is vested in bank stock, and those who borrow, borrow at the banks: and discounts of bills, and anticipation of payments, in all its forms, the regular and appropriate duty of banks, prevail universally.

In the north, the banks have enabled the manufacturers of all classes, to realize the proceeds of their industry at an early moment. The course has been, that the producers of commodities for southern consumption, having despatched their products, draw their bills. These bills are discounted at the banks, and with the proceeds other raw material is bought, and other labor paid; and thus the general business is continued in progress. All this is well known to those who have had opportunity to be acquainted with such concerns.

But bank credit has not been more necessary to the north than to the south. Indeed, no where has interest been higher, or the demand for capital greater, or the full benefit of credit more indispensable, than in the new cotton and sugar-growing states. I ask gentlemen from those states if this be not so? Have not the plantations been bought, and the necessary labor procured, to a great extent, on credit? Has not this credit been obtained at the banks? Even now do they not find credits, or advances on their crops, important in enabling them to get those crops to market? And if there had been no credit—if a hard-money system had prevailed, let me ask them what would have been, at this moment, the condition of things in Alabama, Louisiana, Mississippi and Arkansas? These states, sir, with Tennessee, and the south Atlantic states, constitute the great plantation interest. That there has been a vast demand for capital to be invested in this interest, is sufficiently proved, by the high price paid for the use of money.

In my opinion, sir, credit is as essential to the great export of the south, as to any other interest. The agriculture of the cotton and sugar-producing states partakes, in no inconsiderable degree, of the nature of commerce. The product and sale of one great staple only, is an operation essentially different from ordinary farming pursuits. The exports of the south, indeed, may be considered as the aggregate result of various forms and modes of industry, carried on by various hands, and in various places, rather than as the mere product of the plantation. That product itself is local; but its indispensable aids and means are drawn from every part of the union. What is it, sir, that enables southern labor to apply itself so exclusively to the cultivation of these great articles for export? Certainly, it is so applied, because its own necessities for provision and clothing are supplied, meanwhile, from other quarters. The south raises to sell, and not to consume; and with the proceeds of the sales it supplies itself with whatever its own consumption demands. There are exceptions; but this is the general truth. The hat-makers, shoe-makers, furniture-makers, and carriage-makers of the north, the spinners at Lowell, and the weavers at Philadelphia, are all contributors to the general product both of cotton and sugar, for export abroad; as are the live-stock raisers of Kentucky, the grain-growing farmers, and all who produce and vend provisions, in Indiana, Ohio and Illinois. The northern ship-owner and the mariner, who carry these products to market, are agents acting to the same end; and so are they too who, little thinking of cotton-fields, or sugar estates, are pursuing their adventurous employment in the whale fisheries, over the whole surface, and among all the islands, of the Pacific and the Indian oceans. If we take the annual cotton crop at sixty millions of dollars, we may, perhaps, find that the amount of forty-five millions is expended, either for interest on capital advanced, or for the expense of clothing and supporting labor, or in the charges which belong to the household, the education of families, and to the domestic expenditure of the proprietor.

Thus, sir, all the laborious classes, are, in truth, cotton-growers and sugar-makers. Each, in its own way, and to the extent of its own productiveness, contributes to swell the magnitude of that enormous export, which was nothing at the commencement of this government, and which now has run up to so many millions. Through all these operations the stream of credit has constantly flowed, and there is not one of them that will not be checked and interrupted, embarrassed and thwarted, if this stream be now dried up. This connexion of the various interests of the country with one another forms an important and interesting topic. It is one of the natural ties of the union. The variety of production, and mutual wants mutually supplied, constitute a strong bond between different states; and long may that bond last, growing with their growth, and strengthening with their strength!

But, Mr. President, that portion of our productions which takes the form of export, becomes distinct and visible; it is prominent and striking, and is seen and wondered at, by every body. The annual returns all show it, and every day's commercial intelligence speaks of it. We gaze at it with admiration, and the world is no less admiring than ourselves.

With other branches of industry the case is quite different. The products of these branches, being put in the train of domestic exchanges, and consumed in the country, do not get into statistical tables, are not collected in masses, and are seldom presented, in the aggregate, to the public view. They are not of the character of a few large and mighty rivers, but of a thousand little streams, meandering through all the fields of business and of life, and refreshing and fertilizing the whole.

Few of us, Mr. President, are aware of what would be the amount of the general production of the country, if it could be accurately ascertained. The legislature of Massachusetts, under the recommendation of the intelligent chief magistrate of that state, has caused to be prepared and published a report on the condition and products of certain branches of its industry, for the year ending in April, 1837. The returns of the authorities of each city and town were made, apparently, with much care; and the whole has been collated by the secretary of state, and the result distinctly presented in well-arranged statistical tables. From a summary of the statements in these tables, I will take the liberty of selecting a few articles, and of adverting to them here, as instances, or specimens, of the annual product of labor and industry in that state.

And to begin with a very necessary and important article: I find, that of boots and shoes, the value of the whole amount manufactured within the year exceeds fourteen millions and a half of dollars. If the amount of other articles of the same class, or material, be added, viz: leather, saddles, trunks, harness, &c. the total will be not far from eighteen millions and a half of dollars.

I will read the names of some other articles, and state the amount of annual product belonging to each:

Cotton fabrics	- - -	$17,408,000
Woollen fabrics	- - -	10,399,000
Fisheries	- - -	7,592,000
Books and stationery, and paper	- - -	2,592,000
Soap and candles	- - -	1,620,000
Nails, brads, and tacks	- - -	2,500,000
Machinery of various kinds	- - -	1,235,000
Agricultural implements	- - -	645,000
Glass	- - -	881,000
Hats	- - -	700,000
Clothing, neckcloths, &c.	- - -	2,013,000
Wool	- - -	539,000

These, sir, are samples. The grand total is ninety-one million seven hundred thousand dollars. From this, however, deductions are to be made for the cost of the raw material when imported, and for certain articles enumerated under different heads. But, then, the whole statement is confined to some branches of industry only; and to present an entire and comprehensive view, there should be added the gains of commerce within the year, the earnings of navigation, and almost the whole agricultural product of the state.

The result of all, if it could be collated and exhibited together, would show that the annual product of Massachusetts capital and Massachusetts industry exceeds one hundred millions of dollars. Now, sir, Massachusetts is a small state, in extent of territory. You may mark out her dimensions seven or eight times on the map of Virginia. Yet her population is seven hundred thousand souls; and the annual result of their laborious industry, economy, and labor, is as I have stated.

Mr. President, in looking over this result, it is most gratifying to find, that its great mass consists in articles equally essential and useful to all classes. They are not luxuries, but necessities and comforts. They belong to food and clothing, to household conveniences, and education. As they are more and more multiplied, the great majority of society becomes more elevated, better instructed, and happier in all respects. I have looked through this whole list, sir, to find what there is in it that might be fairly classed among the higher luxuries of life; and what do I find? In the whole hundred millions, I find but one such item; and that is an item of two or three hundred thousand dollars for "jewelry, silver, and silver-plate." This is all that belongs to luxury, in her annual product, of a hundred millions; and of this, no doubt, the far greater portion was sent abroad. And yet we hear daily, sir, of the amassing of aristocratic wealth, by the progress of manufactures, and the operations of the credit system! Aristocracy, it is said, is stealing upon us, and, in the form of aggregate wealth, is watching to seize political power from the hands of the people! We have been more than once gravely admonished that, in order to improve the times, and restore a metallic currency for the benefit of the poor, the rich ought to melt down their plate! Whatever such a melting process might find to act upon elsewhere, Mr. President, I assure you that in Massachusetts it would discover little. A few spoons, candlesticks, and other similar articles, some old family pitchers and tankards, and the silver porringers of our nurseries, would be about the whole.

Sir, if there be any aristocrats in Massachusetts the people are all aristocrats; because I do not believe there is on earth, in a highly civilized society a greater equality in the condition of men, than exists there. If there be a man in the state who maintains, what is called an equipage, or drives four horses in his coach, I am not acquainted with him. On the other hand, there are few who are not able to carry their wives and daughters to church in some decent conveyance. It is no matter of regret or sorrow to us that few are very rich; but it is our pride and glory that few are very poor. It is our still higher pride, and our just boast, as I think, that all her citizens possess means of intelligence and education; and that, of all her productions, she reckons, among the very chiefest, those which spring from the culture of the mind and the heart.

Mr. President, one of the most striking characteristics of this age, is the extraordinary progress which it has witnessed in popular knowledge. A new and powerful impulse has been acting in the social system of late, producing this effect in a striking degree.

In morals, in politics, in art, in literature, there is a vast accession to the number of readers, and to the number of proficient. The present state of popular knowledge is not the result of a slow and uniform progress, proceeding through a lapse of years, with the same regular degree of motion. It is evidently the result of some new causes, brought into powerful action, and producing their consequences rapidly and strikingly. What, sir, are these causes?

This is not an occasion, sir, for discussing such a question at length: allow me to say, however, that the improved state of popular knowledge is but the necessary result of the improved condition of the great mass of the people. Knowledge is not one of our merely physical wants. Life may be sustained without it. But, in order to live, men must be fed, and clothed, and sheltered; and in a state of things in which one's whole labor can do no more than procure clothes, food, and shelter, he can have no time nor means for mental improvement. Knowledge, therefore, is not attained, and cannot be attained, till there is some degree of respite from daily manual toil, and never-ending drudgery. But whenever a less degree of labor will produce the absolute necessities of life, then there comes leisure and means, both to teach and to learn.

But if this great and wonderful extension of popular knowledge be the result of an improved condition, it may, in the next place, well be asked what are the causes which have thus suddenly produced that great improvement? How is it that the means of food, clothing, and shelter, are now so much more cheaply and abundantly procured than formerly? Sir, the main cause I take to be the progress of scientific art, or a new extent of the application of science to art. This it is, which has so much distinguished the last half century in Europe and America; and its effects are every where visible, and especially among us. Man has found new allies and auxiliaries, in the powers of nature, and in the inventions of mechanism.

The general doctrine of political economy is, that wealth consists in whatever is useful or convenient to man, and that labor is the producing cause of all this wealth. This is very true. But, then, what is labor? In the sense of political writers, and in common language, it means human industry; but in a philosophical view, it may receive a much more comprehensive meaning. It is not, in this view, human toil only—the mere action of their hands and muscles; but it is any active agency which working upon the materials with which the world is supplied, brings forth products useful or convenient to man. The materials of wealth are in the earth, in the seas, and in their natural and unaided productions. Labor obtains them, works upon them, and fashions them to human use. Now, it has been the object of scientific art, or of the application of science to art, to increase this active agency, to augment its power, by creating millions of labor in the form of automatic machines, all to be diligently employed, and kept at work by the force of natural powers. To this end these natural power principally those of steam and falling water, are subsidized and taken into human employment. Spinning machines, power-looms, and all the mechanical devices, acting, among other operative in the factories and work-shops, are but so many laborers. They are usually denominated labor-saving machines, but it would be more just to call them labor-doing machines. They are made to do active agents; to have motion, and to produce effect and though without intelligence, they are guided by those laws of science, which are exact and perfect, and they produce results, therefore, in general, more accurate than the human hand is capable of producing. When we look upon one of these, we behold a mute fellow-laborer, of immense power, of mathematical exactness, and of ever-during and unwearyed effort. And while he is thus a most skillful and productive laborer, he is a none-consumer—at least, beyond the wants of his mechanical being. He is not clamorous for food, raiment, or shelter, and makes no demands for the expenses of education. The eating and drinking, the reading and writing and clothes-wearing world, are benefited by the labors of these co-operatives, in the same way as if providence had provided for their service millions of beings, like ourselves in external appearance, able to labor and to toil, and yet requiring little or nothing for their own consumption or subsistence; or rather, as if providence had created a race of giants, each of whom, demanding no more for his support and consumption than a common laborer, should yet be able to perform the work of a hundred.

Now, sir, turn back to the Massachusetts tables of production, and you will see that it is these automatic allies and co-operators, and these powers of nature, thus employed and placed under human direction, which have come, with such prodigious effect, to man's aid, in the great business of procuring the means of living, of comfort, and of wealth, and which have so swollen the products of her skillful industry. Look at these tables once more, sir, and you will see the effects of labor, united with and acting upon capital. Look yet again, and your will see that credit, mutual trust, prompt and punctual dealings, and commercial confidence, are all mixed up as indispensable elements in the general system.

I will ask you to look yet once more, sir, and you will perceive that general competence, great equality in human condition, a degree of popular knowledge and intelligence, no where suppressed, if any where equalled, and the prevalence of good moral sentiment, and extraordinary general prosperity, is the result of the whole. Sir, I have done with Massachusetts. I do not praise the old "Bay State" of the revolution; I only present her as she is.

Mr. President, such is the state of things actually existing in the country, and of which I have now given you a sample. And yet there are persons who constantly clamor against this state of things. They call it aristocracy. They beseech the poor to make war upon the rich, while, in truth, they know not who are either rich or poor. They complain of oppression, speculation, and the pernicious influence of accumulated wealth. They cry out loudly against all banks and corporations, and all the means by which small capitals become united, in order to produce important and beneficial results. They carry on a mad hostility against all established institutions. They would choke up the fountains of industry, and dry all its streams.

In a country of unbounded liberty, they clamor against oppression. In a country of perfect equality, they would move heaven and earth against privilege and monopoly. In a country where property is more equally divided than any where else, they rend the air with the shouting of agrarian doctrines. In a country where the wages of labor are high beyond all parallel, and where lands are cheap, and the means of living low, they would teach the laborer that he is but an oppressed slave. Sir, what can such men want? What do they mean? They can want nothing, sir, but to enjoy the fruits of other men's labor. They can mean nothing, but disturbance and disorder: the diffusion of corrupt principles, and the destruction of the moral sentiments and moral habits of society. A licentiousness of feeling and of action is sometimes produced by prosperity itself. Men cannot always resist the temptation to which they are exposed by the very abundance of the bounties of providence and the very happiness of their own condition; as the steed, full of the pasture, will, sometimes, throw himself against its enclosures, break away from its confinement, and, feeling now free from needless restraint, betake himself to the moors and barrens, where want, ere long, brings him to his senses, and starvation and death close his career.

Having said so much, sir, on the general condition of the country, and explained what I understand by credit, I proceed to consider the present actual state of the currency.

The most recent treasury estimate, which I have seen, supposes that there are eighty millions of metallic money now in the country. This I believe, however, to be a good deal too high; I cannot believe it exceeds sixty, at most; and supposing one-half this sum to be in the banks, thirty millions are in circulation, or in private hands. We have seven hundred banks and branches, with capitals assigned for the security of their notes and bills, amounting to two hundred and eighty millions. The amount of bank notes in actual circulation is supposed to be one hundred millions; so that our whole circulation is about one hundred and thirty millions. The amount of debts due to the banks, or the amount of their loans and discounts, may be taken at four hundred and fifty millions.

Now, sir, this very short statement exhibits at once a general outline of our existing system of currency and credit. We see a great amount of money or property in banks, as their assigned and appropriate capital, and we see a great amount due to these banks. These bank debtors generally belong to the classes of active business, or are such as have taken up credits for purposes of investment in lands or merchandise, looking to future proceeds as the means of repayment. If we compare this state of circulation, of bank capital and bank debt, with the same things in England, important differences will not fail to strike us.

The whole paper circulation of England, by the latest accounts, is twenty-eight millions sterling—made up of eighteen millions of Bank of England notes, and ten millions of the notes of private bankers and joint-stock companies; bullion in the bank, nine and a half millions; debts due the Bank of England, twenty-two and a half millions. The amount of loans and discounts by private bankers and joint-stock companies is not usually stated, I believe, in the public accounts. If it bear the same proportion to their notes in circulation, as in the case of the Bank of England, it would exceed twelve millions. We may, therefore, take the amount of bank debts in England to be thirty-five millions. But I suppose that, of the securities held by the Bank of England, exchequer notes constitute a large part; in other words, that a large part of the bank debt is due by government. The amount of coin in actual circulation is estimated to be thirty and a half millions. The whole amount of circulation in England, metallic and paper, is usually stated, in round numbers, at sixty millions; which, rating the pound sterling at $4 80, is equal to two hundred and eighty-eight millions of dollars.

It will be seen, sir, that our paper circulation is one-half less than that of England, but our bank debt is, nevertheless, much greater; since thirty-five millions sterling amount to only one hundred and sixty millions of dollars; and this sum, too, includes the amount of exchequer bills, or government debt in the form of such bills, which the bank holds. These facts are very material to any just comparison of the state of things in the two countries. The whole, or nearly the whole capital of the Bank of England, is lent to the government, not by means of exchequer notes, but on a permanent loan. And as to the private banks and joint-stock companies, though they issue bills for circulation, they have no assigned or appropriated capital whatever. The bills circulate on the private credit of the individual banker, or of those who compose the joint-stock companies. In the United States, an amount of capital, supposed to be sufficient to sustain the credit of the paper and secure the public against loss, is provided by law, in the act of incorporation for each bank, and is assigned as a trust-fund for the payment of the liabilities of the bank. And if this capital be fairly and substantially advanced it is a proper security; and in most cases, no doubt it is substantially advanced. The directors are trustees of this fund, and they are liable, both civilly and criminally, for mismanagement, embezzlement, or breach of trust.

This amount of capital, thus secured, is the basis of loans and discounts; and this is the reason why permanent, or at least long loans are not considered so inappropriate to banking operations, with us, as they are in England. With us, it is evident that the directors are agents holding a fund intended to be loaned, and acting between lender and borrower; and this form of loan has been found exceedingly convenient and useful in the country.

In some states it is greatly preferred to mortgages, though there are others in which mortgages are usual. Whether exactly conformable to the true notion of banking or not, the truth is, that the object and operation of our banks is to loan money; and this is mostly on personal security. The system, no doubt, is liable to abuse, in particular instances. There may be directors who will loan too freely to themselves and their friends. Gross cases of this kind have recently been detected and exposed, and, I hope, will be suitably treated; but, considering the great number of banks, these instances, I think, are remarkably few. In general the banks have been well conducted, and are believed to be solvent and safe.

We have heard much, sir, in the course of this debate, of excess in the issue of bank notes for circulation. I have no doubt, sir, that there was a very improper expansion some years ago. When president Jackson, in 1832, had negatived the bill for continuing the Bank of the United States, (which act I esteem as the true original source of all the disorders of the currency,) a vast addition was immediately made to the number of state banks. In 1833, the public deposits were removed from the Bank of the United States, and placed in selected state banks. And for the purpose of showing how much better the public would be accommodated without, than with, a bank of the United States, these banks were not only encouraged, but admonished to be free and liberal in loans and discounts, made on the strength of the public moneys, to merchants and other individuals. The circular letter from the treasury department, addressed to the new deposit banks, under date of 26th September, 1833, has this significant clause, which could not have been misunderstood:

"The deposits of public money will enable you to afford increased facilities to commerce, and to extend your accommodation to individuals; and as the duties which are payable to the government arise from the business and enterprise of the merchants engaged in foreign trade, it is but reasonable that they should be preferred in the additional accommodation which the public deposits will enable your institution to give, whenever it can be done without injustice to the claims of other classes of the community."

Having read this letter, sir, I ask leave to refer the senate to the 20th section of the bill now before us. There we find that, "if any officer charged with the safe-keeping of the public money, shall loan the same, or any portion thereof, with or without interest, such act shall be deemed an embezzlement and a high misdemeanor, and the party convicted thereof shall be sentenced to imprisonment." Sir, what a pretty piece of consistency is here! In 1833 the depositaries of the public money were not even left to their own desire for gain, or their wishes to accommodate others, as being sufficient incentives to lend it out: they were admonished and directed to afford increased facilities to commerce, and to extend their accommodation to individuals, since the public moneys in their vaults would enable them to give such additional accommodation! Now, sir, under this bill, any officer who shall do any one of the same things, instead of being praised, is to be punished: he is to be adjudged guilty of embezzlement and of a high misdemeanor, and is to be confined, for aught I know, in cells as dark and dismal as the vaults and safes which are to contain our metallic currency. But although I think, sir, that the acts of government created this expansion, yet I am certainly of opinion that there was a very undue expansion created. A contraction, however, had begun; and I am of opinion, that had it not been for the specie order of July, 1836, and for the manner in which the deposit law was executed, the banks would have gone through the crisis without suspension. This is my full and firm belief. I cannot, however, discuss these points here. They were treated with very great ability, last year, by a gentleman who then occupied one of the seats of Georgia on this floor. Whomsoever he did not satisfy, I cannot convince. Still, sir, the question is, whether there was an excess in the general amount of our circulation, in May last, or whether there be now such excess.

By what standard is this to be judged? If the question be whether there be too much paper in circulation, it may be answered, by reference to the amount of coin in the banks from which the paper issues; because I am unquestionably of opinion—an opinion which I believe nothing can ever shake—that the true criterion by which to decide the question of excess, in a convertible paper currency, is the amount of that paper, compared with the gold and silver in the banks. Such excess would not be proved, absolutely and certainly, in every case, by the mere fact of the suspension of specie payments; because such an event might be produced by panic, or other sudden cause, having power to disturb the best regulated system of paper circulation. But the immediate question now is, whether, taking the whole circulation together, both metallic and paper, there was an excess existing in May, or is an excess now existing? Is one hundred and thirty millions an excessive or undue amount of circulation for the United States? Seeing that one part of this circulation is coin, and the other part paper, resting upon coin, and intended to be convertible, is the whole mass more than may be fairly judged necessary to represent the property, the transactions, and the business of the country? Or, in order to sustain such an amount of circulation, and to keep that part of it which is composed of paper in a safe state, should we be obliged to attempt to draw to ourselves more than our just proportion of that metallic money, which is in the use of all the commercial nations? These questions appear to me to be but different modes of stating the same inquiry.

Upon this subject we may, perhaps, form some general idea, by comparing ourselves with others. Various things, no doubt, exist, in different places and countries, to modify, either by enlarging or diminishing, the demand for money or currency in the transactions of business; still the amount of trade and commerce may furnish a general element of comparison between different states or nations. The aggregate of American imports and exports in 1836 was three hundred and eighteen millions; that of England, reckoning the pound sterling at $4 80, again, was four hundred and eighteen millions, as near as I can ascertain; the currency of England being, as already stated, sixty millions sterling, or two hundred and eighty-eight millions of dollars. If we work out a result from these proportions, the currency of the United States, it will be found, should be one hundred and ninety millions in order to be equal to that of England; but, according to the estimates of the treasury, it did not even in that year exceed one hundred and eighty millions.

Our population is about equal to that of England and Wales. The amount of our mercantile tonnage, perhaps, one-fifth less. But then we are to consider that our country is vastly wider; and our facilities of internal exchange, by means of bills of exchange, greatly less. Indeed there are branches of our intercourse, in which remittances cannot be well made, except in currency. Take one example: The agricultural products of Kentucky are sold to the south; her purchases of commodities made at the north. There can be, therefore, very little of direct exchange between her and the places of purchase and sale. The trade goes round in a circle. Therefore, while the Bank of the United States existed, payments were made to a vast amount in the north and east by citizens of Kentucky, and of the states similarly situated, not in bills of exchange, but in the notes of the bank.

These considerations augment the demand for currency. More than all, the country is new, sir; almost the entire amount of our capital active; and the whole amount of property, in the aggregate, rapidly increasing. In the last three years thirty-seven millions of acres of land have been separated from the wilderness, purchased, paid for, and become subject to private individual ownership, to transfer and sale, and all other dispositions to which other real estate is subject. It has thus become property, to be bought and sold for money; whereas, while in the hands of government, it called for no expenditure, formed the basis of no transactions, and created no demand for currency. Within that short period our people have bought from government a territory as large as the whole of England and Wales, and, taken together, far more fertile by nature. This seems incredible, yet the returns show it. Suppose all this to have been bought at the minimum price of a dollar and a quarter per acre; and suppose the value to be increased in the common ratio in which we know the value of land is increased, by such purchase, and by the preliminary steps and beginnings of cultivation; an immense augmentation, it will readily be perceived, is made, even in so short a time, of the aggregate of property, in nominal price, and, to a great extent, in real value also.

On the whole, sir, I confess I know no standard by which I can decide that our circulation is at present in excess. I do not believe it is so. Nor was there, as I think, any depreciation in the value of money, up to the moment of the suspension of specie payments by the banks, comparing our currency with the currency of other nations. An American paper dollar would buy a silver dollar in England, deducting only the charge of transporting a dollar across the ocean, because it commanded a silver dollar here. There may be excess, however, I admit, where there is no present depreciation, in the sense in which I now use the term. It is hardly necessary to dwell, Mr. President, on the evils of a sudden depreciated circulation. It arrests business, puts an end to it, and overwhelms all debtors, by depression and downfall of prices. And even if we reduce circulation—not suddenly, but still reduce it farther than is necessary to keep it within just and reasonable limits—we produce many mischiefs; we augment the necessity of foreign loans; we contract business, discourage enterprise, slacken the activity of capital, and restrain the commercial spirit of the country. It is very important to be remembered, sir, that, in our intercourse with other nations, we are acting on a principle of equality; that is to say, we do not protect our own shipping interest by peculiar privileges; we ask a clear field, and seek no favor. Yet, the materials for ship-building are high with us, and the wages of ship-builders and seamen are high also. We have to contend against these unfavorable circumstances; and if, in addition to these, we are to suffer further by unnecessary restraints on currency, and by a cramped credit, who can tell what may be the effect? Money is abundant in England, very abundant; the rate of interest, therefore, is low, and capital will be seeking its investment wherever it can hope to find it. If we derange our own currency, compulsively curtail circulation, and break up credit, how are the commerce and navigation of the United States to maintain themselves against foreign competition?

Before leaving, altogether, this subject of an excessive circulation, Mr. President, I will say a few words upon a topic which, if time would permit, I should be glad to consider at more length; I mean, sir, the proper guards and securities for a paper circulation. I have occasionally addressed the senate on this subject before, especially in the debate on the specie circular, in December, 1836; but I wish to recur to it again, because I hold it to be of the utmost importance to prove, if it can be proved, to the satisfaction of the country, that a convertible paper currency may be so guarded as to be secure against probable dangers. I say, sir, a convertible paper currency: for I lay it down as an unquestionable truth, that no paper can be made equal, and kept equal to gold and silver, but such as is convertible into gold and silver, on demand. But, I have gone farther, and still go farther than this; and I contend that even convertibility, though itself indispensable, is not a certain and unfailing ground of reliance. There is a liability to excessive issues of paper, even while paper is convertible at will. Of this, there can be no doubt. Where, then, shall a regulator be found? What principle of prevention may we rely on?

Now I think, sir, it is too common with banks, in judging of their condition, to set off all their liabilities against all their resources. They look to the quantity of specie in their vaults, and to the notes and bills becoming payable, as means or assets; and, with these, they expect to be able to meet their returning notes, and to answer the claims of depositors. So far as the bank is to be regarded as a mere bank of discount, all this is very well. But banks of circulation exercise another function. By the very act of issuing their own paper, they affect the amount of currency. In England, the Bank of England, and in the United States, all the banks, expand or contract the amount of circulation, of course, as they increase or curtail the general amount of their own paper. And this renders it necessary that they should be regulated and controlled. The question is, by what rule? To this I answer, by subjecting all banks to the rule which the most discreet of them always follow—by compelling them to maintain a certain fixed proportion between specie and circulation; without regarding deposits on one hand, or notes payable on the other.

There will always occur occasional fluctuations in trade, and a demand for specie, by one country on another, will arise. It is too much the practice, when such occurrences take place, and specie is leaving the country, for banks to issue more paper, in order to prevent a scarcity of money. But exactly the opposite course should be adopted. A demand for specie to go abroad should be regarded as conclusive evidence of the necessity of contracting circulation. If, indeed, in such cases, it could be certainly known that the demand would be of short duration, the temporary pressure might be relieved by an issue of paper to fill the place of departing specie. But this never can be known. There is no safety, therefore, but in meeting the case at the moment, and in conforming to the infallible index of the exchanges. Circulating paper is thus kept always nearer to the character, and to the circumstances of that, of which it is designed to be the representative—the metallic money. This subject might be pursued, I think, and clearly illustrated; but, for the present, I only express my belief that, with experience before us, and with the lights which recent discussions, both in Europe and America, hold out, a national bank might be established, with more regard to its function of regulating currency, than to its function of discount, on principles, and subject to regulations, such as should render its operations extremely useful; and I should hope that, with an example before them of plain and eminent advantage, state institutions would conform to the same rules and principles; and that, in this way, all the advantages of convertible paper might be enjoyed, with just security against its dangers.

I have detained the senate too long, sir, with these observations upon the state of the country, and its pecuniary system and condition.

And now, when the banks have suspended payments, universally; when the internal exchanges are all deranged, and the business of the country most seriously interrupted, the questions are—

Whether the measure before us is suitable to our condition? and

Whether it is a just and proper exercise and fulfilment of the powers and duties of congress?

What, then, sir, will be the practical operation and effect of this measure, if it should become a law?

Like its predecessor of the last session, the bill proposes nothing for the general currency of the country; nothing to restore exchanges; nothing to bring about a speedy resumption of specie payments by the banks. Its whole professed object is the collection and disbursement of the public revenue. Some of its friends, indeed, say, that when it shall go into operation, it will, incidentally, produce a favorable effect on the currency, by restraining the issue of bank paper. But others press it as if its effect was to be the final overthrow of all banks, and the introduction of an exclusive metallic currency for all the uses of the country.

Are we to understand, then, that it is intended, by means, of which this is the first, to rid the country of all banks, as being but so many nuisances, and to abolish all paper currency whatever?

Or is it expected, on the contrary, that after this system shall be adopted for the use of government, there will still be a paper currency in the country for the use of the people?

And if there shall be a paper currency, will that currency consist of irredeemable government paper, or of convertible bank notes, such as have circulated heretofore? These questions must be answered, before we can judge accurately of the operation of this bill.

As to an exclusive metallic currency, sir, the administration on this point is regularly Janus-faced. Out doors, and among the people, it shows itself "all cléquant, all in gold." There, every thing is to be hard money—no paper rags—no delusive credits—no bank monopolies—no trust in paper of any kind. But in the treasury department, and in the houses of congress, we see another aspect—a mixed appearance, partly gold and partly paper; gold for government, and paper for the people. The small voice which is heard here, allows the absolute necessity of paper of some sort, and to some extent. But the shouts in the community demand the destruction of all banks, and the final extermination of all paper circulation.

To the people, the lion roars against paper money in all the loudness and terror of his natural voice; but to members of congress, he is more discreet; lest he should frighten them out of their wits, he here restrains and modulates, and roars "as gently as any sucking dove, or, as it were, any nightingale." The impracticability of an exclusive metallic currency, the absurdity of attempting any such thing in a country like this, are so manifest, that nobody here undertakes to support it by any reasoning or argument. All that is said in its favor, is general denunciation of paper, general outcry against the banks, and declamation against existing institutions, full of sound and fury, signifying nothing.

The moment any one considers it, he sees how ridiculous any such attempt would be. An exclusive metallic circulation for the second commercial country on earth, in the nineteenth century! Sir, you might as well propose to abolish commerce altogether.

The currency of England is estimated at sixty millions sterling; and it is Mr. McCulloch's calculation, that if this currency were all gold, allowing only one quarter of one per cent. for wear of metals, the annual expense, attending such a currency, would be three millions and a quarter a year, or nearly five per cent. upon the whole. With us, this charge would be much greater. The loss of capital would be more, owing to the higher rates of interest; and besides all this, is the cost of transportation, which, in a country so extensive as ours, would be vast, and not easily calculated. We should also require, proportionally, more specie than is requisite in England, because our system of exchange, by means of bills of exchange, is, at present, and would be, under such a system as is proposed, much less perfect and convenient than that of England. Besides, the English metallic circulation is mostly gold, gold being in England the standard metal. With us, silver and gold both are made standards, at a fixed relation; and if we should succeed to keep this relation so true as to preserve both of the precious metals among us, (which, indeed, is not very probable,) our circulation would be still more expensive and cumbersome, from the quantity of silver which it would contain. The silver in the world is estimated to be fifty times that of gold in amount, and consequently something more than three times in value. If both should circulate, therefore, equally, in proportion to value, the currency would be three parts silver, and one gold.

Now, sir, the annual expense of such a circulation, upon the basis of Mr. McCulloch's estimate, would exceed the whole annual expenditure made for our army and our navy. Consider, sir, the amount of actual daily payments made in the country. It is difficult to estimate it, and quite impossible to ascertain it, with any accuracy. But we can form some notion of it, by the daily amount of payments in the banks in some of the cities. In times of prosperous business and commerce, the daily amount of payments in the banks of New York alone has been equal to eight millions. Whether we call this a tenth, a twentieth, or a fiftieth part of all payments and receipts made daily in the country, we see to what an aggregate result the whole would rise. And how is it possible that such amount of receipt and payment could be performed by an actual passing of gold and silver from hand to hand?

Such notions, sir, hardly require serious refutation.

Mr. President, an entire metallic currency would necessarily create banks immediately. Where would the money be kept, or how could it be remitted? Banks of deposit must and would be instantly provided for it. Would the merchants of the cities be seen, in their daily walks of business, with servants behind them, with bags of gold and kegs of silver on their wheel-barrow? What folly is great enough to imagine this? If there were not now a bank note, nor a bank in the country, and if there should be an exclusive specie currency to-morrow morning at nine o'clock, there would be fifty banks before sunset. From necessity, there would be created at once places of deposit; and persons having money in such depositories would draw checks for it, and pass these checks as money, and from one hand they would pass to another; or the depository himself would issue certificates of deposit, and these would pass as currency. And all this would do no more than just to carry us back two or three hundred years, to the infancy of banks. We should then have done nothing but reject the experience of the most civilized nations, for some centuries, as well as all our own experience, and have returned to the rude conceptions of former times. These certificates of deposit would soon be found to be often issued without any solid capital, or actual deposit. Abuses arising from this source would call for legislative interference, and the legislature would find it necessary to restrain the issue of paper intended for circulation, by enacting that such issues should only be made on the strength of competent capital, actually provided and assigned, placed under proper regulation, and managed by persons responsible to the laws. And this would bring us again exactly to the state of things, in which we now are; that is to say, to the use of the paper of banks, established, regulated, and controlled by law. In the mean time, before this process could be carried through, half the community would be made bankrupt by the ruin of their business, and by the violent and revolutionary changes of property which the process would create. The whole class of debtors, all that live more by industry than on capital, would be overwhelmed with unextinguishing destruction.

There will then, sir, be no such thing as an exclusive paper currency. The country will not be guilty of the folly of attempting it.

I should have felt that I had occupied too much time with such a senseless and preposterous suggestion, were it not the manifest object of parliament to press such notions upon the attention of the people, in aid of the war against the banks.

We shall then, sir, have paper of some sort, forming a part of our currency. What will that paper be? The honorable gentleman from South Carolina, admitting that paper is necessary as part of the currency, or circulation, has contended that that paper ought to be government paper—government paper, not convertible nor redeemable, only so far as by being receivable for debts and dues to government. My colleague has endeavored to satisfy the senate, that the aim of the whole system, of which he regards this bill as but part, is to establish a circulation of government paper and a government bank. Other gentlemen have taken the same view of it. But, as the bill itself does not profess any such purpose, I am willing to discuss it in the character in which it presents itself. I take it for what its friends say it is—a bill making further provision for collecting the revenues.

We are, then, sir, still to have paper as a general medium of circulation; that paper is to be the paper of banks; but government is to be divorced from these banks, altogether. It is not to keep its funds in them, as heretofore. It is to have nothing to do with them, but is to collect and disburse its revenues by its own means, and its own officers.

The receipt of the notes of specie-paying banks is to be partially allowed for some time, but it is to be gradually discontinued; and six years hence, we are to arrive at the maturity and the perfection of the system. When that auspicious day comes, government is to receive and to pay out gold and silver, and nothing but gold and silver.

Now, Mr. President, let us anticipate this joyous epoch; let us suppose the six years to have expired; and let us imagine this bill, with its specie payments and all, to be in full operation at the present hour. What will that operation be? In the first place, disregarding all question of public convenience, or the general interests of the people, how will this system work as a mere mode of collecting and paying out revenue? Let us see.

Our receipts and expenditures may be estimated, each, at thirty millions a year. Those who think this estimate too high or too low, may make the necessary allowance. Here, then, is the sum of thirty millions, to be collected and paid out every year; and it is all to be counted, actually told over, dollar after dollar, and gold piece after gold piece; and how many times counted? Let us inquire into that. The importing merchant, whose ship has arrived, and who has cash duties to pay, goes to the bank for his money, and the tellers count it out: that is once. He carries it to the custom-house, pays it, and the clerks count it over: that is twice. Some days afterwards, the collector takes it out of his bags and chests, carries it to the receiver general's office, and there it is counted again, and poured into the bags and chests of that office: that is the third time. Presently a warrant comes from the treasury, in favor of some disbursing officer, and the boxes are opened, and the necessary sums counted out: this is the fourth counting. And, fifthly and lastly, the disbursing officer pays it to the persons entitled to receive it, on contracts, or for pensions, salaries, or other claims. Thirty millions of hard money are thus to be handled and told over five times in the course of the year, and if there be transfers from place to place, then, of course, it is to be counted so much oftener. Government officers, therefore, are to count over one hundred and fifty millions of dollars a year; which, allowing three hundred working days in the year, gives five hundred thousand dollars a day. But this is not all. Once a quarter, the naval officer is to count the collector's money, and the register in the land office is to count the receiver's money. And moreover, sir, every now and then the secretary of the treasury is to authorize unexpected and impromptu countings, in his discretion, and just to satisfy his own mind!

Sir, what a money counting, tinkling, glingling generation we shall be! All the money-changers in Solomon's temple will be as nothing to us. Our sound will go forth unto the lands. We shall all be like the king in the ditty of the nursery:

"There sat the king, a counting of his money."

You will observe, sir, that these receipts and payments cannot be made in parcels, without the actual handling of each piece of coin. The marks on kegs of dollars, and the labels on bags of gold, are not to be trusted. They are a part of credit—and all credit, all trust, all confidence is to be done away with. When the surveyor, for instance, at the custom-house, is to examine the money on hand, in possession of the collector, or receiver general, he is, of course, to count the money. No other examination can come to anything. He cannot tell, from external appearance, nor from the weight, whether the collector has loaned out the money, and filled the bags and boxes up with sand and lead, or not. Nor can counterfeit pieces be otherwise detected than by actual handling. He must open, he must examine, he must count. And so at the land offices, the mints, and elsewhere. If these officers shall have a taste for silver sounds, they are all likely to be gratified.

Mr. President, in all soberness, is not this whole operation preposterous?

It begins by proposing to keep the public moneys. This, itself, in the sense the word is here used, is a perfect novelty, especially in the United States. Why keep the public moneys; that is to say, why hoard them, why keep them out of use? The use of money is in the exchanges. It is designed to circulate, not to be hoarded. All that government should have to do with it, is to receive it to-day that it may pay it away to-morrow. It should not receive it, before it needs it; and it should part with it as soon as it owes it. To keep it—that is, to detain it, to hold it back from general use, to hoard it, is a conception belonging to barbarous times and barbarous governments. How would it strike us, if we should see other great commercial nations acting upon such a system? If England, with a revenue of fifty millions sterling a year, were found to be collecting and disbursing every shilling of it in hard money, through all the ramifications of her vast expenditure, should we not think her mad? But the system is worse here, because it withdraws just so much actual capital from the uses of a country that requires capital, and is paying interest for capital wherever it can obtain it.

But now, sir, allow me to examine the operation of this measure upon the general interest of commerce, and upon the general currency of the country. And in this point of view, the first great question is, What amount of gold and silver will this operation subtract from the circulation of the country, and from the use of the banks?

In regard to this important inquiry, we are not without the means of forming some judgment. An official report from the treasury, made to the other house, shows that, for the last ten years, there has been, at the end of each year, on an average, fifteen millions and four hundred thousand dollars in the treasury. And this sum is exclusive of all that had been collected of the people, but had not yet reached the treasury; and also of all that had been drawn from the treasury by disbursing officers, but which had not yet been by them paid to individuals. Adding these sums together, sir, and the result is, we are on an average for the last ten years, the attached been at least twenty millions of dollars in ten no sol-sury. I do not mean, of course, that this should the whole of it, unappropriated. I mean, and in amount has, in fact, been in the treasury, and it fully appropriated, or not called for under the an of aged in tions; so that if this sub-treasury scheme in Tampa in operation, in times past, of the specie ing, a difference, twenty millions would have been counted and locked up in the safes and vaults. Now, sir, who not believe that, for these ten years, the whole of the amount of silver and gold in the country has ex- ceeded, on the average, fifty or sixty millions. I do not believe it exceeds sixty millions at the present moment; and if we had now the whole system in complete operation, it would lock up, and keep locked up, one full third of all the specie in the country. Locked up I say—boarded—rendered as useless, to all purposes of commerce and business, as if it were carried back to its native mines. Sir, is it not inconceivable that any man should fall upon such a scheme of policy as this? Is it possible that any one can fail to see the destructive effects of such a policy on the commerce and the currency of the country?

It is true, the system does not come into operation all at once. But it begins its demands for specie immediately; it calls upon the banks, and it calls upon individuals, for their hard dollars, that they may be put away and locked up in the treasury, at the very moment when the country is suffering for the want of more specie in the circulation, and the banks are suffering for means to enable them to resume their payments. And this, it is expected, will improve the currency, and facilitate resumption!

It has heretofore been asserted, that the general currency of the country needed to be strengthened, by the introduction of more specie into the circulation. This has been insisted on, for years. Let it be conceded. I have admitted it, and, indeed, contended for the proposition heretofore, and endeavored to prove it. But it must be plain to every body, that any addition of specie, in order to be useful, must either go into the circulation, as a part of that circulation, or else it must go into the banks, to enable them the better to sustain and redeem their paper. But this bill is calculated to promote neither of those ends, but exactly the reverse. It withdraws specie from the circulation and from the banks, and piles it up in useless heaps in the treasury. It weakens the general circulation, by making the portion of specie, which is part of it, so much the less; it weakens the banks, by reducing the amount of coin which supports their circulation. The general evil imputed to our currency, for some years past, is, that paper has formed too great a portion of it. The operation of this measure must be to increase that very evil. I have admitted the evil, and have concurred in measures to remedy it. I have favored the withdrawing of small bills from circulation, to the end that specie might take their place. I discussed this policy, and supported it, as early as 1832. My colleague, who, shortly after that period, was placed in the chair of the chief magistracy of Massachusetts, pressed its consideration, at length, upon the attention of the legislature of that state. I still think it was a right policy. Some of the states had begun to adopt it. But the measures of the administration, and especially this proposed measure, throw this policy all aback. They undo at once all that we have been laboring. Such, and so pertinacious has been the demand of government for specie, and such new demand does this bill promise to create, that the states have found themselves compelled again to issue small bills for the use of the people. It was a day of rejoining, as we have lately seen, among the people of New York, when the legislature of that state suspended the small-bill restraining law, and furnished the people with some medium for small payments, better than the miserable trash which now annoys the community.

The government, therefore, I insist, is evidently breaking down its own declared policy; it is defeating, openly and manifestly defeating, its own professed objects.

And yet, theory, imagination, presumptuous generalization, the application of military movements to questions of commerce and finance, and the abstractions of metaphysics, offer us, in such a state of things, their panacea. And what is it? What is it? What is to cure or mitigate these evils, or what is to ward off future calamities? Why, sir, the most agreeable remedy imaginable; the kindest, tenderest, most soothing, and solacing application in the whole world! Nothing, sir, nothing upon earth, but a smart, delightful, perpetual, and irreconcilable warfare, between the government of the United States and the state banks! All will be well, we are assured, when the government and the banks become antagonistical! Yes, sir, "antagonistical!" that is the word. What a stroke of policy is this! It is as delicate a stratagem "as on velvet Lear's, and a good deal like it. It pro- and then, we should tread lightly along, in felt or Sir, we will we get the banks within our power, resumpt "kill, kill, kill!" with great talk as much as we please about the resumption of specie payments, but I tell you that, fear government thus warring upon the banks, if suspension should take place, another suspension I would follow. It is not war, successful or unsuccessful, between government and the banks; it is only peace, trust, confidence, that can restore the prosperity of the country. This system of perpetual annoyance to the banks, this hoarding up of money which the country demands for its own necessary uses, this bringing of the whole revenue to act, not in aid and furtherance, but in direct hindrance and embarrassment of commerce and business, is utterly irreconcilable with the public interest. We shall see no return of former times till it be abandoned—altogether abandoned. The passage of this bill will create new alarm and new distress.

People begin already to fear their own government. They have an actual dread of those who should be their protectors and guardians. There are hundreds of thousands of honest and industrious men, sir, at this very moment, who would feel relieved in their circumstances, who would see better prospect of an honest livelihood, and feel more sure of the means of food and clothing for their wives and children, if they should hear that this measure had received its death. Let us, then, sir, away with it. Do we not see the world prosperous around us? Do we not see other governments and other nations enlightened by experience, and rejecting arrogant innovations and theoretic dreams, accomplishing the great ends of society?

Why, sir, why are we, why are we alone among the great commercial states? Why are we to be kept on the rack and torture of these experiments? We have powers, adequate, complete powers. We need only to exercise them; we need only to perform our constitutional duty, and we shall spread content, cheerfulness, and joy, over the whole land.

This brings me, sir, to the second inquiry.

Is this measure, Mr. President, a just exercise of the powers of congress, and does it fulfil all our duties?

Sir, I have so often discussed this point, I have so constantly insisted, for several years past, on the constitutional obligation of congress to take care of the currency, that the senate must be already tired of the speaker, if not weary of the topic; and yet, after all, this is the great and paramount question. Until this is settled, the agitation can never be quieted. If we have not the power, we must leave the whole subject in the hands of those who have it, or in no hands; but if we have the power, we are bound to exercise it, and every day's neglect is a violation of duty. I therefore again insist, that we have the power, and I again press its exercise on the two houses of congress. I again assert, that the regulation of the general currency—of the money of the country, whatever actually constitutes that money—is one of our solemn duties.

(To be concluded.)

TWENTY-FIFTH CONGRESS.

SECOND SESSION—SENATE.

March 30. The bill from the house making appropriations for the support of the army for 1838, was read twice and referred.

Mr. Grundy laid on the table a second substitute for the bill to reduce and graduate the price of the public lands. Read and ordered to be printed.

[Mr. G.'s substitute provides that the price of the public lands shall be reduced twenty-five cents for every five years that they shall continue in the market, till reduced to the minimum price of fifty cents; waiting, in each case, an additional year before the reduction is made. It provides for no estimate or classification of the lands, as proposed by the first substitute.]

The following bills were severally read a third time and passed:

To revive and continue in force the act granting pensions to persons disabled by wounds received in the revolutionary war.

To give effect to the eighth article of the treaty of 1819 with Spain.

The senate resumed the consideration of the bill to prohibit the giving or accepting of a challenge within the District of Columbia, to fight a duel, and for the punishment thereof.

Mr. Clayton expressed his desire that the main object of this bill might be obtained, and his willingness to vote for the bill in its present form rather than have no measure of prevention; still he regarded the bill as both unjust in some of its features, and not likely to be carried into effect on account of its severity.

Mr. Prentiss argued that the criminality of taking the preliminary steps in this District for a duel to be consummated out of the District, would be materially aggravated by the intention in so doing to evade the law of the District.

Mr. Linn, admitting all the evils of duelling, and the importance of suppressing it as far as possible, yet urged the difficulty of having laws against duelling duly executed. To illustrate this point, he alluded to a particular case in his own knowledge, in which the legal penalty, and a very heavy one, was remitted almost by acclamation by the legislature; and also to the fact that far disproportionate success had attended the attempts of various states to suppress duelling. When people, he said, were determined to marry or to fight, no law could prevent them from coming together.

The subject being still up, the senate, after an executive session, adjourned till Monday.

April 2. After the presentation of a number of petitions, and the transaction of some business of minor importance,

The bill for the relief of Samuel Milligan was read a third time, and passed.

The senate concurred in the amendment of the house to the bill directing the expenditure of appropriations heretofore made for the removal of the troops from fort Gibson; which amendment provides that the new fort shall be erected at or near the western boundary of Arkansas, instead of at or near old fort Smith. This concurrence was made with the understanding that the new fort would be erected at or near the site of fort Smith, if it could be purchased at a reasonable price.

The house bills for the relief of David and James Robinson and others, of Isaac and William Wellborn, of William Enos, of David H. Maxwell, and the bill authorizing the sale of the old custom-house, &c. at Bath, Maine, and the appropriation of the proceeds toward the purchase of a new site and the erection of a new custom-house, were severally considered, and ordered to a third reading.

A message was received from the house of representatives, by Mr. Franklin, their clerk, announcing the death of the honorable Isaac McKim, a member of that house from the state of Maryland, and that his funeral would take place from their hall at 11 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. Grundy rose and addressed the senate as follows:

Mr. President: In the absence of both the senators from Maryland, I have been requested by the delegation in the other house from that state, to move a concurrence with the resolutions of the house of representatives, in honor of the memory of the deceased.

A few days since he was amongst us, in all the vigor of health. Within a few hours only before his death, he was actually engaged in the faithful discharge of the arduous duties assigned him by his country. He is now gone; and those who esteemed him and loved him, will see him no more.

Mr. McKim was emphatically the author of his own fortunes. He commenced life in very moderate circumstances, without the patronage of influential friends. His industry and energy, under the guidance of a clear and discriminating intellect, enabled him to amass a fortune, not only ample, but magnificent.

He not only knew how to acquire property, but he knew how to use it. The accumulation of wealth in him did not beget the passion of avarice. Go to the city of his residence, and the inhabitants can point out innumerable instances of his noble charities, and monuments of his munificence and liberality.

He had reached a good old age. He had been honored by his fellow-citizens with a seat in the senate of his state, and he had often been elected to fill the station he lately occupied. We, his associates, knew that, although he was unassuming and unpretending, he brought into our councils a stock of useful and practical knowledge possessed by few men.

The reflection that he lived worthily, and died probably without a single enemy, will comfort, and in some degree alleviate the sorrows, of her who was the partner of his bosom and sharer of his joys and sorrows, and those relatives and friends who now deplore his loss.

Mr. Grundy then submitted the following resolution, which was adopted unanimously:

Resolved unanimously, That the senate will attend the funeral of the honorable Isaac McKim, late a member of the house of representatives from the state of Maryland, at 11 o'clock to-morrow; and, as a testimony of respect for the memory of the deceased, they will go into mourning by wearing crape on the left arm for thirty days.

On motion of Mr. Grundy,

The senate adjourned to meet to-morrow at 1 o'clock.

April 4. Among the petitions, &c. presented this morning, were the following:

By Mr. Merriek: Resolutions of the legislature of Maryland, on the subject of finance and currency generally, and especially in opposition to the sub-treasury scheme. Read, laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Wright, from the committee on finance, reported, without amendment, the bill from the house referred to them, making appropriations for the support of the army for 1838.

The bills from the house, for the relief of the heirs of Robert Fulton, of capt. John Downes, and another, were read twice and referred.

The bills for the relief of Isaac and William Wellborn, of David H. Maxwell, of William Eadus of the captors of the privateer Lydia, of Mose Campen, and the bill authorizing the sale of property and the application of the avails toward a new custom-house at Bath, Maine, were severally read a third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. Knight, the committee of commerce were instructed to inquire into the expediency of ordering a survey of the harbor of Providence, Rhode Island, preparatory to the removal of the sand bar at the mouth of that harbor.

The senate proceeded to consider the bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expense of the government for 1838.

After a brief conversation by Messrs. Wright, Crittenden, Niles, and Grundy, the only amendment from the committee, authorizing the transfer of funds in the post office department from any branch of the service to any other, was adopted.

Mr. Crittenden offered an amendment to the bill requiring that the salary of the postmaster general and all other expenses of the department should be paid from its own income. Mr. C. supported this amendment chiefly on the ground that it is an admitted principle, in relation to the department, that it shall sustain itself, and that the funds of the department are now abundant, while the general treasury is in debt.

Mr. Wright opposed the amendment on the ground that it had been the general practice to pay clerks hire in the general post office and the salary of the postmaster general out of the general treasury, without regard to the income of the department; and also, on the ground that such a restriction would curtail so much the mail accommodations.

Mr. Grundy also objected to the amendment, that the late contracts of the department had been more unfavorable than usual, that many new routes were required; and that if the franking privilege should be taken into the account, the department would still far more than support itself.

The amendment was lost, and the bill, as amended from the committee, was ordered to a third reading.

The bill from the house, making appropriations for the support of the army for 1838, was taken up and considered, and, after a brief explanation by Mr. Wright, it was ordered to a third reading. Subsequently read a third time, and passed.

The senate took up the bill providing that, after the expiration of six months, the money for pensions remaining unpaid in the hands of agents should be returned to the treasury, where only such pensions should then be paid.

On motion of Mr. Hubbard, the bill was amended so as to extend the above time to eight months.

and the bill, so amended, was ordered to a third reading.

On motion of Mr. Roane, the bill to establish a criminal court in the District of Columbia was considered, amended, and ordered to a third reading.

The senate resumed the consideration of the bill to prohibit the giving and accepting of challenges to duels in the District of Columbia.

Mr. Preston made some remarks, (to be published hereafter,) chiefly in vindication of southern gentlemen and the southern community, in reply to some observations of Mr. Smith, of Connecticut. The bill still being up

The senate adjourned, after an executive session.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Friday, March 30. On leave, memorials were presented by Messrs. Fairfield, Grennell, and Taylor, on the subject of the late duel, and, on motion, were referred to the select committee now in session.

On motion of Mr. Henry Johnson,

Resolved, That the committee of ways and means inquire into the expediency of increasing the salaries of the officers of the mint establishment at New Orleans.

Mr. McKay, from the committee on military affairs, reported a joint resolution from the senate directing the expenditure of an appropriation heretofore made for the removal of the troops from fort Gibson, with an amendment; which was read and concurred in by the house, and the resolution was ordered to be read a third time to-day.

The Speaker laid before the house a letter from the secretary of the treasury in answer to a resolution of the house of the 5th instant, requiring copies of all letters written by him to collectors and receivers between the 1st of January, 1834, and the present time, having reference to defalcations, omissions to comply with the laws and regulations established for their government, and other irregularities, &c. &c.

The following resolution, offered by Mr. Hopkins, came up in order:

Resolved, That a select committee, consisting of five members, be appointed, whose duty it shall be to make a faithful and comprehensive investigation into all such abuses as may exist in the administration of the legislative branch of the federal government, with a view to the speedy correction of the same by the adoption of such a system of reform and retrenchment in the contingent expenses thereof as the public good may require; and that the said committee be instructed also to inquire into the expediency of divorcing, by law, the government from the public press, by prohibiting, in future, every officer thereof, in his official capacity, from employing any conductor of a political journal to execute any portion of the public printing.

Mr. Hopkins, the mover of this resolution, defended the same, in a few remarks. He viewed the connexion of the government with the press in any way or mode, as tending to great abuse and corruption, in the great amount of patronage the government is enabled to give to the press. He considered this the most important measure of reform that could possibly be presented to congress.

Mr. Cushman was in favor of the proposed reform, and was glad that the gentleman proposed to commence it where it should be in this house. He had long heard the outcry against executive abuses, but had ever believed that that outcry should rather be raised against the conduct of this house in connexion with the press. Mr. C. was, however, opposed to the resolution, because there was no press not liable, whilst having the government printing, to become a partisan press. Mr. C. having concluded,

Mr. Clark asked the chairman of the committee of ways and means when he proposed that the house go into committee of the whole on the sub-treasury bill?

Mr. Cambreleng replied, so soon as the appropriation bills shall have been gone through with.

The bill for the relief of the heirs of Robert Fulton, which has once been passed by the house, came up for discussion, on the motion of Mr. Thompson to reconsider the vote by which it was carried.

Mr. Duncan, of Ohio, had the floor, and made an extended speech in opposition to the bill. He took the grounds that Mr. Fulton was not entitled to the credit he had enjoyed of being the first to apply steam-power to the propelling of boats, &c.

Mr. Hoffman replied to the objections urged on to-day, and on the former day when the subject was up, against the bill, defending its various items, and vindicating the memory of Fulton against the attacks of Messrs. Craig, Duncan, and Russell.

Mr. Thompson made some remarks in defence of the motion to re-consider, and was followed by

Mr. Whittlesey, who opposed it, and defended the bill at length, and in minute detail.

Mr. Cushman rose, and moved the previous question, but withdrew it at the request of Mr. Biddle, who rose to correct some errors, in fact, of Mr. Duncan, relative to the introduction of steamboats upon the waters of the Ohio, to defend the bill on its merits, and to discuss the question of re-consideration, as applicable to the present case.

Mr. B. concluded this debate (a report of which we shall give hereafter) by renewing, as he had promised to do, the motion for the previous question, which was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

The yeas and nays being ordered on the question of re-consideration, it was decided as follows: yeas 81, nays 87. And the bill, as passed, was sent to the senate for their concurrence.

On motion, the house adjourned at a quarter before 5 o'clock.

Saturday, March 31. Reports having been called for, the following was presented:

Mr. W. Cost Johnson, from the committee on accounts, made a report reducing and fixing the number and compensation of messengers, pages, &c. in the employ of the house, and prescribing certain duties to the sergeant-at-arms, doorkeeper, &c. and gave notice that he should on Monday next call up this report, and ask the action of the house upon it.

Mr. Hopkins, of Virginia, resumed the debate cut off by the expiration of the morning hour yesterday, by some further remarks in support of the resolution offered by him on the subject of retrenchment and reform, and the divorce of the government from the press, and was followed by

Mr. Bond, of Ohio, who spoke at considerable length in support of the resolution referring to and copiously quoting the celebrated retrenchment report in 1833, and insisting that none of the reforms then urged had since taken place; but, on the contrary, the expenses of the government had been greatly increased. Mr. B. also quoted reports to show the enormous sums paid to the editor of the government organ for printing for the executive offices, &c. Before he had concluded, the morning hour expired, and the discussion lies over.

Several senate bills received their first and second readings, and were committed.

On the reference of the bill to carry into effect the 8th article of the treaty of Ghent, a desultory discussion arose, which, ever and anon, diverged into references to the merits of the bill, so as to render it frequently necessary for the chair to interfere, and confine the discussion to the question before the house.

Mr. Johnson, of Louisiana, moved that the bill be referred to the committee on foreign affairs.

Mr. Harlan advocated the reference of the bill to the committee on private land claims, because the object of the bill was to settle certain private claims to the lands between the Perdido and the Pearl rivers. In this motion he was supported by Mr. Williams, of North Carolina, and Mr. Lawler.

Mr. Garland, of Louisiana, opposed this reference on the ground that that committee stood committed, and had made up their minds in relation to these claims. He moved that the bill go to the committee on the public lands; because, if the claims were confirmed, compensation must be made to the claimants out of the public domain. Mr. Craig proposed that the bill be referred to a committee of the whole on the state of the union. Mr. Pope thought, as the bill proposed a tribunal for the adjudication of these claims, it ought to be referred to the committee on the judiciary. After a good deal of dispute, the controversy was settled by referring the bill to the committee on private land claims.

A bill for the relief of John Downes was engrossed, read a third time, and passed.

A bill for the relief of N. Quertier and Albert, of New Orleans, was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time to-day.

The house then went into committee of the whole (Mr. Lyon, of Ala., in the chair,) and considered a number of private bills. The committee then rose, reported progress, and the house adjourned.

Monday, April 2. As soon as the journal was read—

Mr. Howard rose and addressed the house as follows:

Mr. Speaker: I rise to perform a duty, the painful extent of which I did not fully appreciate until the present moment. It is from the effort required to control the feelings which are struggling for the mastery, that I am made sensible of the difficulty of the task. Sir, my friend and colleague, who lightened the toils and shared the responsibilities of our joint representation, is no more. After a brief but severe illness, Isaac McKim expired yesterday morning, meeting his fate with exemplary resignation and composure.

Conscious of his approaching end for many days previous to its occurrence, he looked steadily at death as he drew near, step by step, with that unflinching courage which a quiet conscience only can give. Feeling and knowing, as I now feel and know, that he had tried to do his duty, he looked forward without alarm, because he looked backward without self-reproach. His course through life had been the same as his conduct in this house, where, I am sure, he has not left an unkind feeling in the breast of a single member. Engaged in the active pursuits of commerce from an unusually early period of life, he was one, and perhaps the last, of that enterprising class of merchants, whose hazardous, but successful industry, some thirty years ago, built up, at the same time, their own fortunes, and the prosperity of the city which he partly represented upon this floor; but the liberality, with which he dispensed his gains around him, was equal to the sagacity which he manifested in their acquisition. Two public schools, one founded by his father and the other by himself, have long made his name blessed by the destitute widow, to whose children the rich gift of education, thus benevolently and wisely imparted, woods-orphan boys who have habitually attired by brave school of Isaac McKim, may perhaps have attached a sense of the loss which they have sustained in the tears of their widowed mothers, shed in sorrow, will attest their mingled gratitude and remembrance. Sir, to rescue from the temptations and influences of idleness and ignorance any portion of the youth of our country, is to effect a work in which patriotism and philanthropy eminently unite. It was not in this instance alone the kindness and goodness of my deceased friend was manifested. Not cannot call to mind a single individual in our extensive population whose loss will be more felt or deplored. He has passed through life with such an unstained character, that all men of integrity knew him to be their proper associate. Mild and courteous in his deportment towards others, he followed, as a guide in his own conduct, that sincerity and honesty of purpose, upon which his friends never counted in vain.

Next to his family, Mr. Speaker, his loss falls most heavily upon myself. Elected by the same constituency, we have been, for some years, in the habit of the most unreserved communication with each other upon every topic relating to our public duties, and upon his strong sagacity I have been accustomed greatly to rely. His untiring attention to business has long been conspicuous in this house. No care, no time, no labor seemed to him too great to be devoted to the public service. In this house, amongst his constituents, in his state, and by his country, his absence will be felt. It only remains for us to pay such respect to his memory as is due to it, and, for that purpose I offer the following resolutions:

Mr. Howard then offered the following; which were read, and unanimously concurred in.

Resolved, That the members and officers of this house will attend the funeral of Isaac McKim, deceased, late a member of this house from the state of Maryland, at 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to take order for superintending the funeral of Isaac McKim, deceased.

Resolved, That the members and officers of this house will testify their respect for the memory of Isaac McKim by wearing crape on the left arm for thirty days.

Resolved, That when this house adjourn to-day, it will adjourn to meet again on Wednesday, the 4th instant.

Mr. Howard, Mr. Adams, Mr. Cambreleng, Mr. Robertson, Mr. Glascock, Mr. Johnson, of La. and Mr. Miller, were appointed a committee to take order for superintending the funeral in pursuance of the second resolution.

The clerk was ordered to notify the senate of the proceedings of the house, and then

The house adjourned to Wednesday.

The following was the order of arrangements for the funeral.

The committee of arrangements and pall-bearers will attend at the late residence of the deceased, at Gadsby's hotel, on Pennsylvania avenue, at ten o'clock, a. m. Tuesday, April 3d; at which time the remains will be removed, in charge of the committee of arrangements, attended by the sergeant-at-arms of the house of representatives, to the hall of the house.

At 2 o'clock, p. m. funeral service will be performed in the hall of the house of representatives, and, immediately after, the procession will move to the rail-road depot, on Pennsylvania avenue, in the following order:

The chaplains of both houses.
Physicians who attended the deceased.

Mr. Howard, of Maryland, Mr. Adams, of Mass., Mr. Cambreleng, of N. Y., Mr. Taliaferro, of Va., Mr. Glascock, of Ga., Mr. Johnson, of La., Mr. Miller, of Mo.

Pall-bearers, viz:

Mr. McKay, of N. C., Mr. Whittlesey, of O., Mr. Lyon, of Ala., Mr. Ingham, of Conn., Mr. Yell, of Ark., Mr. Southgate of Ky.

The family and friends of the deceased.

The members of the house of representatives and senators from Maryland, as mourners.

The sergeant-at-arms of the house of representatives.

The house of representatives preceded by their speaker and clerk.

The other officers of the house.

The sergeant-at-arms of the senate.

The senate of the United States, preceded by the Vice president and their secretary.

The other officers of the senate.

The heads of departments.

Foreign ministers.

Citizens and strangers.

They will then be placed in the car, which was provided for the purpose, and carried to Baltimore, attended by the chaplains and physicians, the committee of arrangements, the pall-bearers, the delegation from Maryland as mourners, and such of the officers and members of the two houses of congress as may be able to attend, for whom cars will be provided.

On the arrival of the procession at Baltimore, it will move to the place of interment, in the order which is designated above.

Arrangements have been made for the return to Washington, on the same evening, of those who may attend the body to Baltimore.

Tuesday, April 3. Pursuant to order, the house of representatives convened a few minutes before 11 o'clock, for the purpose of attending the funeral obsequies of the hon. Isaac McKim, late a representative in Congress from the state of Maryland; which were performed in conformity to the above arrangements.

Wednesday, April 4. Among the memorials presented to day were the following:

Mr. Birdsall, on leave, presented the memorial of E. Price and one hundred and fifty-seven others, and the memorial of J. W. Patton and two hundred and forty-four others, all inhabitants of the county of Wayne, New York, praying the interposition of congress on the subject of the late duel between Mr. Cilley and Mr. Graves, and the expulsion from congress of every member of that body criminally engaged therein; which, on motion of Mr. B. were referred to the select committee of the house having the affair under investigation.

Mr. Birdsall, also, on leave, presented the petition of Thomas McClintock and thirty-six others, citizens of Waterloo, New York, praying the abrogation of the resolution of Mr. Patton, on the subject of abolition memorials; which was received, and laid on the table.

Mr. Peck, by the unanimous consent of the house, presented the petition of W. H. Stanly and sundry other citizens of Genesee, Livingston county, N. Y. on the subject of the late duel. Also, a similar petition of Shepard Pierce and two hundred and seventy-one other citizens of Livingston, Livingston county, N. Y. Also, a similar petition of J. A. Campbell and one hundred others, citizens of Lima, Livingston county N. Y.

Mr. Henry presented the petition of George Cassidy, of Mercer county, Pennsylvania, a soldier of the late war, who had his arm shot off in the battle of Chippewa, and prays congress for an increase of his pension; which was, on motion, referred to the committee on invalid pensions.

Mr. Thomas, of Maryland, moved that the speaker inform the governor of Maryland of the vacancy in the representation from that state, occasioned by the death of the late honorable I. McKim; which was agreed to.

Mr. Wise asked leave to offer a resolution proposing to convert the vessels now employed for an exploring expedition into a coast squadron, and detailing its duties. But objection being made, Mr. Montgomery moved a suspension of the rules to allow of its being offered; but the motion was negative.

Mr. Graham asked leave to offer a resolution to alter the hour of meeting from 12 to 11 o'clock, A. M. Objection being made, he moved a suspension of the rules to allow of the motion being made.

On this motion, Mr. Cambreleng demanded the yeas and nays; which, being taken, resulted as follows: Yeas 110, nays 29.

So the rules were suspended. The resolution was read, when

Mr. Whittlesey suggested the expediency of having a recess, to admit time for dinner. He had never witnessed a more general attendance and seen more business done than when such a plan was pursued. He moved to amend the resolution by adding that a daily recess be had at half past 2 to 4 p. m.

Mr. Cambreleng hoped the gentleman from Ohio would not press the amendment. Whenever such an arrangement had been adopted, the house had had reason to regret it. He hoped there would be no more night sessions.

Mr. Whittlesey defended his proposition at some length, upon the ground that the arrangement would conduce to the expedition of business. He thought the health of members required some such arrangement. At present, after the hour of two o'clock, it was impossible to keep a quorum in the house; and he gave notice that he should hereafter move a call of the house, whenever this occurred. If members come at 11 o'clock, they need refreshment before 4 or 5; and if any are to remain, all should be required to do so.

Mr. Reed hoped the resolution would be adopted. He agreed with the suggestion of the gentleman from Ohio, and would vote for the amendment proposed. It was improper that the important business of the house should be transacted in the careless and inattentive manner in which it too often is done.

Mr. Pope was opposed to the amendment, and thought it to be fraught with much mischief. He was not willing to walk three-quarters of a mile, and return, after his dinner. Besides, a great many gentlemen took wine at dinner, and that was a kind indulgence that did not tend to render them so attentive and competent to do business as they should be. He thought that it was rather unreasonable for the gentleman from Ohio to make such a proposition at this time of the session. By and by, when it should come to be absolutely necessary, he would go for it.

Mr. Boon opposed the amendment. The days were yet too short. He was in favor of coming to the house at eleven, or even ten, if necessary; but he was opposed to night sessions, as a system to be adopted by the house.

Mr. Whittlesey demanded the yeas and nays on his amendment; which were not ordered.

Mr. Legare was against the amendment. He thought its adoption would do more harm than good. At the extra session, when it was adopted, it did not work advantageously at all. The whole day was lost. Not so much, instead of more, business was done. Members were called on to vote, hastily, and without deliberation or investigation, upon most important questions; and thus their decisions were crude and hasty, for want of time to form them deliberately. In the case of the Mississippi election, he would have given any thing for a better opportunity to study and investigate all the points in that case. He was in hopes the amendment would not prevail.

Mr. Williams agreed with Mr. Legare as to the inutility of a recess. There was no time gained by it. The night sessions were injurious to the health of members. If the house made it his duty to attend at 11, or even 10, and to sit till sunset, he would do it; but he was opposed to an arrangement which would protract the sessions till night.

Mr. Cambreleng said that had this proposition come from a new member of the house, it would not have surprised him, as it did, coming from so experienced and industrious a member as the gentleman from Ohio. An hour for business before dinner was worth more than all the evening session; and were this amendment adopted, it would retard the public business one-half.

Mr. Whittlesey's amendment was rejected.

The original resolution was adopted.

Mr. Cambreleng then rose and said that he believed the morning hour had expired.

The Speaker replied that it had not yet commenced. It commenced with the call for reports.

On leave, Mr. Pickens presented a memorial from Mr. Mills, the architect employed on the treasury building; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. Bronson asked, and was refused leave, to present a memorial.

Mr. Dawson asked the house to take up a bill reported by the committee upon mileage. But the house refused to take it up.

The Chair presented several executive communications.

The remainder of the day was occupied in considering the resolutions reported by the committee on the duties and officers of the house, which were amended and adopted.

The house then adjourned.

THURSDAY'S PROCEEDINGS.

Senate, April 5. After some business of minor importance, the bill to establish a criminal court in the District of Columbia was taken up and passed.

On motion of Mr. Benton, the committee of finance were instructed to inquire whether additional supplies are needed by the treasury for the present year; and if so, to inquire also whether it is best to raise such supplies by the sale of the bonds given by the United States Bank of Pennsylvania for United States stock in the late Bank of the United States, or by resorting to loans.

The senate resumed the consideration of the bill to suppress giving and accepting challenges to duels in the District of Columbia.

Mr. Smith, of Connecticut, spoke at considerable length in reply to Mr. Preston, re-asserting his former ground, that the north ought to be protected from the south by an anti-duelling law.

Mr. Pierce earnestly repudiated the idea that this bill was in any way to be regarded as a measure to protect the north against the south. He insisted that the north required and asked no such protection. The object was and ought to be to suppress an evil and immoral practice, and for that purpose alone he would give his support to such a measure as he thought likely to be most efficient.

Mr. Preston made a brief rejoinder, insisting that all duels are the result of mutual agreement, the impelling force on both sides being equally a moral one; and he remarked further on the impropriety of sectional assaults, and of opprobrious epithets applied to persons now under trial, (by the investigation in the other house.)

Mr. Grundy expressed the belief that public opinion every where was decidedly against the practice; he knew it to be contrary to the laws of God and man, and what he wished was to pass such a law as would be best calculated to suppress it. He argued that for this purpose the substitute of Mr. Clayton was best, for which, therefore, he would give his vote.

Mr. Prentiss spoke briefly in favor of the original bill, and against the substitute of Mr. Clayton as sufficient to effect the object proposed.

The bill being still up, and Mr. Linn having expressed a desire to consider further the question of inflicting the same punishment on seconds as on principals in a duel,

The senate adjourned, after an executive session.

House of representatives, Thursday, April 5. Mr. Patton, on leave, offered a resolution appointing Mr. McCormick (the present incumbent) postmaster to this house; which was agreed to, nem con.

Mr. McKennan offered a resolution that the house would on Monday next, at 2 o'clock, proceed to the election of a doorkeeper, in the place of Overton Carr deceased. Mr. Cambreleng objecting, the question was put, and the resolution agreed to: yeas 92, nays 34.

Mr. Gray, of New York, moved to amend it by substituting this day, at 2 o'clock; but it was negatived yeas 69, nays 73. Mr. Sherrod Williams then moved to suspend the election of a doorkeeper until the first Monday of December next. On this motion, Mr. Cambreleng demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered. A brief debate now ensued, after which, the question was put on Mr. Williams' motion, and decided in the negative: yeas 74, nays 91. Mr. Sherrod Williams now offered to amend the resolution of Mr. McKennan for an election, by adding a clause declaring that, after the election of a door-keeper, the office of assistant doorkeeper be dispensed with.

The amendment was rejected without debate.

Mr. Russell, of New York, moved to amend the resolution by striking out "Monday next at 2 o'clock, and inserting "forthwith;" which was agreed to: yeas 97.

The resolution, as thus amended, was agreed to. Candidates, twenty in number, were then put in nomination, by different members.

Mr. Sherrod Williams proposed that it be agreed, before going into the election, that, after each unsuccessful ballot, (if such should be,) the candidate having the smallest number of votes be dropped, and so on until an election should be made.

But the Chair decided that this amounted to an alteration of the rule of the house, touching the election of officers, and therefore would require a vote of two-thirds. The proposition was negatived.

The house then proceeded to ballot for a doorkeeper. After the 6th ballot, Mr. Jos. Follansbee having received 91 out of 177 votes, was declared to be duly elected. Mr. Follansbee appeared accordingly, and was qualified.

Civil and diplomatic appropriation bill.

This bill came from the senate slightly amended.

The amendment was concurred in by the house. [The bill now only wants the signature of the president of the United States to become a law.]

The pension bill came from the senate with amendment, which was concurred in.

Several bills from the senate (chiefly private) were read for the first time, and were appropriately referred.

On motion of Mr. Legare,

Resolved, That the committee on revolutionary claims be instructed to inquire into the expediency of granting to Mrs. Brown, daughter of sergeant Jasper, the commutation pay of a subaltern officer, or such other compensation as she may be, in the opinion of the committee entitled to under the laws and the practice of congress.

The Speaker laid before the house a message from the president of the United States, transmitting a report from the secretary of state, with accompanying papers, in answer to the resolution of the house of 21st ult. requesting information respecting the destruction of the steamboat Caroline.

Also, a communication from the secretary of treasury, in answer to the resolution of the 21st ult. relation to lands sold under the pre-emption laws, and associations formed by intruders on the public lands.

After which, the house adjourned.

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

PRINTED AND PUBLISHED, EVERY SATURDAY, BY WILLIAM OGDEN NILES, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

—We are happy to have it in our power to state, that Mr. Poinsett, whose illness we mentioned in our last, is entirely out of danger, and will soon be able to attend to the duties of his office.

—Mr. Jenifer, of Maryland, who was confined on his estate, by severe indisposition, has returned to his duties in the house of representatives.

—Mr. Hunter, of Ohio, has also so far recovered from his indisposition, as to be able to attend in the house.

CONNECTICUT. Mr. Ellsworth, the whig candidate for governor, has been elected by a majority, estimated at nearly 6000 votes. The senate will be comprised of 20 whigs and one friend of the administration. The whig majority in the legislature is very large.

MAINE. Edward Robinson (W) has been elected a member of congress from the Lincoln district, to supply the vacancy occasioned by the death of Mr. Cilley. Mr. McCrate was the opposing candidate. We have not yet seen an official account of the election, but Mr. Robinson's majority is said to be 166 over all the candidates.

NEW YORK CITY. The election for mayor, aldermen, council, &c. took place on Tuesday last and terminated on Thursday evening. The contest was ardent and rallied the entire strength of both parties. We have no returns, but we learn that on the first day 19,209 votes were taken, on the second 11,780, making for the two days 30,989 votes. In the great contest of 1834, the votes given on the corresponding two days amounted to 29,289.

BANKS, CURRENCY, &c. The bank convention assembled in New York on Wednesday last, pursuant to adjournment. The following notices from the New York papers of that day, contain all the information we have yet seen on the subject of its deliberations:

This important convention met to-day at 12 o'clock at the City Hall, according to adjournment.

They sit with closed doors, consequently we can glean but little concerning their proceedings. We can state, however, that a very considerable number of delegates are in attendance, say from 130 to 150. The hon. Samuel Hubbard of Boston, the same gentleman who occupied the chair at the former meeting, presiding on the present occasion. None but preliminary business has as yet been transacted.

The annexed paragraph is from the New York Express, of same date:

The bank convention assembled this morning, according to agreement. It did not take long to ascertain that a decided majority of the convention is opposed to the present resumption of specie payments, because successful resumption, in the present condition of things, is deemed impossible.

The news from Washington and Albany, together with the uncertain position our own banks are about to take, has thrown a gloom over the mercantile community. Stocks have felt the shock very sensibly. The future is all dark and doubtful, and what sort of a plunge our currency is about to take nobody seems to know.

Referring to the convention, the New York Commercial Advertiser of Monday says—

We have no means of knowing the present views of the convention or to what results its deliberations will come. Be the votes of the convention what they may however, the banks of this city and state must resume. There is no alternative. But for a course on their part the wisdom of which we have never been able to perceive, they might readily have received farther indulgence at the hands of the legislature, in the event of such indulgence being necessary. But they have themselves closed the doors against an extension of the suspension law, however necessary it may be to save what remains of this noble and suffering city. Come what will, our banks must resume.

It was stated in the "New York American" a few days ago, that governor Marcy would recommend to the legislature, the expediency of loaning ten millions of state stocks to the banks to enable them to sustain themselves in their resumption of specie payments. But the "Albany Argus" intimates that the governor will not take the lead in this measure, though willing to sanction it, if brought forward by the party in the majority in the legislature.

On Tuesday last Mr. Birdseye offered the following to the consideration of the assembly of N. York.

Whereas the banks of the state of New York, as the fiscal agents of the United States, have heretofore received in deposit large amounts of the federal revenues, all which they have paid over on demand, without loss or defalcation—

And whereas those institutions are now preparing to resume specie payments at an early day, and have evinced a commendable desire to place the currency of this state in a sound condition—

And whereas it is just and proper, that these banks should be adequately sustained in these their praiseworthy efforts, by the confidence of the states and general governments—

Therefore resolved, That all the revenues of this state be continued, as heretofore, to be collected in the notes of the solvent, specie-paying banks of this state, and deposited with those banks for safe keeping.

Resolved, That our senators and representatives in congress be requested to urge the immediate passage of a law, or the adoption of a resolution, directing all the officers of the general government within this state to receive the notes of the specie-paying banks thereof, in payment of all debts due and to become due to the United States, and to disburse the same in payments to be made by the federal government within this state.

We find the following in the "New York American" of Tuesday last, which has been before the banks of New York for more than a month.

WASHINGTON, 18th March, 1838.

DEAR SIR—In reply to yours of the 16th instant. I hasten to remove any erroneous inferences from the rumor mentioned. The settled policy of the department, and one which it makes known to all inquiries is, to promote the resumption of specie payments by the banks, so far as its limited power may permit.

Consequently it has not, and will not hereafter purchase specie beyond what may be needed for immediate disbursement, and in that way will neither hoard it nor compete with others for its possession.

All we receive in any way, will immediately be paid out again to defray the appropriations.

I make these statements explicitly and promptly, and have forwarded similar ones to Boston, in order that no injurious apprehension need be entertained as to the financial operations of the government.

Respectfully, yours,

LEVI WOODBURY.

FROM THE ARMY. St. Augustine, April 6.—Recent arrivals from Jupiter river, inform us that the 500 Indians encamped there, "awaiting the decision of the president," have been captured, by order of gen. Jessup. A part of them have been sent to Key Biscayne, (Cape Florida)—the remainder have gone over land to Tampa Bay. They are in all, 520 in number, men, women, and children; among them 150 to 200 warriors.

A more recent arrival brings information that colonel Bankhead, with his command, after traversing some "terrible" swamps came up with a body of Indians, number not known, but supposed to be Sam Jones' gang, to whom a flag was sent; but the Indians fired upon the flag. An attempt was then made to surround the Indians but without success—they escaped.

An express arrived here a few days since from Micanopy, by which we learn that two men have been killed and scalped in that vicinity. The name of one, we understand was Hogsans—we have not learned the name of the other.

It is reported that Nelson's brigade have gone home

From the Tallahassee "Floridian," March 31.

During the week our town has been filled with troops, col. Snodgrass' command of Alabamians passed through, on their way home, having been discharged. We learn that out of 1200 men, the whole command have lost during four months but three by sickness. Part of the force has been chiefly stationed at posts and garrisons, and the residue near the main army in the lower part of the peninsula.

On Thursday last about 1000 of gen. Nelson's brigade passed through on their route to Columbus, where they are to be discharged. We have the highest respect for those troops. Hardy woodsmen, inured to danger and commanded by brave and intelligent officers, to whom they are attached and have full confidence in, we have seen no soldiers during the war on whose services we should place higher value. The duty assigned them in the protection of the frontier has been faithfully performed. They have been actively engaged in scouring the country from Suwannee to Tampa Bay. No lives have been lost, though on the different skirmishes several have been badly wounded. The brave col. Foster was severely shot through the breast while charging upon an Indian, but we are glad to learn will probably soon recover from its effects.

GENERAL ORDERS—No. 7.

HEAD QUARTERS OF THE ARMY, }
ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE, }

Washington, April 10, 1838.

I. Major-general Jesup having reported that the operations in Florida will have terminated by the 1st of May, and that a portion of the troops will be disposable, the following arrangements will be carried into effect as soon thereafter as practicable.

II. The 1st and 8th regiments of infantry, the six companies of the second infantry and four companies of the second dragoons, will constitute the regular force to remain in Florida, with as many companies of the volunteers or militia of the territory as the officer remaining in command may deem necessary. The three companies of the 8th infantry, now in Louisiana, will forthwith join the head quarters of the regiment at Tampa Bay.

III. The four regiments of artillery, the 4th regiment of infantry, six companies of the 2d dragoons, and the detachment of marines, will repair to the Cherokee country by the most convenient and expeditious routes from the several points at which they may be found on the receipt of this order. The troops, as far as practicable, will move by regiments, and be accompanied by all the officers belonging to each. Should any of the companies ordered to the Cherokee country, occupy stations in Florida from which they should not be immediately withdrawn, they will continue in position until they can be relieved by the troops designated to remain in the territory; after which they will follow their regiments without delay, it being important to concentrate the companies of each regiment.

IV. Two surgeons, and as many assistants as the service may require, will be retained in Florida, to be selected from those whose who have served the shortest period in the territory. All other officers of the medical staff will proceed with the troops ordered to the Cherokee country.

V. Major general Jesup will take all the necessary measures for the prompt execution of this order, and will then turn over the command of the troops in Florida to brevet brigadier general Z. Taylor, colonel of the 1st infantry; and on being relieved, he will repair to the seat of government, and resume the duties of quartermaster general.

VI. The officers at the heads of the several branches of the staff will make the necessary arrangements for moving and supplying the troops on their routes to their destination, and for the service in which they are to be employed.

VII. Major-general Scott is assigned to the immediate command of the troops ordered to the Cherokee country, and the direction of affairs in that quarter. The commanders of regiments and detachments will report to his head quarters, at Athens, in Tennessee, or wherever else they may be established at the time.

By order of ALEXANDER MACOMB,
Major-general commanding-in-chief,

R. JONES,
Adjutant general.

MR. BIDDLE'S LETTER.

TO THE HON. JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, WASHINGTON.

MY DEAR SIR: I propose to say a few words on the question whether the banks should resume specie payments in May next. I do this because my position seems to justify, if not require it. For nineteen years I have been connected with the institution which caused the last resumption, and during all that period my efforts have been directed to secure to the country the benefits of a sound currency, and to banish from circulation every thing but the precious metals and notes always convertible into them. I think no other currency is safe or tolerable; and that we should now return to it at the first moment it can be done permanently. For this purpose the institution to which I belong has made great efforts. Since the suspension in May last it has bought and added to its vaults nearly three millions of dollars in gold and silver; and now with a capital of thirty-five millions, its notes in circulation are six millions, while its specie, after paying more than half a million to the government of the United States, amounts to nearly four millions, and it has eight or ten millions of funds in Europe. Our principles, therefore, incline us to an early resumption; our preparations would justify it—and if we were at all influenced by the poor ambition of doing what others cannot do so readily, or the still poorer desire of profiting by the disasters of others, the occasion would certainly be tempting. But the Bank of the United States makes common cause with the other banks, and the character and prosperity of the country are identified with its banking system. They must stand or fall together; and it is of vital importance that the banks should act wisely and act harmoniously, and above all, that they should not suffer themselves to be driven, by the dread of being thought weak, into rash and hazardous enterprises.

The great prerogative of strength is not to be afraid of doing right; and it belongs to those who have no fear that prudent counsels will be mistaken for timidity, to examine calmly whether the general interest of the country recommend the voluntary resumption of specie payments in May next. I say the voluntary resumption, because there is not now, nor has there ever been, any legal suspension of specie payments as there was for more than twenty years in England. The suspension is wholly conventional between the banks and the community, arising from their mutual conviction that it is for their mutual benefit. In truth, the banks are but the mere agents of that community. They have no funds not already lent out to the people, of whose property and industry they are the representatives. They are only other names for the farms, the commerce, the factories, and the internal improvements of the country—and the inquiry whether the banks are ready to resume is only another form of asking whether the people are ready to pay their debts to the banks.

The true question then, after all, is, whether the time has arrived when the banks should announce that the causes of the suspension, which then satisfied the community, have ceased to exist, and that the suspension itself, with all its necessary attendants of restriction, need no longer be continued. To that inquiry I now proceed. And—

I. What were the causes of the suspension? They were the specie circular, which forbade the receipt of any thing but gold or silver at the land offices—the mismanagement of the deposits, which scattered them to the frontiers—the clamor raised by the executive against banks notes, which alarmed the people for their safety, and caused a run upon the banks for specie. Now has any one of these causes ceased? On the contrary, have they not acquired ten fold force? The specie circular is not repealed. On the contrary, it has been extended, for bank notes are prescribed, not merely from the land offices, but from all payments of every description to the government. The distribution of the surplus is over, because there is no longer any surplus to distribute; but the great disbursements on the southern and western frontiers operate as injuriously by requiring the transfer of so much revenue from the points where it is collected. Lastly, and mainly, the alarm about bank notes propagated by the government, has been deeply spread throughout the country, till what was at first a passing outcry, has settled into an implacable hostility. No man, I think, can doubt for a moment that the executive of the United States seeks to maintain his power by exciting popular passions against the credit system; and that the whole influence of the government is employed to infuse into the minds of the people distrust and hatred of all banks.

For this purpose, the most insane ravings are addressed to the cupidity of the ignorant, who are taught that gold and silver are the only true riches, and above all, that these shrewd metals would enable us to outwit the paper dullness of England. "Sir," said lately one of these politicians in the senate of the United States, "sir, a man loses all by any circumstance that but for that circumstance he would have made. Although England is a paper country, yet if we were exclusively a metallic country we should make more out of our intercourse with her. And why should we, because she chooses to maim herself by her paper system, follow her example." The government, it may be said, is comparatively harmless, because its expenditures exceed its income. Its regular income, no doubt—but while it can pledge the public credit for treasury notes at a high rate of interest by which every man's property is mortgaged, and buy specie with them, there can never be wanting the means of oppressing the banks. There is therefore no one circumstance which occasioned the suspension, sufficiently removed to justify a change, and the most prominent cause remains with increased intensity. Accordingly—

II. The credit system of the United States and the exclusively metallic system are now fairly in the field, face to face with each other. One or the other must fall. There can be no other issue. It is not a question of correcting errors or reforming abuses, but of absolute destruction; not which shall conquer but which shall survive. The present struggle too must be final. If the banks resume and are able, by sacrificing the community, to continue for a few months, it will be exclusively employed at the next elections to show that the schemes of the executive are not as destructive as they will prove hereafter. But if they resume and again are compelled to suspend, the executive will rejoice at this new triumph, and they will fall in the midst of a universal outcry against their weakness. This is perfectly understood, and accordingly all the influence of the executive is directed to drive the banks, by popular outrage and clamor, into a premature resumption—not a business resumption, general and permanent, but a political and forced resumption, which may place them at the mercy of those in power. They who have special charge of these interests must then beware of being deceived from their present position.

They are now safe and strong, and they should not venture beyond their entrenchments while the enemy is in the plain before them. If they resume, one of two things will happen—their notes will not be received by the government or they will be received. If they are not received, the government, to the extent of the revenue, will force the holders of the notes to draw specie from the banks to be deposited with collectors of the revenue. For the difference between the revenue and the expenses, the government will issue treasury notes to be sold for bank notes, and converted into specie, and as the disbursements are made at points on the frontiers, remote from the places of collection, it will not return to the banks issuing it except circuitously. But if the notes are received, they will not, as formerly, be deposited in banks and drawn out again so as to enter into the circulation, leaving the public creditor his choice of specie or notes, but they will be left in special deposit with the receivers. When warrants are drawn on these receivers they will call on the banks for specie to pay the favored public creditor, selecting, of course, the bank on whom they will draw according to its servility or opposition to the executive, and thus placing them all under his control. Now under such circumstances, is it wise for the banks to disarm themselves in the presence of the enemy?

III. The disorders of the currency lie too deep for superficial remedies, and these palliatives irritate without curing. Congress, and congress alone, can apply adequate relief. What Mr. Madison said to congress in 1816, is even more true in 1838. "For the interest of the community at large," said he, "as well as for the purposes of the treasury, it is essential that the nation should possess a currency of equal value, credit and use wherever it may circulate. The constitution has entrusted congress exclusively with the power of creating and regulating the currency of that description." The only reform in the currency which that body has yet made, is the issue of ten millions of irredeemable paper money, and a proposal for ten millions more. Is it worth while then, so long as congress fails to exercise its legitimate powers, to waste the strength of the country in efforts to accomplish what we all know to be impracticable? To resume now without some clear understanding with the government, seems to be throwing away the benefits of experience, and the lessons of misfortune. We have gone through all the mortification and all the inconvenience of suspension. Let us endeavor to profit by them; to fix the future on some solid basis—have some guarantee of the stability of the currency, and not set every thing afloat again without knowing where we may be drifted. For—

IV. Compare the situation of the banks at the last resumption and now. After a suspension for nearly three years, congress applied all its power to induce, to persuade, and to assist the banks in their efforts to resume. They passed the resolution of 1816, authorizing the receipt of the notes of specie paying banks. But this alone was insufficient; and at the same time, they established the Bank of the United States, with a capital of thirty-five millions. That bank called a convention of state banks, and agreed that if they would resume specie payments, it would

1. Assume all their debts to the government of the United States.

2. Discount to those who had payments to make to the government, the whole amount of their bonds; and in addition

3. Discount to those not indebted to the government two millions in New York, two millions in Philadelphia, one and a half million in Baltimore, and a half million in Richmond—and

5. Would sustain the resuming banks in case the resumption brought them into difficulty.

The bank, at the same time, imported, at an expense of more than half a million, the sum of seven millions of specie, and two months after the resumption its discounts reached twenty millions. Compare with this statement our condition now.

Then the government agreed to receive for all dues the notes of the Bank of the United States—now all bank notes are refused and discredited. Then the government endeavored to sustain the banks—now it is striving to destroy them. Then it established a new and vigorous bank capital—now it refuses to create a new bank, and seeks to cripple those in existence. Then we had two hundred and sixty banks—now we have nearly nine hundred.

In short, what reliance have the banks now with the executive hostile to them? What protection like that of the late Bank of the United States have they to sustain them? None whatever.

The only circumstance not wholly unfavorable in the comparison, is the low rate of exchange with England. But nothing general or permanent can be inferred from this circumstance, which frequently occurs, and on the present occasion is wholly accidental in New York, from the unnatural condition into which her measures of extreme rigor have driven every thing. If under ordinary circumstances, while other things underwent no depression, exchange on England should decline, it might be inferred that England owes to the United States more than we have yet drawn from her. But it is not exchange alone that has fallen. Exchange on England has not fallen in New York as much as the internal exchanges or stocks or real estate, or house rent have fallen. This fact seems decisive as to the cause. But can this depression continue? Certainly not. These rigorous measures are understood to be only preliminary—only preparations for an expansion by the banks of New York, which is to restore ease and confidence. Well, the moment this ease and confidence return, all things will rise, and exchange of course among the number. Besides, this unnatural condition will work its own remedy, as all irregularities are cured by their own excesses. To sell every thing and to buy nothing is impracticable, and when the English have bought all the produce we have to spare, we must of course buy from them what manufactures they have to spare. As soon as the proceeds of our industry are realized in England—while we have gradually exhausted our supply of English goods—our own merchants will convert their produce into a fresh supply to be brought over; or if this process be too slow, the English manufacturers themselves will send their own goods for sale. In either case the exchange will recover its equilibrium, and of course will rise here, for between two such countries as America and England, a permanent inequality of exchange, as a basis of the metallic currency of either, is impossible.

V. Perceiving nothing in the conduct of the government to justify an early resumption, let us see if there be any thing in the state of the country which recommends it. Now what is the condition of our affairs? The suspension found us with a heavy debt to the banks—not less probably than five hundred millions—with large balances from the southern and western states to the Atlantic cities, and with a very considerable debt to Europe. All parties were willing to pay; almost all were able to pay; but great forbearance and great indulgence were necessary from the creditor, and above all, after such a convulsion, the great restorer was time; time to settle; time to adjust accounts; time to send the debtors' crops to market; time to dispose of his property with the least sacrifice; time to bring out his resources to pay his debts. In all the large movements of human affairs, as in the operations of nature, the great law is gentleness—violence is the last resource of weakness. The disease of the country was an overstrained and dis-tempered energy. The remedy was repose. The question of the currency, though important, was only secondary. The first concern was to pay our debts, and especially not to depreciate the value of our means of paying them.

Accordingly it seemed to me that after the suspension, the true course of this country was to begin a gentle and gradual diminution of loans, sufficient to prevent the hazards of expansion while the restraint of specie payments was removed, and to prepare for the resumption, but with no rash competition as to the amount which the several banks could curtail—to make no violent changes in the standard of value, and give time for a settlement with foreigners, and among ourselves, on the same or nearly the same basis upon which these mutual engagements were contracted—letting the crops go to their destined markets without depreciating their price. After this, the resumption with the aid of congress, would have been easy and spontaneous. It was in this spirit that the Bank of the United States has not diminished ten per cent. of its loans—while it added about three millions to its specie—and will have given the necessary facilities for shipping the crops of the south and west to the amount of probably fifteen or twenty millions of dollars; placing its own confidential agent in England to protect the great commercial and pecuniary interests of the country. This seemed to be its proper function.

It was thus that it hoped to discharge its duty to the whole union. It was thus, too, it could show its fidelity to Pennsylvania, by aiding its public improvements—by keeping its business and its people in comparative ease, and by not suffering the prosperity of its commercial capital to be prostrated—objects these, far more important than whether specie payments be resumed a few months sooner or later.

The injurious effects of a contrary course are seen in all the relations of business. Take for instance the debts to banks and to individuals. The debts were mainly contracted when the currency was abundant. They must now be paid in a very altered state of the currency—and it is necessary to proceed with extreme caution when the relation of the debtor to his creditor is changed by events which neither could control, because if this change be not made very gradually so as to bring at the same time all the other relations of life to the same standard, you inflict injustice or perhaps ruin on the debtor. It was thus that England continued her suspension for twenty-five years, and by act of parliament gave several years notice of the progressive resumption, in order that all the business of the country should adjust itself to the approaching change. Of the effect of any sudden movement, we have before us a striking instance.

It appears by the published statements of the banks of the city of New York, that since the suspension to March 1, 1838, they have reduced their loans and discounts from forty-six millions to thirty millions, and their circulation from nine millions to two millions—an aggregate diminution from forty-five millions to thirty-three millions. If this, or any thing near this, be the reduction, what is the consequence? A man who contracted a debt to the banks in New York, before the suspension, finds his ability to provide means for the payment of that debt reduced one third or nearly one half—that is to say, the dollar he now pays is equivalent to one and a half or almost two dollars when he borrowed it, besides the interest. Such a process of reduction would have been wholly intolerable, if the citizens had not escaped from it and sought alleviation by loans elsewhere. But if the other cities had followed the example of New York and made similar reductions, the whole country would have sunk under it or revolved against it.

These inequalities between members of the same community become more striking when applied to engagements between distant parts of the union. The Atlantic cities for instance, were creditors of the southern and western states for goods sold to them, to be paid for either in those states, or in the Atlantic cities—their currencies being so nearly the same that the exchange would not cost as much as the mere transportation of the specie. When the day of payment arrives, the creditor city suddenly makes an artificial scarcity of its own currency—renders the only money it will receive in payment almost inaccessible to its debtor—reducing at the same time the rates of exchange, and the prices of every thing. This rigor instantly recoils on the creditor. If payment is made in the southern and western states, the Atlantic merchant loses the whole depreciation in the exchange. If payment is to be made in the Atlantic cities, and the debtor sends produce to pay his debt, the scarcity of money obliges him to sacrifice it—if he sends the bank notes of his country they sink to seventy-five per cent. in value—and he loses the difference. If he brings the stocks of his state, the scarcity of money renders their negotiation impossible. Once disappointed in this way, he sends no more produce—no more bank notes—and the creditors in turn suffer more than the difference by the delay.

So in respect to foreigners. We owe a large debt to France and England. Why should we destroy the value of our only means of paying it? We can pay it only in cash, or produce, or stocks. As to cash—this debt was contracted in an abundant currency. By this artificial scarcity of money we are obliged to pay it in a currency more valuable by one half or one third. Even at that rate we can neither borrow the money nor raise it by sales except by ruinous sacrifice. We then may pay it in produce or in stocks, but the same scarcity sinks the value of both. A debt contracted when cotton was at twenty cents, we have to pay when cotton is ten cents a pound. If we propose to pay in stocks, these too have sunk perhaps twenty-five per cent. on their price last year. Our resources then are diminished in value while our debt is increasing by interest. The consequence is the foreign debt is postponed. This operates injuriously to both parties—to the domestic debtor by reducing his means of payment—to the foreign creditor by the delay and the hazard of his debt. It is true if he could now receive his money he would remit it home at a low rate.

But then the same scarcity which lowers the rate of remittance, prevents his receiving any thing to remit—and so far from being interested in the early resumption, it injures him essentially, because the forced preparation for it by crushing the resources of his debtors renders them alike unable and unwilling to pay. What the foreign creditor wants is payment—payment of the debt, not in a better currency, but in an equal currency, or if necessary, in an inferior currency, because he can better support a high rate of remittance than a reduced or postponed payment.

There prevails a notion that the credit of the country abroad will be injured by not resuming. Not in the least. Every body connected with America knew the reasons of suspending, and entirely approved of it as the only measure that could have saved the country. What Europeans want now is that we should pay our debt. That is our first duty, and if they see, as they cannot fail to see, that these premature efforts to resume specie payments prevent the collection of what is due to them, they will perceive, that in endeavoring to secure an object wholly domestic, they have been sacrificed.

In respect to the dividends and the stock, payable abroad, many of them are payable in pounds sterling, or guilders, or francs, so that we place the money there at our own cost—and as to dividends payable here, they have almost universally been remitted in the equivalents to specie. What the general merchants of France or England desire, is that we should take their merchandize—that we should trade with them. The state of our currency is a very subordinate concern. You deal with them and pay them in their own currency. They know little and care less about the sort of currency in which you deal with the south and west. Besides, who are to reproach us with the depreciation of our notes. The English? But the Bank of England suspended specie payments for twenty-five years—nearly all which time every American bank paid specie—and men in England were forced by law to take the notes of the Bank of England when they were at thirty per cent. discount—whereas no man is obliged here to take any note of any bank—and at this moment a paper dollar in Philadelphia or New York, will buy a silver dollar delivered in London. The question then of the resumption is one exclusively domestic—one which, however important at home, does not effect the credit of the country abroad.

VI. We come now to the question whether if an early resumption be practicable, the month of May is a fit time. My impression is that the month of May is a very unfit time. The resumption, to be useful, must be general, and no arrangement can be satisfactory which does not include the southern and southwestern states. These I do not think are yet ready to resume. They are straining every nerve to pay their debts. Their crops are going forward to provide funds in Europe and at the north—the banks are laboring to meet their notes at the north—the legislatures are pledging their credit to raise funds in order that their people may pay their debts. Why should we repulse them? All they want is time. They have not yet had the benefit of a single crop, and they may require another; and instead of discrediting them, or diminishing the value of their produce, or curtailing their facilities in sending their crops to market, it is better to help them and wait till they are more advanced in their preparations. The employment of credit, either of banks or of individuals, most useful to the country at this moment, is to forward its produce to Europe. Instead of this the banks are reducing these facilities and calling upon their debtors for payment. This seems very unreasonable. It is stopping the locomotives as they are carrying the crop to market.

The month of May too is not the right time of the year. For example, it requires on an average about fifty days to take cotton from New Orleans to Liverpool. Supposing it immediately sold, the usage is at the end of ten days to give a banker's acceptance, payable in two months, so that by the month of May there would not be actually realised more than the cotton which left New Orleans before January; when not more than one fourth or one-fifth of the whole crop had been shipped. Much, of course, is drawn for when shipped, but I speak now of the actual obtaining possession of the proceeds of the crop; and at all events not one half of the crop will have reached Europe by the month of May. The spring is, moreover, the season when the credits given for the shipments of southern and western produce, are maturing at the north; and the crop from which reimbursements are to come, remains unsold in Europe. The spring too, is the time when the western business has brought from the interior the notes of the Atlantic banks, when the circulation presses more upon them than at any other period, and when specie is wanted for the trade to China and India, making that time particularly unpropitious for the resumption.

VII. It remains now to inquire how far these general views of the expediency of a resumption in May should be changed by the determination of the banks of the city of New York to resume at that period.

For the gentlemen of New York who announced that decision, I have great personal respect, and under ordinary circumstances would willingly yield my own convictions to their better opportunities and understanding. But the natural influence of their judgment is weakened by the knowledge of the fact, that the banks of New York would not have had the least idea of a resumption in May—but because the immunity allowed by the legislature will then expire and they fear that it will not be renewed.

This was distinctly avowed at the bank convention, and the deputation who visited Philadelphia repeated it again and again. Now this may be a very good reason for the banks of New York to resume—but certainly no reason whatever for the banks of Pennsylvania to do the same. The states of Pennsylvania, of Virginia, of Kentucky, have legislatures as well as New York has, and they have refused to direct their banks to resume in May next. Why should they obey the legislature of New York and not their own legislatures? The position of New York is on all hands regretted. But how is it to be remedied? A single legislature out of twenty-six legislatures had passed a law forfeiting the charters of banks, if they were unable to redeem their notes in specie.

A public calamity overtakes the country and the declining to pay specie, so far from being criminal, became an act of public safety—so adopted by all the banks, and so confirmed by this very legislature. The provision originally designed to guard against fraud, may thus become the punishment of honesty and ability. The legislative body which protected banks for years is now in session, and in twenty-four hours can extend the indemnity till a more appropriate season for resuming. I presume no difficulty will occur in this. Why should there be? Is it possible that such a body can see with indifference the distress which a perseverance in this course must inevitably create, or permit the pride of opinion or any mere political or party consideration to prevent them interposing to protect their noble but suffering city? If they decline how can we of Pennsylvania interfere?

Why should we voluntarily place ourselves in the same situation into which New York has been forced? By doing so we share only a common disaster—instead of husbanding our resources against the period when our interposition may be really useful. In the mean while, the most effectual service which we can render is to speak in a tone of frank sincerity. She may perhaps bear it from one than whom she has never had a more true and constant friend—who, although an entire stranger, has for a long series of years, done every thing in his power to advance her prosperity, and never saw her in any misfortune which he did not anxiously strive to mitigate. But I wish to serve her, not to flatter her. I believe then that at this moment New York is in an entirely false position. She is obliged by the existing law to do what she feels to be wrong. Her natural course is to appeal to her representatives to rectify their mistake, and not to thrust out their own state banks to be crushed by the executive.

Instead of doing this, she perseveres from a mistaken, though honorable pride, in not asking relief where relief is attainable, but is preparing for the event by sacrificing her own interests and inflicting distress on the community. The apparent superiority in the exchanges which this produces, is wholly fallacious as well as injurious. The state of the exchanges in New York proves nothing whatever, except the scarcity of money in New York. The exchanges are even less depreciated than many other things. The bank notes of the southern states are at a great depreciation. But store rent and real estate in the very spot where these notes are sacrificed, are much more depreciated than the notes themselves. So too in New York, the notes of Philadelphia are at a discount, yet at this moment New York has to pay to Philadelphia, little less than ten millions of dollars, for actual debts to Philadelphia and to foreigners represented by Philadelphia.

It is not, therefore, the abundance, but the want of means—it is not strength but weakness which causes this difference. By the same process bread and meat may be reduced in price for the want of purchasers. You make an artificial scarcity of money, and then boast how much the little that remains will buy—but your superiority is punished by the debtor, who does not settle with a creditor so much above him. And what is the benefit of all this? The other states are not obliged to submit to this local legislation, and the suffering of New York is not certainly fitted to make them adopt it voluntarily. It is better, therefore, for them to state with perfect frankness that they do not mean to unite with her in this forced resumption—to say this decidedly and finally, so that she may apply the only remedy—an extension of her law. The whole subject would then be open for future adjustment upon principles of safety, alike to the banks and to the community.

On the whole, the course which in my judgment the banks ought to pursue, is simply this:

The banks should remain exactly as they are—prepared to resume, but not yet resuming.

They should begin, as the Bank of England did, under similar circumstances, by paying the small notes, so as to restore coin to all the minor channels of circulation—but not make any general resumption until they ascertain what course the government will pursue, employing, in the meantime, their whole power to forward the crops to market. The American banks should do in short what the American army did at New Orleans, stand fast behind their cotton bales until the enemy has left the country.

These are my opinions very deliberately formed, and very frankly expressed. They are thus set forth, not to influence the course of others, but to explain my own.

With great respect and esteem, yours,

N. BIDDLE.

MR. TALLMADGE'S LETTER.

We take great pleasure in placing before our readers, in a conspicuous manner, the very interesting and able letter from the hon. N. P. Tallmadge to recorder Riker. Mr. Riker applied to Mr. Tallmadge, when the bearing of the sub-treasury bill, as passed by the senate, was a matter of conjecture in this community, for information on this subject, so pregnant with momentous consequences to this commercial city. The letter has been hastily drawn up by Mr. Tallmadge in reply; and the subject to which it relates being one of immense public interest, and upon which the views of every patriotic citizen and faithful republican ought to be freely expressed, Mr. Riker has consented to its publication.

WASHINGTON, March 28, 1838.

Hon. RICHARD RIKER—Dear Sir: You ask my opinion of the sub-treasury bill as it passed the senate. I will give it as briefly as possible.

Before the bill was engrossed, the 23d section, originally introduced by Mr. Calhoun, and commonly called the specie clause, was stricken out. Mr. Tipton then moved to insert a section in its place, requiring the notes of specie paying banks to be received in payment of the public revenues, under such restrictions and regulations as congress should provide, which was rejected. A section was then adopted, on motion of Mr. Webster, taking from the secretary of the treasury the power of discriminating as to the kind of funds to be received in the different branches of the public revenue. In this shape the bill passed the senate.

Now, as to its practical operation: By its provisions the government is thrown back upon the joint resolution of 1816, under which the executive claims the right to prescribe the kind of funds to be received, whether specie or the notes of specie paying banks. Under his construction of this joint resolution, the late president issued the specie circular, by which he required specie in the payment of public lands, whilst the notes of specie-paying banks, under certain restrictions, were received for customs. Mr. Webster's amendment takes away this right of discrimination. The president must, therefore, either require specie or the notes of specie paying banks, in all the different branches of the public revenue, and cannot receive one kind of funds in one branch, and a different kind in another. We must, of course, rescind the specie circular which relates to the public lands, or he must extend it to the customs.

Which will he do? Some have supposed he would authorize the receipt of the notes of specie paying banks, and disburse them in the public service; this, under certain restrictions, might be done, and might, perhaps, be made to operate beneficially upon the different interests to be affected by it. Probably this was the expectation of some of those who voted to strike out Mr. Calhoun's specie clause, for although Mr. Tipton's amendment was rejected, still it was avowed in debate that it was opposed on the ground that it implied a distrust in the president as to the proper performance of his duty.

The question then recurs, which of the two descriptions of funds will be direct to be received? I should think he would hardly direct the public dues to be paid in specie, after the expression of the senate against it by striking out the specie clause; he must, then, direct the receipt of notes of specie paying banks, under such regulations and restrictions as may be prescribed. As to what those will be, we are left to infer from the facts before us. The president, in his message at the extra session said: "If at short and fixed periods, they (bank notes) were converted into specie, to be kept by the officers of the treasury, some of the most serious obstacles to their reception would, perhaps, be removed. To retain the notes in the treasury would be to renew, under another form, the loans of public money to the banks, and the evils consequent thereon."

I took the ground, at the extra session, that if the bank notes were to be converted into specie, as above suggested by the president, it was immaterial to me whether specie or the notes of specie paying banks were to be received: the practical effect would be the same in both cases.

Mr. Wright, in his speech at the extra session, said: "For himself, he agreed with the view of this matter which he understood his honorable colleague to take, that in case the deposits were confined to the safe keeping of the officers of the government, it was a question of much less interest to the banks than seemed to be generally supposed. If the banks were not made the depositories, it could not be supposed their notes, if made receivable, would be retained for any length of time in safe-keeping. It would be a necessary result of this mode of keeping the public funds, that all bank notes received must be presented at short intervals for payment; and he could not see that it would be any very valuable favor to the banks, as a permanent system, to receive their notes merely for the purpose of immediate presentation and payment." At the present session, Mr. Wright said: "If the notes of the banks continue to be received in payment of the public dues, and the depositories are directed, as in that case they unquestionably would be, to call frequently and at short intervals for the balances against the banks, and to demand specie for those balances, this must operate as a powerful check upon all the banks in the vicinity of those depositories where the collections are large."

From the above quotations, and from the sources from which they come, I trust there can no longer be any doubt on the public mind as to the manner in which the sub-treasury bill, if it shall become a law in its present shape, will be carried into effect; and I leave it to the judgment of every rational man to say whether the receipt of the notes of specie paying banks, under such regulations, and under the discretionary power claimed by the executive, is not far worse than the positive and absolute receipt of gold and silver only? In the latter case, the banks would only suffer in consequence of their specie being drawn from them, and deposited in these sub-treasury vaults, by which they would be disabled to extend those accommodations to which the mercantile community is entitled. In the former, it would subject them to the same inconvenience by the presentment of their notes for specie, and put it in the power of the executive to pull down or build up any bank he pleased, from the manner in which he could accumulate its bills, if it continued to do business, and suddenly present them for specie. The same remark is also applicable to Mr. Calhoun's proposition, (whilst bank notes are received,) by which one-sixth was to be received in specie the first year, two-sixths the second year, and so on till the whole receipts of the public revenue should be in gold and silver. Who can fail to see that, under such a system, every bank throughout the country may be destroyed, and all those evils, which have been so fully depicted during the discussion of this question, inflicted on the community. It is in fact establishing a gold and silver currency for officers and contractors of government, and leaving the people at the mercy of the executive or the secretary of the treasury. The banks cannot resume specie payments, if they continue to do business under such a system. Nay, they cannot live but by executive clemency.

The great evil consists in the adoption of the sub-treasury system in any form. That done, all others must follow. There is no way in which the objections to its adoption can be overcome. It is not capable of being made by any amendments either useful or harmless. I hope the country will not be deceived by the present form of the bill. It was right to strike out the specie clause, if we could, because that was giving a blow which destroyed that little congruity it had, and left it in a shape in which it was hoped none would seriously think of passing it.

It contains powers which led directly to an unmitigated despotism of opinion. You have not failed to see, in reference to the progress of this measure, the dangerous extent of executive influence. You can scarcely imagine the evils which may follow the exercise of the additional powers proposed to be conferred by this bill on that department of the government. Away, then, with the whole system—away with these vaults and safes, these bars and bolts. Let the government deposit its funds in sound institutions, and let there be received the notes of such banks as the deposit banks will agree to credit to the government as cash. Let the government then make its drafts on those depositories, and let the holders draw such currency as they desire.

I am utterly astonished at the manner in which this measure is attempted to be forced upon congress and the people. If the collection of the revenue in gold and silver be so essential for the general government, why is it not equally so for every state government? The same argument would apply in the one case as in the other. What would be said to such a proposition in the state of New York? I believe it was entertained at Tammany Hall. But what would the people of the state say? What would the legislature say? It could scarcely command a voice or a vote with the one or the other. Who is there that would require our canal tolls, our auction and salt duties, and our taxes, to be collected in specie? Such a law, if it were passed, could not be enforced. The same remark is applicable to every state in the union. And, I say, what is good enough for the states, and the people of the states, is good enough for the general government. I hope, then, the community will not be deceived as to the character of this bill. It does not contain a single mitigating feature. I trust it will be resisted, or any thing like it, in all the stages of its progress, until the executive be compelled to abandon his scheming, and return to a system based on sound principles and sanctioned by experience.

There is no occasion to despond. The spirit here is good. We are in earnest, and our resolution is fixed and firm. Let but the people have an opportunity to see this matter in its true light, and an end will be put, ere long, to these pernicious and dangerous projects.

Very respectfully, yours,

N. P. TALLMADGE.

STATE OF THE TREASURY.

LETTER FROM THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

Transmitting the information required by a resolution of the house of representatives of the 24th instant, in relation to the amount of treasury notes issued; the amount of the same which has been received in payment of the public dues up to this time; also the amount of moneys received on account of the customs, &c.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, March 28, 1838.

SIR: This report is submitted in compliance with the following resolution, passed by the house of representatives on the 24th instant:

"Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury report to this house, at as early a day as may be found practicable, the amount of treasury notes issued under the authority of the act of the last session of congress, and the amount of the same which has been received in payment of the public dues up to this time; also the amount of moneys received on account of the customs, and the public lands, during the last quarter of the year 1837, and during the first quarter of the present year, so far as the quarterly returns, or other information in possession of the department, may show; also, what amount of moneys of every description, available for the public service, is now in the treasury, or in the hands of receivers, liable to draft, and at what points deposited."

1. In reply to the first inquiry, I would state; that "the amount of treasury notes issued under the authority of the act of the last session of congress" was, on the 24th instant, $7,116,633 75.

2. The amount of the same which "had been received in payment of the public dues, up to" that time, was, so far as then ascertained by actual returns, $3,241,000.

Undoubtedly some two or three hundred thousand dollars more had then been received by the collecting officers, but time enough had not elapsed for the returns of them to reach the department.

3. In answer to the third inquiry, I would observe, that "the amount of moneys received on account of the customs and the public lands during the last quarter of the year 1837," was $3,016,816 77. Of this, $2,115,953 78 was from customs, and $901,857 99 from lands.

But, for reasons explained in the last report on the finances from this department, and in a subsequent part of this report, the amount above stated as received from customs is the aggregate, without making all the usual deductions for debentures, bounties and other expenses, which it is customary to pay out of the current revenue before it is carried into the treasury.

4. The fourth inquiry relates to the amount of money received from customs and lands "during the first quarter of the present year, so far as the quarterly returns, or other information in possession of the department, may show."

That quarter not being completed, all the returns for it have, of course, not yet been received. But from the monthly returns, which had been received on the 23d instant, the receipts by the collecting officers since the first of January had been, from customs and lands, about $2,945,260; of this, about $2,560,600 was from customs, and $384,660 from lands.

It is computed that, when all the returns for the quarter are made, the customs will appear to be about $3,000,000, and the lands about $500,000.

It should be noticed, in relation to these receipts, as well as those in the last quarter of 1837, that most of them from customs have been in the treasury notes and drafts on banks returned through the custom-houses. As none of these can, by the existing laws, be re-issued to defray even the cost of collection, and as very little money has been paid for customs during that period, it has followed that a considerable part of the custom-house expenses in the United States, since last October, including debentures, fishing bounties, and current charges, has, by an act of congress then passed, been obliged to be advanced from the treasury. These advances have amounted in all to $666,663; consequently, the receipts from customs, during that period, appear so much larger than they otherwise would, it being customary to deduct the payments for those objects from the current receipts before they are carried into the treasury.

5. The last inquiry is, "what amount of moneys, of every description, available for the public service," is "now in the treasury, or in the hands of receivers, liable to draft, and at what points deposited."

In reply to this, I would observe, that the whole amount of money so available is, nominally, $2,299,544 03. But, deducting $592,212 of it, which belongs to certain trust funds, and $400,000 of what is deposited in the mint, (which, as explained in the last annual report, cannot, without great public inconvenience, be withdrawn,) and the balance, available and applicable to general purposes, is only $1,307,332 03.

These "moneys of every description," consisted, Firstly, of the sums liable to draft in the present deposit banks, being $126,693 70.

The amounts in each, and "the points" where the money in them is "deposited," will appear in the schedule annexed.

Secondly. Another portion of them is money in such of the former deposit banks, on general deposit, as it is expected will be paid satisfactorily when drawn for, in a gradual manner, amounting to $516,697 17.

For details as to each, with the "points where deposited," see the tabular statement.

Thirdly. Another portion is money in special deposit by the treasurer in certain banks, amounting to $104,184 89.

For particulars, reference may be had to the document.

Fourthly. Another part is the money placed in the mint and its branches, under provisions in two acts of congress—one to procure metal for coining, and one to make speedy payment to depositors.

Of the aggregate coin in the mint, being $908,780 02, it is computed that the treasurer, in an emergency could draw out for the public service, without great inconvenience or delay, about $508,780 02.

Fifthly. The remaining sums amount to $670,004 51, and are those which have never been deposited or paid into the treasury, and are in the hands of collectors and receivers. But, deducting what belongs to the Chickasaws at Pontotoc, they are public money, liable to be drawn in case of necessity, equalling $643,188 25.

A schedule, giving the amount and situation of each, is annexed.

Respectfully,

LEVI WOODBURY,

Secretary of the treasury.

HON. JAMES K. POLK,

Speaker of the house of representatives.

MR. WEBSTER'S SECOND SPEECH

ON THE SUB-TREASURY BILL.

Delivered in the Senate of the United States, March 12, 1838.

(Concluded.)

The constitution confers on us, sir, the exclusive power of coinage. This must have been done for the purpose of enabling congress to establish one uniform basis for the whole money system. Congress, therefore, and congress alone, has power over the foundation, the ground-work, of the currency; and it would be strange and anomalous, having this, if it had nothing to do with the structure, the edifice, to be raised on this foundation! Convertible paper was already in circulation when the constitution was framed, and must have been expected to continue and increase. But the circulation of paper tends to displace coin; it may banish it altogether: at this very moment it has banished it. If, therefore, the power over the coin does not enable congress to protect the coin, and to restrain any thing which would supersede it, and abolish its use, the whole power becomes nugatory. If others may drive out the coin, and fill the country with paper which does not represent coin, of what use, I beg to know, is that exclusive power over coins and coinage which is given to congress by the constitution?

Gentlemen on the other side admit that it is the tendency of paper circulation to expel the coin; but then they say, that, for that very reason, they will withdraw from all connexion with the general currency, and limit themselves to the single and narrow object of protecting the coin, and providing for payments to government. This seems to me to be a very strange way of reasoning, and a very strange course of political conduct. The coinage-power was given to be used for the benefit of the whole country, and not merely to furnish a medium for the collection of revenue. The object was to secure, for the general use of the people, a sound and safe circulating medium. There can be no doubt of this intent. If any evil arises, threatening to destroy or endanger this medium or this currency, our duty is to meet it, not to retreat from it; to remedy it, not to let it alone; we are to control and correct the mischief, not to submit to it. Wherever paper is to circulate, as subsidiary to coin, or as performing, in a greater or less degree, the function of coin, its regulation naturally belongs to the hands which hold the power over the coinage. This is an admitted maxim by all writers; it has been admitted and acted upon, on all necessary occasions, by our own government, throughout its whole history. Why will we now think ourselves wiser than all who have gone before us?

This conviction of what was the duty of government led to the establishment of the bank in the administration of General Washington. Mr. Madison, again, acted upon the same conviction in 1816, and congress entirely agreed with him. On former occasions, I have referred the senate, more than once, to the clear and emphatic opinions and language of Mr. Madison, in his messages in 1815 and 1816, and they ought to be repeated, again and again, and pressed upon the public attention.

And now let me say, sir, that no man in our history has carried the doctrine farther, defended it with more ability, or acted upon it with more decision and effect, than the honorable member from South Carolina. His speech upon the bank bill, on the 26th of February, 1816, is strong, full, and conclusive. He has heretofore said that some part of what he said on that occasion does not appear in the printed speech; but, whatever may have been left out by accident, that which is in the speech could not have got in by accident. Such accidents do not happen. A close, well-conducted, and conclusive constitutional argument, is not the result of an accident or of chance; and his argument on that occasion, as it seems to me, was perfectly conclusive. He founds the right of regulating the paper currency directly on the coinage power. "The only object," he says, "the framers of the constitution could have in view, in giving to congress the power to coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin, must have been to give a steadiness and fixed value to the currency of the United States." The state of things, he insisted, existing at the time of the adoption of the constitution, afforded an argument in support of the construction. There then existed, he said, a depreciated paper currency, which could only be regulated and made uniform by giving a power, for that purpose to the general government.

He proceeded to say that, by a sort of undercurrent, the power of congress to regulate the money of the country had caved in, and upon its ruin had sprung up those institutions which now exercised the right of making money for and in the United States. "For gold and silver (he insisted) are not the only money; but whatever is the medium of purchase and sale; in which bank paper alone was now employed, and had therefore, become the money of the country." "The right of making money," he added "an attribute of sovereign power, a sacred and important right, was exercised by two hundred and sixty banks, scattered over every part of the United States."

Certainly, sir, nothing can be clearer than this language; and, acting vigorously upon principles thus plainly laid down, he conducted the bank bill, through the house of representatives. On that occasion, he was the champion of the power of congress over the currency, and others were willing to follow his lead.

But the bank bill was not all. The honorable gentleman went much farther. The bank, it was hoped and expected, would furnish a good paper currency to the extent of its own issues; but there was a vast quantity of bad paper in circulation, and it was possible that the mere influence of the bank, and the refusal to receive this bad money at the treasury, might not, both, be able to banish it entirely from the country. The honorable member meant to make clean work. He meant that neither government nor people should suffer the evils of irredeemable paper. Therefore, he brought in another bill, entitled "A bill for the more effectual collection of the public revenue." By the provisions of this bill, he proposed to lay a direct stamp tax on the bills of state banks; and all notes of non-specie paying banks were, by this stamp, to be branded with the following words, in distinct and legible characters, at length—"NOT A SPECIE NOTE." For the tax laid on such notes, there was to be no composition, no commutation; but it was to be specifically collected, on every single bill issued, until those who issued such bills should announce to the secretary of the treasury, and prove to his satisfaction, that, after a day named in the bill, all their notes would be paid in specie on demand.

And now, how is it possible, sir, for the author of such a measure as this, to stand up and declare, that the power of congress over the currency is limited to the mere regulation of the coin? So much for our authority, as it has heretofore been admitted and acknowledged, under the coinage power.

Now, sir, is the other source of power, in my opinion, at all more questionable.

Congress has the supreme regulation of commerce. This gives it, necessarily, a superintendence over all the interests, agencies, and instruments of commerce. The words are general, and they confer the whole power. When the end is given, all the usual means are given. Money is the chief instrument or agent of commerce; there can, indeed, be no commerce without it, which deserves the name. Congress must, therefore, regulate it as it regulates other indispensable commercial interests. If no means were to be used to this end but such as are particularly enumerated, the whole authority would be nugatory, because no means are particularly enumerated. Who regulate ships; their tonnage; their measurement; the shipping articles; the medicine chest; and various other things belonging to them; and for all this we have no authority but the general power to regulate commerce; none of these, or other means or modes of regulation are particularly and expressly pointed out.

But is a ship a more important instrument of commerce than money? We protect a policy of insurance, because it is an important instrument of ordinary commercial contract; and our laws punish with death any master of a vessel, or others, who shall commit a fraud on the parties to this contract by casting away a vessel. For all this we have no express authority. We infer it from the general power of regulating commerce, and we exercise the power in this case, because a policy of insurance is one of the usual instruments, or means, of commerce. But how inconsiderable and unimportant is a policy of insurance, as the means or an instrument of commerce, compared with the whole circulating paper of the country?

Sir the power is granted to us; and granted without any specification of means; and therefore we may lawfully exercise all the usual means. I need not particularize these means, nor state, at present, what they are, or may be. One is, no doubt, a proper regulation of receipts at the custom-houses and land offices. But this, of itself, is not enough. Another is a national bank, which I fully believe, would, even now, answer all desired purposes, and reinstate the currency in ninety days. These, I think, are the means to be first tried; and if, notwithstanding these, irredeemable paper should overwhelm us, others must be resorted to. We have no direct authority over state banks; but we have power over the currency, and we must protect it, using, of course, always, such means, if they be found adequate, as shall be most gentle and mild. The great measure, sir, is a bank; because a bank is not only able to restrain the excessive issues of state banks, but is able also to furnish for the country a currency of universal credit, and of uniform value. This is the grand desideratum. Until such a currency is established, depend on it, sir, what is necessary for the prosperity of the country can never be accomplished.

On the question of power, sir, we have a very important and striking precedent.

The members of the senate, Mr. President, will recollect the controversy between New York and her neighbor states, fifteen or sixteen years ago, upon the exclusive right of steam navigation. New York had granted an exclusive right of such navigation over her waters to Mr. Fulton and his associates; and declared by law, that no vessel propelled by steam should navigate the North river or the sound, without license from these grantees, under penalty of confiscation.

To counteract this law, the legislature of New Jersey enacted, that if any citizen of hers should be restrained, or injured, in person or property by any party acting under the law of New York, such citizen should have remedy in her courts, if the offender could be caught within in her territory, and should be entitled to treble damages and costs. New Jersey called this act a law of retaliation; and justified it on the general ground of reprisals.

On the other side, Connecticut took fire, and as no steamboat could come down the sound from New York to Connecticut, or pass up from Connecticut to New York, without a New York license, she enacted a law, by which heavy penalties were imposed upon all who should presume to come into her ports and harbors, having any such license.

Here, sir, was a very harmonious state of commercial intercourse! a very promising condition of things indeed! You could not get from New York to New Haven by steam; nor could you go from New York to New Jersey, without transhipment in the bay. And now, sir, let me remind the country, that this belligerent legislation of the states concerned was justified and defended, by exactly the same arguments as those which we have heard in this debate. Every thing which has been said here, to prove that the authority to regulate commerce does not include a power to regulate currency was said in that case, to prove that the same authority did not include an exclusive power over steamboats or other means of navigation. I do not know a reason, a suggestion, an idea, which has been used in this debate, or which was used in the debate in September, to show that Congress has no power to control the currency of the country and make it uniform, which was not used in this steamboat controversy, to prove that the authority of this government did not reach the matter then in dispute. Look to the forensic discussions in New York! Look to the argument in the court here! You will find it every where urged that navigation does not come within the general idea of regulating commerce; that steamboats are but vehicles and instruments; that the power of congress is general, and general only; and that it does not extend to agents and instruments.

And what, sir, put an end to this state of things? What stopped these seizures and confiscations? Nothing in the world, sir, but the exercise of the constitutional power of this government. Nothing in the world, but the decision of the supreme court, that the power of congress to regulate commerce was paramount; that it overruled any interfering state laws; and that these acts of the states did interfere with acts of congress, enacted under its clear constitutional authority.

As to the extent of the power of regulating commerce, allow me to quote a single sentence from the opinion of one of the learned judges of the supreme court, delivered on that occasion; a judge always distinguished for the great care with which he guarded state rights: I mean Mr. justice Johnson. And when I have read it, sir, then say, if it does not confirm every word and syllable which I have uttered on this subject, either now, or at the September session. "In the advancement of society," said the judge, "labor, transportation, intelligence, care, and various means of exchange, become commodities, and enter into commerce; and the subject, the vehicle, the agent, and these various operations, become the objects of commercial regulation."

These just sentiments prevailed. The decision of the court quieted the dangerous controversy; and satisfied, and I will add gratified, most highly gratified, the whole country.

Sir, may we not perceive at the present moment, without being suspected of looking with eyes whose sight is sharpened by too much apprehension—may we not perceive, sir, in what is now passing around us, the possible beginnings of another controversy between states, which may be of still greater moment, and followed, if not arrested, by still more deplorable consequences? Do we see no danger, no disturbance, no contests ahead? Si, do we not behold excited commercial rivalry, evidently existing between great states and great cities? Do we not see an emulous competition for trade, external and internal? Do we not see the parties concerned enlarging, and proposing to enlarge, to a vast extent, their plans of currency, evidently in connection with these objects of trade and commerce? Do we not see states themselves becoming deeply interested in great banking institutions? Do we not know that, already, the notes and bills of some states are prohibited by law from circulating in others?

Sir, I will push these questions no farther: but I tell you that it was for exactly such a crisis as this—for this very crisis—for this identical exigency now upon us—that this constitution was framed, and this government established. And now, sir, let those who expect to get over this crisis without effort and without action, let those whose hope it is that they may be borne along on the tide of circumstances and favorable occurrences, and who repose in the denial of their own powers and their own responsibility—let all such, look well to the end.

For one, I intend to clear myself from all blame. I intend, this day, to free myself of the responsibility of consequences, by warning you of the danger into which you are conducting our public affairs, by urging and entreating you, as I do now urge and entreat you, by invoking you, as I do now invoke you, by your love of country, and your fidelity to the constitution to abandon all untried expedients; to put no trust in ingenuity and contrivance; to have done with projects which alarm and agitate the people; to seek no shelter from obligation and duty; but with manliness, directness, and true wisdom, to apply to the evils of the times their proper remedy. That Providence may guide the counsels of the country to this end, before even greater disasters and calamities overtake us, is my most fervent prayer!

Mr. President, on the subject of the power of congress, as well as on other important topics, connected with the bill, the honorable gentleman from South Carolina has advanced opinions, of which I feel bound to take some notice.

That honorable gentleman, in his recent speech, attempted to exhibit a contrast between the course of conduct which I, and other gentlemen who act with me, at present pursue, and that which we have heretofore followed. In presenting this contrast, he said, he intended nothing personal; his only object was truth. To this I could not object. The occasion requires, sir, that I should now examine his opinions; and I can truly say, with him, that I mean nothing personally injurious, and that my object, also, is truth, and nothing else. Here I might stop: but I will even say something more.

It is now five and twenty years, sir, since I became acquainted with the honorable gentleman, in the house of representatives, in which he had held a seat, I think, about a year and a half before I entered it. From that period, sir, down to the year 1824, I can say, with great sincerity, there was not, among my political contemporaries, any man for whom I entertained a higher respect or warmer esteem. When we first met, we were both young men. I beheld in him a generous character, a liberal and comprehensive mind, engrossed by great objects, distinguished talent, and, particularly, great originality and vigor of thought. That he was ambitious, I did not doubt; but that there was any thing in his ambition low or sordid, any thing approaching to a love of the mere loaves and fishes of office, I did not then believe, and do not now believe. If, from that moment, down to the time I have already mentioned, I differed with him on any great constitutional question, I do not know it.

But in 1824, events well known to the senate separated us; and that separation remained, wide and broad, until the end of the memorable session which terminated in March, 1833. With the events of that session, our occasions of difference had ceased; certainly for the time, and, as I sincerely hoped, forever. Before the next meeting of congress, the public deposits had been removed from their lawful custody by the president. Respecting this exercise of the executive power, the honorable gentleman and myself entertained the same opinions; and, in regard to subsequent transactions connected with that, and growing out of it, there was not, so far as I know, any difference of sentiment between us. We looked upon all these proceedings but as so many efforts to give to the executive an unconstitutional control over the public moneys. We thought we saw, everywhere, proofs of a design to extend executive authority, not only in derogation of the just powers of congress, but to the danger of the public liberty. We acted together, to check these designs, and to arrest the march of executive prerogative and dominion. In all this, we were but co-operating with many other gentlemen here, and with a large and intelligent portion of the whole country.

The unfortunate results of these executive interferences with the currency had made an impression on the public mind. A revolution seemed in progress, and the people were coming in their strength, as we began to think, to support us and our principles.

In this state of things, sir, we met here at the commencement of the September session: but we met, not as we had done; we met, not as we had parted. The events of May, the policy of the president in reference to those events, the doctrines of the message of September, the principles and opinions which the honorable gentleman, both to my surprise, and to my infinite regret, came forward then to support, rendered it quite impossible for us to act together, for a single moment longer. To the leading doctrines of that message, and to the policy which it recommended, I felt, and still feel, a deep, conscientious, and irreconcilable opposition. The honorable gentleman supported, and still supports, both. Here, then, we part. On these questions of constitutional power and duty and on these momentous questions of national policy, we separate. And so broad and ample is the space which divides us, and so deep does the division run, touching even the very foundations of the government, that, considering the time of life to which we both have arrived, it is not probable that we are to meet again. I say this with unfeigned and deep regret. Believe me, sir, I would most gladly act with the honorable gentleman. If he would but come back, now, to what I consider his former principles and sentiments; if he would place himself on those constitutional doctrines which he has sustained through a long series of years; and if, thus standing, he would exert his acknowledged ability to restore the prosperity of the country, and put an end to the mischiefs of reckless experiments and dangerous innovation,—I would not only willingly act with him, I would act under him; I would follow him, I would support him, I would back him, at every step, to the utmost of my power and ability. Such is not to be our destiny. That destiny is, that we here part; and all I can say further is, that he carries with him the same feeling of personal kindness on my part, the same hearty good will which have heretofore inspired me.

There have been three principal occasions, sir, on which the honorable gentleman has expressed his opinions upon the questions now under discussion. They are, his speech of the 15th September, his published letter of the 3d November, and his leading speech of the present session. These productions are all marked with his characteristic ability; they are ingenious, able, condensed, and striking. They deserve an answer. To some of the observations in the speech of September, I made a reply on the day of its delivery; there are other parts of it, however, which require a more deliberate examination.

Mr. President, the honorable gentleman declares in that speech, "that he belongs to the state-rights party; that that party, from the beginning of the government, has been opposed to a national bank as unconstitutional, inexpedient, and dangerous; that it has ever dreaded the union of the political and moneyed power, and the central action of the government, to which it so strongly tends, that the connection of the government with the banks, whether it be with a combination of state banks, or with a national institution, will necessarily centralize the action of the system at the principal point of collection and disbursement, and at which the mother bank, or the head of the league of state banks, must be located. From that point, the whole system, through the connection with the government, will be enabled to control the exchanges both at home and abroad, and with it, the commerce, foreign and domestic, including exports and imports."

Now, sir, this connection between government and the banks, to which he imputes such mischievous consequences, he describes to be "the receiving and paying away their notes as cash; and the use of the public money, from the time of the collection to the disbursement."

Sir, if I clearly comprehend the honorable gentleman, he means no more, after all, than this: that, while the public revenues are collected, as heretofore, through the banks, they will lie in the banks between the time of collection and the time of disbursement; that, during that period, they will be regarded as one part of the means of business and of discount possessed by the banks; and that, as a greater portion of the revenue is collected in large cities than in small ones, these large cities will, of course, derive greater benefits than the small ones from these deposits in the banks. In other words, that, as the importing merchants in a great city pay more duties to government than those in a small one, so they enjoy an advantage to be derived from any use which the banks may make of these moneys, while on deposit with them. Now, sir, I would be very glad to know, supposing all this to be true, what there is in it either unequal or unjust? The benefit is exactly in proportion to the amount of business, and to the sums paid. If individuals in large cities enjoy the incidental use of more money, it is simply because they pay more money. It is like the case of credit on duty bonds. Whoever imports goods with the benefit of giving bond for duties, instead of making present payment, enjoys a certain benefit; and this benefit, in a direct sense, is in proportion to the amount of goods imported—the large importer having credit for a large sum, the small importer having credit for a small sum. But the advantage, the benefit, or the indulgence, or whatever we call it, is, nevertheless, entirely equal and impartial.

How, then, does the collection of revenue through the banks "centralize" the action of the commercial system? It seems to me, sir, the cause is mistaken for the effect. The greatest amount of revenue is collected in the greatest city because it is already the greatest city; because its local advantages, its population, its capital and enterprise, draw business towards it, constitute it a central point in commercial operations, and have made it the greatest city. It is the centralization of commerce by these just and proper causes—causes which must always exist in every country which produce a large collection of revenue in the favored spot. The amount of capital is one of very important cause, no doubt; and leaving public moneys in the banks till wanted, allows to merchants, in places of large import, a degree of incidental benefit, in just proportion to the amount of capital by them employed in trade, and no more.

I suppose, sir, it is the natural course of things in every commercial country, that some place, or a few places should go ahead of others in commercial business importance. This must ever be so, until all places possess precisely equal natural advantages. And I suppose, too, that, instead of being mischievous, it is rather for the common good of all, that there should be some commercial emporium, some central point, for the exchanges of trade. Government, certainly, should not seek to produce this result by the bestowal of unequal privileges; but surely, sir, it would be a very strange and indefensible policy which should lead the government to withhold any portion of the capital of the country from useful employment, merely because that, if employed, while all enjoyed the benefit proportionately, all would not enjoy it with the same absolute mathematical equality.

So much, sir, for concentration, arising from depositing the revenues in banks. Let us now look to the other part of the connection, viz: the receiving of bank notes for duties. How in the world does this "centralize" the commercial system? The whole tendency and effect, as it seems to me, is directly the other way. It counteracts centralization. It gives all possible advantage to local currency and local payments, and thereby encourages both imports and exports. It tends to make local money good every where. If goods be imported into Charleston, the duties are paid in Charleston notes. New York notes are not demanded. Nothing, certainly, can be fairer or more equal than this, and nothing more favorable to the Charleston importers.

But how would that system work, which the gentleman himself proposes?

If his plan could prevail, he would have the duties collected either in specie, or in a government paper to be issued from the treasury. He would reject all bank notes whatever. If the gentleman, sir, fears centralization, I am astonished that he does not see centralization in all its terrors in this very proposition of his own. Pray allow me to ask, sir, where will this government paper, in the course of its issue and circulation, naturally centre? To what points will it tend? Certainly, most certainly, to the greatest points of collection and expenditure; to the very heart of the metropolitan city, wherever that city may be. This is as inevitable as the full of water or the results of attraction. If two-thirds of the duties be collected in New York, it will follow, of course, that two-thirds of any government paper received for duties will be there received; and it will be more valuable there than elsewhere. The value of such paper would consist in its receivability, and nothing else. It would always tend, therefore, directly to the spot where the greatest demand should exist for it for that purpose. Is it not so at this moment with the outstanding treasury notes. Are they abundant in Georgia, in Mississippi, in Illinois, or in New Hampshire? No sooner issued, than they commence their march toward the place where they are most valued and most in demand: that is, to the place of the greatest public receipt. If you want concentration, sir, and enough of it—if you desire to dry up the small streams of commerce, and fill more full the deep and already swollen great channels, you will act very wisely to that end, if you keep out of the receipt of the treasury all money but such paper as the government may furnish, and which shall be no otherwise redeemable than in receipt for debts to government while at the same time you depress the character of the local circulation.

Such is the scheme of the honorable member in its probable commercial effect. Let us look at it in a political point of view.

The honorable member says he belongs to the state-rights party; that party professes something of an uncommon love of liberty; an extraordinary sensibility to all its dangers; and of those dangers, it most dreads the union of the political and money power. This we learn from the authentic declaration of the gentleman himself. And now, oh, transcendental consistency! oh, most wonderful conformity of means and ends! oh, exquisite mode of gratifying high desires! behold, the honorable member proposes that the political power of the state shall take to itself the whole function of supplying the entire paper circulation of the country by notes or bills of its own, issued at its own discretion, to be paid out or advanced to whomsoever it pleases, in discharging the obligations of government, bearing no promise to pay, and to be kept in circulation merely by being made receivable at the treasury! The whole circulation of the country, excepting only that which is metallic, and which must always be small, will thus be made up of mere government paper, issued for government purposes, and redeemable only in payment of government debts. In other words, the entire means of carrying on the whole commerce of the country will be held by government in its own hands, and made commensurate, exactly, with its own wants, purposes, and opinions; the whole commercial business of the country being thus made a mere appendage to revenue.

But, sir, in order that I may not misrepresent the honorable member, let me show you a little more distinctly what his opinions are respecting this government paper.

The honorable member says, sir, that to make this sub-treasury measure successful, and to secure it against reaction, some safe and stable medium of circulation, "to take the place of bank notes in the fiscal operations of the government, ought to be issued;" that, "in the present condition of the world, a paper currency, in some form, if not necessary, is almost indispensable, in financial and commercial operations of civilized and extensive communities;" that, "the great desideratum is to ascertain what description of paper has the requisite qualities of being free from fluctuation in value, and liability to abuse in the greatest perfection; that bank notes do not possess these requisites in a degree sufficiently high for this purpose." And then he says, "I go farther. It appears to me after bestowing the best reflection I can give the subject, that no convertible paper, that is, no paper whose credit rests upon a promise to pay, is suitable for currency." "On what, then, (he asks,) ought a paper currency to rest?" "I would say, he answers, 'on demand and supply simply: which regulate the value of every thing else—the constant demand which government has for its necessary supplies.'" He then proceeds to observe, "that there might be a sound and safe paper currency, founded on the credit of government exclusively." "That such paper only to be issued to those who had claims on the government, would, in its habitual state, be at or above par with gold and silver;" that "nothing but experience can determine what amount, and of what denominations, might be safely issued; but that it might be safely assumed that the country would absorb an amount greatly exceeding its annual income. Much of its exchanges, which amount to a vast sum, as well as its banking business, would revolve about it; and many millions would thus be kept in circulation beyond the demands of the government."

By this scheme, sir, government, in its disbursements, is not to pay money, but to issue paper. This paper is no otherwise payable or redeemable, than as it may be received at the treasury. It is expected to be let out much faster than it comes in, so that many millions will be kept in circulation; and its habitual character will be at or above par with gold and silver! Now, sir, if there is to be found anywhere a more plain and obvious project of paper money, in all its deformity, I should not know where to look for it.

In the first place, sir, I have suggested the complete union which it would form, if it were, in itself, practicable, between the political and the money power.

The whole commerce of the country, indeed, under such a state of law, would be little more than a sort of incident to treasury operations—rather a collateral emanation of the revenue system, than a substantial and important branch of the public interest. I have referred, also, to its probable consequences, upon that which the gentleman regards as so great an evil, and which he denominates "the centralization of commercial action."

And now I pray you to consider, Mr. President, in the next place, what an admirable contrivance this would be to secure that economy in the expenses of government which the gentleman has so much at heart. Released from all necessity of taxation, and from the consequent responsibility to the people; not called upon to regard at all, the amount of annual income; having an authority to cause treasury notes to issue whenever it pleases,

"In multitudes, like which the populous north
Poured never from her frozen loins, to pass
Rhene, or the Danau;"

what admirable restraint would be imposed on government, how doubly sure would assurance be made for it, that all its expenditures would be strictly limited to the absolute and indispensable wants and demands of the public service!

But, sir, fortunately, very fortunately, a scheme so wild, and which would be so mischievous, is totally impracticable. It rests on an assumption, for which there is not the least foundation, either in reason or experience. It takes for granted that which the history of every commercial state refutes, and our own, especially, in almost every page. It supposes that irredeemable government paper can circulate in the business of society, and be kept at par. This is an impossibility. The honorable gentleman rejects convertible bank notes, which are equivalent to specie, since they will always command it, and adopts, in their stead, government paper, with no promise to pay, but a promise only to be received for debts and taxes; and he puts forth the imagination, as I have said, so often and so long refused, that this paper will be kept in circulation in the country, and will be able to perform the great business of currency and exchange, even though it exist in quantities exceeding, by many millions, the demands of government.

If it be necessary, sir, at this day, to refute ideas like these, it must be because the history of all countries, our own included, is a dead letter to us. Even at the very moment in which I am speaking, the small amount of treasury notes which has been issued by government, hardly a fifth part of the ordinary annual revenue—though those notes bear an interest of five per cent—though they are redeemable in cash at the treasury at the expiration of the year—and though, in the mean time, they are everywhere received in payment of the government dues, are not only of less value than specie, but of less value, also, than the notes of non-specie-paying banks; those banks whose paper is daily denounced here as "rags, filthy rags." In my opinion, sir, the whole scheme is as visionary and impracticable as any which the genius of project ever produced.

Mr. President, toward the close of this speech of September, I find a paragraph in which several other subjects are brought together, and which I must ask permission to read.

Having commended the wise and noble bearing of the little state-rights party, of which he says it is his pride to be a member throughout the eventful period through which the country has passed since 1824, he adds:

"In that year, as I have stated, the tariff system triumphed in the councils of the nation. We saw its disastrous political bearings; foresaw its surpluses, and then the extravagancies to which it would lead; we rallied on the election of the late president to arrest it through the influence of the executive department of the government. In this we failed. We then fell back upon the rights and sovereignty of the states; and, by the action of a small but gallant state, and through the potency of its interposition, we brought the system to the ground, sustained, as it was, by the opposition and the administration, and by the whole power and patronage of the government."

Every part of this most extraordinary statement well deserves attention.

In the first place, sir, here is an open and direct avowal that the main object for rallying on general Jackson's first election, was to accomplish the overthrow of the protective policy of the country. Indeed! Well, this is very frank. I am glad to hear the avowal made. It puts an end to all suspicions.

It was, then, to overthrow protection, was it, that the honorable gentleman took so much pains to secure general Jackson's first election? I commend his candor, in now acknowledging it. But, sir, the honorable member had allies and associates in that rally. They thronged round him from all quarters, and followed his lead. And pray, sir, was his object, as now avowed by himself, the joint object of all the party? Did he tell Pennsylvania, honest, intelligent, straight-forward Pennsylvania, that such was his purpose? And did Pennsylvania concur in it? Pennsylvania was first and foremost in espousing the cause of general Jackson. Every body knows she is more of a tariff state than any other in the union. Did he tell her that his purpose was to break the tariff entirely down? Did he state his objects, also, to New York? Did he state them to New Jersey? What say you gentlemen from Pennsylvania? gentlemen from New York? and gentlemen from New Jersey? Ye who supported general Jackson's election, what say you? Was it your purpose, also, by that election, to break down the protective policy? Or, if it were not your purpose, did you know, nevertheless—pray let us understand that—did you know, nevertheless, that it was the purpose, and the main purpose, of the honorable member from Carolina? and did you, still, co-operate with him?

The present chief magistrate of the country was a member of this body in 1828. He and the honorable member from Carolina were, at that time, exerting their united forces, to the utmost, in order to bring about general Jackson's election. Did they work thus zealously together, for the same ultimate end and purpose? or did they mean merely to change the government, and then each look out for himself.

Mr. Van Buren voted for the tariff bill of that year, commonly called the "bill of abominations;" but, very luckily, and in extremely good season, instructions for that vote happened to come from Albany! The vote, therefore, could be given, and the member giving it could not possibly thereby give any offence to any gentleman of the state-rights party, with whom the doctrine of instructions is so authentic.

Sir, I will not do gentlemen injustice. Those who belong to tariff states, as they are called, and who supported general Jackson for the presidency, did not intend thereby to overthrow the protective policy. They only meant to make general Jackson president, and to come into power along with him! As to ultimate objects, each had his own. All could agree, however, in the first step. It was difficult, certainly, to give a plausible appearance to a political union, among gentlemen who differed so widely, on the great and leading question of the times—the question of the protective policy. But this difficulty was overcome by the oracular declaration that general Jackson was in favor of a "judicious tariff."

Here, sir, was ample room and verge enough. Who could object to a judicious tariff? Tariff men and anti-tariff men, state-rights men and consolidationists, those who had been called prodigals and those who had been called radicals, all thronged and flocked together here, and with all their difference in regard to ultimate objects, agreed to make common cause, till they should get into power.

The ghosts, sir, which are fabled to cross the Styx, whatever different hopes or purposes they may have beyond it, still unite, in the present wish to get over, and therefore all hurry and huddle into the leaky and shattered craft of Charon, the ferryman. And this motley throng of politicians, sir, with as much difference of final object, and as little care for each other, made a boat of "judicious tariff," and all rushed and scrambled into it, until they filled it, near to sinking. The authority of the master was able, however, to keep them peaceable and in order, for the time, for they had the virtue of submission, and though with occasional dangers of upsetting, he succeeded in pushing them all over with his long setting-pole.

"Ratem conto subigit."

Well, sir, the honorable gentleman tells us that he expected, when general Jackson should be elected, to arrest the tariff system through the influence of the executive department. Here is another candid confession. Arrest the tariff by executive influence! Indeed! Why, sir, this seems like hoping, from the first, for the use of the veto. How, but by veto, could the executive arrest the tariff acts? And is it true, sir, that, at that early day, the honorable member was looking to the veto, not with dread, but with hope? Did he expect it, and did he rely upon it? Did he make the rally of which he speaks, in order that he might choose a president who would exercise it? And did he afterwards complain of it, or does he complain of it now, only because it was ill-directed—because it turned out to be a thunderbolt, which did not fall in the right place?

In this reliance on executive influence—sir, I declare I hardly can trust myself that I read or quote correctly, when I find, in what I read, or from what I quote, the honorable member from South Carolina, by his own confession, hoping or expecting to accomplish any thing by executive influence; yet so it was spoken, and so it is printed—in this reliance, or this hope, or expectation, founded on executive influence, the honorable gentleman and his friends failed; and, failing in this, he says, they fell back on the sovereignty of the states, and brought the system to the ground "through the potency of interposition;" by which he means neither more nor less than nullification. So then, sir, according to this, that excessive fear of power which was so much cherished by the nullifiers, was only awakened to a flame in their bosoms, when they found that they could not accomplish their own ends by the executive power of the president.

I am no authorized commentator, sir, on the doctrines or theories of nullification. Non nostrum. But, if this exposition be authentic, I must say it is not calculated to diminish my opposition to the sentiments of that school.

But the gentleman goes on to tell us that nullification, or interposition, succeeded. By means of it, he says, he did bring the protective system to the ground. And so, in his published letter of November 3d, he states that "state interposition has overthrown the protective tariff, and with it, the American system."

We are to understand, then, sir, first, that the compromise act of 1833 was forced upon congress by state interposition, or nullification.

Next, that its object and design, so far as the honorable gentleman was concerned in, was to break down and destroy, forever, the whole protective policy of the country.

And lastly, that it has accomplished that purpose, and that the last vestige of that policy is wearing away.

Now, sir, I must say, that, in 1833, I entertained no doubt at all that the design of the gentleman was exactly what he now states. On this point, I have not been deceived. It was not, certainly, the design of all who acted with him; but that it was his purpose, I know then, as clearly as I know now, after his open avowal of it; and this belief governed my conduct at the time, together with that of a great majority of those in both houses of congress, who, after the act of 1824, felt bound to carry out the provisions of that act, and to maintain them reasonably and fairly. I opposed the compromise act with all my power. It appeared to me every way objectionable: it looked like an attempt to make a new constitution; to introduce another fundamental law, above the power of congress, and which should control the authority and discretion of congress, in all time to come. This, of itself, was a conclusive objection with me; I said so then, have often said so since, and say so now. I said, then, that I, for one, should not be bound by that law more than any other law, except that, as it was a law passed on a very important and agitating subject, I should not be disposed to interfere with it, until a case of clear necessity should arise. On this principle I have acted since. When that case of necessity shall arise, however, should I be in public life, I shall concur in any alteration of that act, which such necessity may require. That such an occasion may come, I more than fear. I entertain something stronger than a doubt upon the possibility of maintaining the manufactures and industry of this country, upon such a system as the compromise act will leave us, when it shall have gone through its processes of reduction. All this, however, I leave to the future.

Having had occasion, Mr. President, to speak of nullification and the nullifiers, I beg leave to say, that I have not done so for any purpose of reproach. Certainly, sir, I see no possible connexion, myself, between their principles or opinions, and the support of this measure. They, however, must speak for themselves. They may have intrusted the bearing of their standard, for aught I know, to the hands of the honorable member from South Carolina; and I perceived last session, what I perceive now, that in his opinion there is a connexion between these projects of government and the doctrines of nullification. I can only say, sir, that it will be marvellous to me if that banner, though it be said to be tattered and torn, shall yet be lowered in obedience, and laid at the footstool of executive power. To the sustaining of that power, the passage of this bill is of the utmost importance. The administration will regard its success as being to them, what Cromwell said the battle of Worcester was to him—"a crowning mercy." Whether gentlemen, who have distinguished themselves so much by their extreme jealousy of this government, shall now find it consistent with their principles to give their aid in accomplishing this consummation, remains to be seen.

The next exposition of the honorable gentleman's sentiments and opinions, is his letter of November 3d.

This letter, sir, is a curiosity. As a paper, describing political movements, and exhibiting political opinions, it is without a parallel. Its phrase is altogether military. It reads like a despatch, or a bulletin from headquarters. It is full of attacks, assaults, and repulses. It recounts movements and counter-movements; speaks of occupying one position, falling back upon another, and advancing to a third; it has positions to cover enemies, and positions to hold allies in check. Meantime, the celerity of all these operations reminds one of the rapidity of the military actions of the king of Prussia, in the seven years' war. Yesterday he was in the south, giving battle to the Austrian—to-day he is in Saxony, or Silesia; instantly he is found to have traversed the Electorate, and is facing the Russian and the Swede on his northern frontier. If you look for his place on the map, before you find it he has quitted it. He is always marching, flying, falling back, wheeling, attacking, defending, surprising; fighting everywhere, and fighting all the time. In one particular, however, the campaign, described in this letter, differ from the manner in which those of the great Frederick were conducted. I think we nowhere read, in the narrative of Frederick's achievements, of his taking a position to cover an enemy, or a position to hold an ally in check. These refinements, in the science of tactics and of war, are of more recent discovery.

Mr. President, public men must certainly be allowed to change their opinions, and their associations whenever they see fit. No one doubts this. Men may have grown wiser, they may have attained to better and more correct views of great public subjects. It would be unfortunate, if there were any code which should oblige men, in public or private life, to adhere to opinions once entertained, in spite of experience and better knowledge, and against their own convictions of their erroneous character. Nevertheless, sir, it must be acknowledged, that what appears to be a sudden, as well as a great change, naturally produces a shock. I confess, for one, I was shocked, when the honorable gentleman, at the last session, espoused this bill of the administration. And when I first read this letter of November, and, in the short space of a column and a half, ran through such a succession of political movements, all terminating in placing the honorable member in the ranks of our opponents, and entitling him to take his seat, as he has done, among them, if not at their head, I confess I felt still greater surprise. All this seemed a good deal too abrupt. Sudden movements of the affections, whether personal or political, are a little out of nature.

Several years ago, sir, some of the wits of England wrote a mock play, intended to ridicule the unnatural and false feeling, the sentimentality, of a certain German school of literature. In this play, two strangers are brought together at an inn. While they are warming themselves at the fire, and before their acquaintance is yet five minutes old, one springs up and exclaims to the other, "A sudden thought strikes me! Let us swear an eternal friendship!"

This affectionate offer was instantly accepted, and the friendship duly sworn unchangeable and eternal! Now, sir, how long this eternal friendship lasted, or in what manner it ended, those who wish to know, may learn by referring to the play.

But it seems to me, sir, that the honorable member has carried his political sentimentality a good deal higher than the flight of the German school; for he appears to have fallen suddenly in love, not with strangers, but with opponents.

Here we all had been, sir, contending against the progress of executive power, and more particularly, and most strenuously, against the projects and experiments of the administration, upon the currency. The honorable member stood among us, not only as an associate, but as a leader. We thought we were making some headway. The people appeared to be coming to our support and our assistance. The country had been roused; every successive election weakening the strength of the adversary, and increasing our own. We were in this career of success carried strongly forward by the current of public opinion, and only needed to hear the cheering voice of the honorable member,

"Once more unto the breach, dear friends, once more!"

and we should have prostrated, forever, this anti-constitutional, anti-commercial, anti-republican, and anti-American policy of the administration. But, instead of these encouraging and animating accents, behold!

in the very crisis of our affairs, on the very eve of victory, the honorable member cries out—to the enemy—not to us, his allies—but to the enemy—"Holloa! A sudden thought strikes me! I abandon my allies! Now I think of it, they have always been my oppressors! I abandon them, and now let you and me swear an eternal friendship!"

Such a proposition, from such a quarter, sir, was not likely to be long withstood. The other party was a little coy, but, upon the whole, nothing loath. After proper hesitation, and a little decorous blushing, it owned the soft impeachment, admitted an equally sudden sympathetic impulse on its own side; and, since few words are wanted where hearts are already known, the honorable gentleman takes his place among his new friends, amidst greetings and caresses, and is already enjoying the sweets of an eternal friendship.

In this letter, Mr. President, the writer says, in substance, that he saw, at the commencement of the last session, that affairs had reached that point, when he and his friends, according to the course they should take would reap the full harvest of their long and arduous struggle, against the encroachments and abuses of the general government, or lose the fruits of all their labors.

At that time, he says, state interposition (viz. nullification) had overthrown the protecting tariff and the American system, and put a stop to congressional usurpation; that he had previously been united with the national republicans; and that their joint attacks had brought down the power of the executive; but that, in joining such allies, he was not insensible to the embarrassment of his position; that, with them, victory itself was dangerous; and that, therefore, he had been waiting for events; that now, (that is to say, in September last,) the joint attacks of the allies had brought down executive power; that the administration had become divested of power and influence, and that it had become clear that the combined attacks of the allied forces would utterly overthrow and demolish it. All this he saw. But he saw, too, as he says, that in that case the victory would enure, not to him or his cause, but to his allies and their cause. I do not mean to say that he spoke of personal victories, or alluded to personal objects, at all. He spoke of his cause.

He proceeds to say, then, that never was there before, and never, probably, will there be again, so fair an opportunity for himself and his friends to carry out their own principles and policy, and to reap the fruits of their long and arduous struggle. These principles and this policy, sir, be it remembered, he represents, all along, as identified with the principles and policy of nullification. And he makes use of this glorious opportunity, by refusing to join his late allies in any further attack on those in power, rallying anew the old state rights party to hold in check their old opponents, the national republican party. This, he says, would enable him to prevent the complete ascendancy of his allies, and to compel the southern division of the administration party to occupy the ground of which he proposes to take possession, to wit, the ground of the old state-rights party. They will have, he says, no other alternative.

Mr. President, stripped of its military language, what is the amount of all this, but that, finding the administration weak, and likely to be overthrown, if the opposition continued with undiminished force, he went over to it, to join it; to act, himself, upon nullification principles; and to compel the southern members of the administration to meet him on those principles?—in other words, to make a nullification administration, and to take such part in it as should belong to him and his friends. He confesses, sir, that in thus abandoning his allies, and taking a position to cover those in power, he perceived a shock would be created, which would require some degree of resolution and firmness. In this he was right. A shock, sir, has been created; yet there he is.

This administration, sir, is represented as succeeding to the last, by an inheritance of principle. It professes to tread in the foot-steps of its illustrious predecessor. It adopts, generally, the sentiments, principles, and opinions, of general Jackson—proclamation and all—and yet, though he be the very prince of nullifiers, and but lately regarded as the chief of sinners, it receives the honorable gentleman with the utmost complacency; to all appearance the delight is mutual; they find him an able leader, he finds them complying followers. But, sir, in all this movement, he understands himself. He means to go ahead, and to take them along. He is in the engine-car; he controls the locomotive. His hand regulates the steam, to increase or retard speed, at his own discretion. And as to the occupants of the passenger-cars, sir, they are as happy a set of gentlemen as one might desire to see, of a summer's day. They feel that they are in progress; they hope they shall not be run off the track; and when they reach the end of their journey, they desire to be thankful!

The arduous struggle is now all over. Its richest fruits are all reaped; nullification embraces the sub-treasuries, and oppression and usurpation will be heard of no more.

On the broad surface of the country, sir, there is a spot called "the hermitage." In that residence is an occupant very well known, and not a little remarkable both in person and character. Suppose, sir, the occupant of the hermitage were now to open that door, enter the Senate, walk forward, and look over the chamber to the seats on the other side. Be not frightened, gentlemen, it is but fancy's sketch. Suppose he should thus come in among us, sir, and see into whose hands as fallen the chief support of that administration, which was, in so great a degree, appointed by himself, and which he fondly relied on to maintain the principles of his own. If gentlemen were now to see his steady military step, his erect posture, his compressed lips, his firmly knitted brow, and his eye full of fire, I cannot help thinking, sir, they would all feel somewhat queer. There would be, I imagine, not a little awkward moving, and shifting in their seats. They would expect soon to hear the roar of the lion, even if they did not feel his paw.

I proceed, sir, to the speech of the honorable member, delivered on the 15th of February last, in which he announces propositions, respecting the constitutional power of congress, which, if they can be maintained, must necessarily give a new direction to our legislation, and would go far towards showing the necessity of the present bill.

The honorable member, sir, insists that congress has no right to make general deposits of the public revenue in banks; and he denies, too, that it can authorize the reception of any thing but gold and silver in the payment of debts and dues to the government.

These questions, sir, are questions of magnitude, certainly, and since they have been raised, ought to be answered. They may be considered together. Allow me in the first place, however, to clear them from some extraneous matter. The honorable member puts the first question thus: Have we the right to make deposits in the banks, in order to bestow confidence in them, with a view to enable them to resume specie payments? And, by way of illustration, asks the further question, whether government could constitutionally bestow on individuals, or a private association, the same advantages, in order to enable them to pay their debts? But this I take not to be the question. The true inquiry is, may not congress authorize the public revenue, in the intervening time between its receipt and its expenditure, to be deposited in banks, for the general purpose of safe-keeping, in the same way as individuals deposit their own money? And if this mode of safe-keeping be attended with incidental advantages, of considerable importance to the community, is not that a reason which may properly govern the discretion of congress in the case? To benefit the banks, or to benefit the community, is, in this case, not the main object; it is only the incident; and as to the case put for illustration, it would not be expected of congress, certainly, to make deposits with individuals with a view principally, of enabling such individuals to pay their debts: it might, nevertheless, be very competent to congress, in some cases, and a very proper exercise of its power, to deposit money, even with individuals, in such manner as that it might be advantageous to the depository. This incidental or consequential advantage results, often, from the nature of the transaction, and is inseparable from it. It may always be enjoyed, more or less, by any one, who holds public money for disbursement. In order to the necessary exercise of any of its powers, government doubtless may make contracts with banks or other corporations as well as with individuals. If it has occasion to buy bills of exchange, it may buy them of banks. If it has stock or treasury notes to sell, it may sell to banks, as the secretary of the treasury has lately proposed. It may employ banks, therefore, at its discretion, for the keeping of the public moneys, as those moneys must be kept somewhere. It can no more need a specific grant of power in the constitution for such a purpose, than one merchant, becoming agent for another to receive and pay out money, would need a particular clause in his authority, enabling him to use banks for these purposes as other persons use them. No question has ever been raised in this government about the power of congress to authorize such deposits. Mr. Madison, in opposing the first bank's charter in 1791, argued, strenuously, that a bank of the United States was not necessary to government as a depository of the public moneys, because, he insisted, its use could be supplied by other banks. This sufficiently shows his opinion. And in 1800, congress made it the duty of the collectors of customs to deposit bonds for duties in the bank and its branches for collection.

When the charter of the first bank expired, in 1811, almost every gentleman who opposed its renewal contended that it was not necessary for the purpose of holding deposits of revenue, because state banks could answer all such purposes equally well. A strong and prevailing tone of argument runs through all the speeches on that occasion, tending to this conclusion, viz. that government may derive from state banks all the benefit which a bank of the United States could render. In 1816, when the charter of the last bank was granted, it contained, as originally presented, no provision for making the public deposits in the bank. The bill was probably drawn, in this particular, from the model of the first charter, in which no such clause was contained, without adverting to the law of 1800; but a section was introduced, on my motion, making it the duty of collectors to deposit the public moneys in the bank and its branches. It was this section of the law which some of us thought was violated by the removal of the deposits. The main object of the deposite bill of 1836, as we know, was to regulate deposits of the public money with the state banks; so that, from the commencement of the government to the present time, nobody has thought of making any question of the constitutional power of congress to make such arrangements.

The gentleman's other proposition, and which he lays down with still more confidence and emphasis, is, that congress cannot, constitutionally, authorize the receipt of bank notes, though they be notes of specie-paying banks, in payment of debts to government; because, he says, that would make them money; and if we make them money, then are we bound to control and regulate that money. Most certainly, sir, I agree with the honorable member, that when bank notes become money, we are bound to control and regulate them. I thank him for this admission; since it goes a great way to support that proposition, for which I have been contending. That bank notes have become money in fact, that they answer the uses of money, that, in many respects, the law treats them as money, is certain. Why, then, are we not already bound to control and regulate them? The gentleman will say, because we have not, ourselves, made them money. But is that any answer? If they have become money in fact, they require the same regulation, and we have the same authority to bestow it, as if they had acquired that character by any acts of our own: because our power is general; it is to take care of the money of the country, and to regulate all the great concerns of commerce.

But let us see how this opinion of the honorable member stands upon the authorities in our own history.

When the first bank was established, the right of congress to create such a corporation was, as we all know, very much disputed. Large majorities, however, in both houses, were of opinion that the right existed, and they therefore granted the charter; and in this charter there was an express provision that the bills of the bank should be receivable in all payments to government. Those who opposed the bank did not object to this clause: on the contrary, they went even much farther; and Mr. Madison expressly insisted that congress might grant or refuse, to state banks, the privilege of having their notes received in revenue. In 1791, therefore, men of all parties supposed that congress, in its discretion, might authorize the receipt of bank notes. The same principle was incorporated into the bank charter of 1816: indeed, it was in the bill which the gentleman himself reported; and it passed without objection from any quarter. But this is not all. Mr. President, let us look into the proceedings of the session of 1815-16, a little more closely. At the commencement of that session, Mr. Madison drew our attention to the state of the currency; by which he meant the paper currency of the country, which was then very much disordered, as the banks had suspended specie payment during the war, and had not resumed. Early in the progress of the session, the honorable member from South Carolina moved that this part of the message should be referred to a select committee. It was so ordered. The committee was raised, and the honorable gentleman placed at its head. As chairman of the committee, he introduced the bank bill, explained it, defended it, and carried it triumphantly through the house, having in it the provision which I have before mentioned.

But there is something more. At the same session the gentleman introduced the bill for the further collection of the revenue, to which I have already referred, and in which bill he carried the receivability of bank notes much further, and provided that notes of any bank or bankers which were payable and paid, on demand, in specie, might be allowed and accepted in all payments to the United States. So that the honorable gentleman himself drew, with his own pen, the very first legal enactment in the history of this government, by which it was provided that the notes of state banks should be considered and treated as money at the treasury. Still further, sir. The bill containing this provision did not pass the house; and as I deemed some provision necessary, indispensably necessary, for the state of things then existing, I introduced, I think, the very next day after the failure of the honorable gentleman's bill, three resolutions. The two first were merely declaratory, asserting that all duties, taxes, and imposts, ought to be uniform, and that the revenues of the United States ought to be collected and received in the legal currency, or in treasury notes, or the notes of the Bank of the United States, as by law provided. These two resolutions I agreed to waive, as it was thought they were not essential, and that they might imply some degree of censure upon past transactions. The third resolution was in these words:

"And resolved, further, That the secretary of the treasury be, and he hereby is, required and directed to adopt such measures as he may deem necessary to cause, as soon as may be, all duties, taxes, debts, or sums of money accruing or becoming payable to the United States, to be collected and paid in the legal currency of the United States, or treasury notes, or notes of the Bank of the United States, as aforesaid; and that from and after the 1st day of February next, no such duties, taxes, debts, or sums of money accruing or becoming payable to the United States as aforesaid, ought to be collected or received otherwise than in the legal currency of the United States, or treasury notes, or notes of the Bank of the United States, as aforesaid."

The senate will perceive that, in this resolution of mine, there was no provision whatever for receiving bank notes, except of the Bank of the United States, according to its charter. Well, what happened thereon? Why, sir, if you look into the National Intelligencer of a succeeding day, you will find it stated, that Mr. Calhoun moved to amend Mr. Webster's resolution by "extending its provisions to the notes of all banks which should, at the time specified therein, pay their notes in specie on demand."

This amendment was opposed, and for a time defeated; but it was renewed, and finally prevailed. It was incorporated into the resolution, became part of the law of the land, and so remains at this very moment. Sir, may I not now say to the honorable member, that if the constitution of the country has been violated by treating bank notes as money—"Thou art the man!"

How is it possible, sir, the gentleman could so far forget his own agency in these most important transactions, as to stand up here, the other day, and with an air not only of confidence, but of defiance, say: "But I take a still higher ground; I strike at the root of the mischief. I deny the right of this government to treat bank notes as money in its fiscal transactions. On this great question I never have before committed myself, though not generally disposed to abstain from forming or expressing opinions."

I will only add, sir, that this reception and payment of bank notes was expressly recognised by the act of the 14th April, 1836; by the deposite act of June of that year, and by the bill which passed both houses in 1837, but which the president did neither approve nor return. In all these acts, so far as I know, the honorable member from South Carolina himself concurred.

So much for authority.

But now, sir, what is the principle of construction upon which the gentleman relies to sustain his doctrine? "The genius of our constitution," he says, "is opposed to the assumption of power." This is undoubtedly true: no one can deny it. But he adds, "whatever power it gives, is expressly granted."

But I think, sir, this by no means follows from the first proposition, and cannot be maintained. It is doubtless true that no power is to be assumed; but then powers may be inferred, or necessarily implied. It is not a question of assumption, it is a question of fact, just, and reasonable inference. To hold that no power is granted, and no means authorized, but such as are granted or authorized by express words, would be to establish a doctrine that would put an end to the government. It could not last through a single session of congress. If such opinions had prevailed in the beginning, it never could have been put in motion, and would not have drawn its first breath. My friend, near me, from Delaware, has gone so fully and so ably into this part of the subject, that it has become quite unnecessary for me to pursue it. Where the constitution confers on congress a general power, or imposes a general duty, all other powers necessary for the exercise of that general power, and for fulfilling that duty, are implied, so far as there is no prohibition. We act every day upon this principle, and could not carry on the government without its aid. Under the power to coin money, we build expensive mints—fill them with officers—punish such officers for embezzlement—buy bullion—and exercise various other acts of power.

The constitution says that the judicial power of the United States shall be vested in certain courts. Under this general authority we not only establish such courts, but protect their records by penalties against forgery, and the purity of their administration by punishing perjuries.

The department of the post office is another, and signal instance, of the extent and necessity of implied powers. The whole authority of congress over this subject is expressed in very few words; they are merely "to establish post offices and post roads." Under this short and general grant, laws of congress have been extended to a great variety of very important enactments, without the specific grant of any power whatever, as any one may see who will look over the post office laws. In these laws, among other provisions, penalties are enacted against a great number of offences; thus deducting the highest exercise of criminal jurisdiction, by reasonable and necessary inference, from the general authority. But I forbear from traversing a field already so fully explored.

There are one or two other remarks, sir, in the gentleman's speech, which I must not entirely omit to notice.

In speaking of the beneficial effects of this measure, one, he says, would be, that "the weight of the banks would be taken from the side of the tax-consumers, where it has been, from the commencement of the government, and placed on the side of the tax-payers. This great division of the community necessarily grows out of the fiscal action of the government."

Sir, I utterly deny that there is the least foundation, in fact, for this distinction. It is an odious distinction, calculated to inspire envy and hatred; and being, as I think wholly groundless, its suggestion, and the endeavor to maintain it, ought to be resisted, and repelled. We are all tax-payers, in the United States, who use articles on which imposts are laid; and who is there that is excused from this tax, or does not pay his proper part of it, according to his consumption? Certainly no one.

On the other hand, who are the tax-consumers?—Clearly, the army, the navy, the laborers on public works, and other persons in government employment. But even these are not idle consumers; they are agents of the government and of the people. Pensioners may be considered as persons who enjoy benefit from the public taxes of the country, without rendering present service in return; but the legal provision for them stands on the ground of previous merits, which none deny. If we had a vast national debt, the annual interest of which was a charge upon the country, the holders of this debt might be considered as tax-consumers. But we have no such debt. If the distinction, therefore, which the gentleman states exists anywhere, most certainly it does not exist here. And I cannot but exceedingly regret that sentiments and opinions should be expressed here, having so little foundation, and yet so well calculated to spread prejudice and dislike, far and wide, against the government and institutions of the country.

But, sir, I have extended these remarks already to a length for which I find no justification but in my profound conviction of the importance of this crisis in our national affairs. We are, as it seems to me, about to rush madly from our proper spheres. We are to relinquish the performance of our own incumbent duties; to abandon the exercise of essential powers, confided by the constitution to our hands, for the good of the country. This was my opinion in September—it is my opinion now. What we propose to do, and what we omit to do, are, in my judgment, likely to make a fearful, perhaps a fatal, inroad upon the unity of commerce between these states, as well as to embarrass and harass the employments of the people, and to prolong the existing evils.

Sir, whatever we may think of it now, the constitution had its immediate origin in the conviction of the necessity for this uniformity, or identity, in commercial regulations.

The whole history of the country, of every year and every month, from the close of the war of the revolution to 1783, proves this. Over whatever other interests it was made to extend, and whatever other blessings it now does, or hereafter may, confer on the millions of free citizens who do or shall live under its protection; even though in time to come, it should raise a pyramid of power and grandeur, whose apex should look down, on the loftiest political structures of other nations and other ages, it will yet be true, that it was itself the child of pressing commercial necessity. Unity and identity of commerce among all the states was its seminal principle. It had been found absolutely impossible to excite or foster enterprise in trade, under the influence of discordant and jarring state regulations. The country was losing all the advantages of its position. The revolution itself was beginning to be regarded as a doubtful blessing. The ocean before us was a barren waste. No American canvass whitened its bosom—no keels of ours ploughed its waters. The journals of the congress of the confederation show the most constant, unceasing, unwearied, but always unsuccessful appeals to the states and the people, to renovate the system, to infuse into that confederation at once a spirit of union and a spirit of activity, by conferring on congress the power over trade. By nothing but the perception of its indispensable necessity—by nothing but their consciousness of suffering from its want, were the states and the people brought, and brought by slow degrees, to invest this power, in a permanent and competent government.

Sir, hearken to the fervent language of the old congress in July, 1785, in a letter addressed to the states, prepared by Mr. Monroe, Mr. King, and other great names, now transferred from the lists of living men, to the records which carry down the fame of the distinguished dead. The proposition before them, the great objects to which they so solicitously endeavored to draw the attention of the states, was this, viz: that "the United States, in congress assembled, should have the sole and exclusive right of regulating the trade of the states, as well with foreign nations as with each other." This, they say, is urged upon the states by every consideration of local as well as of federal policy; and they beseech them to agree to it, if they wish to promote the strength of the union, and to connect it by the strongest ties of interest and affection. This was in July, 1785.

In the same spirit, and for the same end, was that most important resolution which was adopted in the house of delegates of Virginia, on the 21st day of the following January. Sir, I read the resolution entire.

"Resolved, That Edmund Randolph, and others be appointed commissioners, who, or any five of whom, shall meet such commissioners as may be appointed by the other states in the union, at a time and place to be agreed on, to take into consideration the trade of the United States; to examine the relative situations and trade of the said states; to consider how far a uniform system in their commercial regulations may be necessary to their common interest and their permanent harmony, and to report to the several states such an act relative to this great object, as, when unanimously ratified by them, will enable the United States, in congress assembled, effectually to provide for the same: that the said commissioners shall immediately transmit to the several states, copies of the preceding resolution, with a circular letter requesting their concurrence therein and proposing a time and place for the meeting aforesaid."

Here, sir, let us pause. Let us linger, at the waters of this original fountain. Let us contemplate this, the first step, in that series of proceedings, so full of great events to us and the world. Notwithstanding the embarrassment and distress of the country, the recommendation of the old congress had not been complied with. Every attempt to bring the state legislatures into any harmony of action, or any pursuit of a common object, had signally and disastrously failed. The exigency of the case called for a new movement; for a more direct and powerful attempt to bring the good sense and patriotism of the country into action upon the crisis. A solemn assembly was therefore proposed—a general convention of delegates from all the states. And now, sir, what was the exigency? What was this crisis? Look at the resolution itself; there is not an idea in it but trade. Commerce! commerce! is the beginning and end of it. The subject to be considered and examined was "the relative situation of the trade of the states;" and the object to be obtained was the "establishment of a uniform system in their commercial regulations, as necessary to the common interest and their permanent harmony." This is all. And, sir, by the adoption of this ever-memorable resolution, the house of delegates of Virginia, on the 21st day of January, 1786, performed the first act in the train of measures which resulted in that constitution, under the authority of which you now sit in that chair, and I have now the honor of addressing the members of this body.

Mr. President, I am a northern man. I am attached to one of the States of the north, by the ties of birth and parentage, education, and the associations of early life; and by sincere gratitude for proofs of public confidence early bestowed. I am bound to another northern state by adoption, by long residence, by all the cords of social and domestic life, and by an attachment and regard, springing from her manifestations of approbation and favor, which grapple me to her with hooks of steel. And yet, sir, with the same sincerity of respect, the same deep gratitude, the same reverence, and hearty good will, with which I would pay a similar tribute to either of these states, do I here acknowledge the commonwealth of Virginia to be entitled to the honor of commencing the work of establishing this constitution. The honor is hers, let her enjoy it; let her forever wear it proudly; there is not a brighter jewel in the tiara that adorns her brow. Let this resolution stand, illustrating her records, and blazoning her name through all time!

The meeting, sir, proposed by the resolution was held. It took place, as all know, in Annapolis, in May of the same year; but it was thinly attended, and its members, very wisely, adopted measures to bring about a fuller and more general convention. Their letter to the states on this occasion is full of instruction. It shows their sense of the unfortunate condition of the country. In their meditations on the subject, they saw the extent to which the commercial power must necessarily extend. The sagacity of New Jersey had led her, in agreeing to the original proposition of Virginia, to enlarge the object of the appointment of commissioners, so as to embrace not only commercial regulations, but other important matters. This suggestion the commissioners adopted, because they thought, as they inform us, "that the power of regulating trade is of such comprehensive extent, and will enter so far into the general system of the federal government, that to give it efficacy, and to obviate questions and doubts concerning its precise nature and limits, might require a corresponding adjustment of other parts of the federal system." Here you see, sir, that other powers, such as are now in the constitution, were expected to branch out of the necessary commercial power; and, therefore, the letter of the commissioners concludes with recommending a general convention, "to take into consideration the whole situation of the United States, and to devise such further provisions as should appear necessary to render the constitution of the federal government adequate to the exigencies of the union."

The result of that convention was the present constitution. And yet in the midst of all this flood of light, respecting its original objects and purposes, and with all the adequate powers which it confers, we abandon the commerce of the country, we betray its interests, we turn ourselves away from its most crying necessities. Sir, it will be a fact, stamped in deep and dark lines upon our annals; it will be a truth, which in all time can never be denied or evaded, that if this constitution shall not, now and hereafter, be so administered as to maintain a uniform system in all matters of trade; if it shall not protect and regulate the commerce of the country, in all its great interests, in its foreign intercourse, in its domestic intercourse, in its navigation, in its currency, in every thing which fairly belongs to the whole idea of commerce, either as an end, an agent, or an instrument, then that constitution will have failed, utterly failed to accomplish the precise, distinct, original object, in which it had its being.

In matters of trade, we were no longer to be Georgians, Virginians, Pennsylvanians, or Massachusetts men. We were to have but one commerce, and that the commerce of the United States. There were not to be separate flags, waving over separate commercial systems. There was to be one flag, the E PLURIBUS UNUM; and toward that was to be that rally of united interests and affections, which our fathers had so earnestly invoked.

Mr. President, this unity of commercial regulation is, in my opinion, indispensable to the safety of the union of the states themselves. In peace it is its strongest tie. I care not, sir, on what side, or in which of its branches, it may be attacked. Every successful attack upon it, made anywhere, weakens the whole, and renders the next assault easier and more dangerous. Any denial of its just powers is an attack upon it. We attack it, most fiercely attack it, whenever we say we will not exercise the powers which it enjoins. If the court had yielded to the pretensions of respectable states upon the subject of steam navigation, and to the retaliatory proceedings of other states; if retreat and excuse, and disavowal of power had been prevailing sentiments then, in what condition, at this moment, let me ask, would the steam navigation of the country be found? To us, sir, to us, his countrymen, to us, who feel so much admiration for his genius, and so much gratitude for his services, Fulton would have lived almost in vain.

State grants and state exclusions would have covered over all our waters.

Sir, it is in the nature of such things, that the first violation, or the first departure from true principles, draws more important violations or departures after it; and the first surrender of just authority will be followed by others more to be deplored. If commerce be a unit, to break it in any one part, is to decree its ultimate dismemberment in all. If there be made a first chasm, though it be small, through that the whole wild ocean will pour in, and we may then throw up embankments in vain.

Sir, the spirit of union is particularly liable to temptation and seduction, in moments of peace and prosperity. In war, this spirit is strengthened by a sense of common danger, and by a thousand recollections of ancient efforts and ancient glory in a common cause. In the calms of a long peace, and the absence of all apparent causes of alarm, things near gain an ascendancy over things remote. Local interests and feelings overshadow national sentiments. Our attention, our regard, and our attachment, are every moment solicited to what touches us closest, and we feel less and less the attraction of a distant orb. Such tendencies, we are bound by true patriotism, and by our love of union, to resist. This is our duty; and the moment, in my judgment, has arrived when that duty is summoned to action. We hear, every day, sentiments and arguments, which would become a meeting of envoys, employed by separate governments, more than they become the common legislature of a united country. Constant appeals are made to local interests, to geographical distinctions, and to the policy and the pride of particular states. It would sometimes appear that it was, or as if it were, a settled purpose, to convince the people that our union is nothing but a jumble of different and discordant interests, which must, ere long, be all returned to their original state of separate existence; as if, therefore, it was of no great value while it should last, and it was not likely to last long. The process of disintegration begins, by urging the fact of different interests.

Sir, is not the end obvious, to which all this leads us? Who does not see that, if convictions of this kind take possession of the public mind, our union can hereafter be nothing, while it remains, but a connexion without harmony; a bond without affection; a theatre for the angry contests of local feelings, local objects, and local jealousies? Even while it continues to exist, in name, it may, by these means, become nothing but the mere form of a united government. My children, and the children of those who sit around me, may meet, perhaps, in this chamber, in the next generation; but if tendencies, now but too obvious, be not checked, they will meet as strangers and aliens. They will feel no sense of common interest or common country; they will cherish no common object of patriotic love. If the same Saxon language shall fall from their lips, it may be the chief proof that they belong to the same nation. Its vital principle exhausted and gone, its power of doing good terminated, now productive only of strife and contention, and no longer sustained by a sense of common interest, the union itself must ultimately fall, dishonored and unlamented.

The honorable member from Carolina himself, habitually indulges in charges of usurpation and oppression against the government of his country. He daily denounces its important measures, in the language in which our revolutionary fathers spoke of the oppressions of the mother country. Not merely against executive usurpation, either real or supposed, does he utter these sentiments, but against laws of congress, laws passed by large majorities, laws sanctioned, for a course of years, by the people. These laws he proclaims, every hour, to be but a series of acts of oppression. He speaks of them as if it were an admitted fact, that such is their true character. This is the language which he utters, these the sentiments he expresses, to the rising generation around him. Are they sentiments and language which are likely to inspire our children with the love of union, to enlarge their patriotism, or to teach them, and to make them feel, that their destiny has made them common citizens of one great and glorious republic? A principal object, in his late political movements, the gentleman himself tells us, was to unite the entire south; and against whom, or against what, does he wish to unite the entire south? Is not this the very essence of local feeling and local regard? Is it not the acknowledgment of a wish and object, to create political strength, by uniting political opinions geographically? While the gentleman thus wishes to unite the entire south, I pray to know, sir, if he expects me to turn toward the polar-star, and acting on the same principle, to utter a cry of rally! to the whole north? Heaven forbid! To the day of my death, neither he nor others shall hear such a cry from me.

Finally, the honorable member declares that he shall now march off, under the banner of state rights! March off from whom? March off from what? We have been contending for great principles. We have been struggling to maintain the liberty and to restore the prosperity of the country; we have made these struggles here, in the national councils, with the old flag, the true American flag, the eagle, and the stars and stripes, waving over the chamber in which we sit. He now tells us, however, that he marches off under the state-rights banner!

Let him go. I remain. I am, where I ever have been, and ever mean to be. Here, standing on the platform of the general constitution—a platform broad enough, and firm enough, to uphold every interest of the whole country—I shall still be found. Intrusted with some part in the administration of that constitution, I intend to act in its spirit, and in the spirit of those who framed it. Yes, sir, I would act as if our fathers, who formed it for us, and who bequeathed it to us, were looking on us—as if I could see their venerable forms, bending down to behold us, from the abodes above. I would act, too, sir, as if that long line of posterity were also viewing us, whose eyes is hereafter to scrutinize our conduct.

Standing thus, as in the full gaze of our ancestors, and our posterity, having received this inheritance from the former, to be transmitted to the latter, and feeling, but if I am born for any good, in my day and generation, it is for the good of the whole country, no local feeling, no temporary impulse, shall induce me to yield my foothold on the constitution and the union. I move, under no banner, not known to the whole American people, and to their constitution and laws. No, sir, these walls, these columns "fly

From their firm base as soon as I."

I came into public life, sir, in the service of the United States. On that broad altar, my earliest, and all my public vows, have been made. I propose to serve no other master. So far as depends on any agency of mine, they shall continue united states; united in interest and in affection; united in every thing in regard to which the constitution has decreed their union; united in war, for the common defence, the common renown, and the common glory; and united, compacted, knit firmly together in peace, for the common prosperity and happiness of ourselves and our children.

TWENTY-FIFTH CONGRESS.

SECOND SESSION—SENATE.

April 6. The following, among other petitions, memorials, &c. were presented:

By Mr. Merrick: The preamble and resolutions of the legislature of Maryland, in favor of the United States contributing further aid to the construction of the Chesapeake and Ohio canal, or otherwise conveying the interest of the United States in that canal to the state of Maryland. Read, referred, and ordered to be printed.

By Mr. Sevier: From the legislature of Arkansas, on the subject of the public lands. Laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

On motion of Mr. Wright, the committee of finance were discharged from the further consideration of a variety of memorials on subjects connected with revenue and the currency; and they were ordered to lie on the table.

The bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Henry Fisher was read a third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. Linn, the committee on public lands were discharged from the further consideration of the petitions of Thomas Bailey and Nathaniel Hauser, the subjects of them having been embraced in general bills, passed or in progress.

On motion of Mr. Roane, the committee for the District of Columbia were discharged from the further consideration of a resolution adopted by citizens of Georgetown, (the object not heard.)

Mr. Young, on leave, introduced a bill granting a quantity of land to the Mississippi and Rock river canal company, to aid in constructing their canal. Read twice, and referred.

The bill requiring the clerks of the circuit court of the United States to keep a record of certain subjects, was considered, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Also, the bill for the relief of Joseph Lachine. The bill to extend the time for selling land granted to the Kentucky Asylum for the deaf and dumb, was read a third time and passed.

The senate resumed the consideration of the bill prohibiting the giving and accepting of challenges to duels in the district of Columbia.

Mr. Linn briefly urged, as reasons why the seconds in duels should not be subject to the same penalty as the principals, that it would prevent their appearance as witnesses, while it was a matter of extreme difficulty to get witnesses at all. They would find it also easy to evade the law, by a fictitious form in the challenge, such, for instance, as an invitation to tea. Mr. L. said he had consulted the senator from Delaware, who concurred with him in this view of the subject.

Mr. Clayton was understood to express his willingness to have the bill so modified.

The debate was continued by Messrs. Linn, Clayton, Prentiss, Hubbard, Smith, of Indiana, Niles, Grundy, and Sevier.

Mr. Sevier expressing his belief that no satisfactory law would be passed, moved to lay the whole subject on the table; which motion was negatived as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Linn, Nicholas, Preston, Roane, Sevier—5.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Clayton, Davis, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, Lumpkin, McKean, Merrick, Mouton, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Prentiss, Robinson, Ruggles, Smith, of Connecticut, Smith, of Indiana, Strange, Swift, Tipton, Trotter, Walker, White, Williams, Wright—27.

Mr. Clayton's amendment, making the highest penalty for the offence, confinement in a common jail not more than two years, a fine not exceeding $2,000, and disability to hold office under the United States, was lost as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Clay, of Alabama, Clayton, Fulton, Grundy, Linn, Nicholas, Norvell, Robinson, Strange, Trotter, Walker, White—12.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Davis, Hubbard, Lumpkin, Lyon, Merrick, Mouton, Niles, Pierce, Prentiss, Preston, Roane, Ruggles, Sevier, Smith, of Connecticut, Smith, of Indiana, Swift, Tipton, Williams, Wright—20.

The amendment from the committee on the judiciary, making the highest penalty confinement in the penitentiary from ten to twenty years, was adopted.

On motion of Smith, of Indiana, the lower limit of the time in this amendment was made five years instead of ten.

Mr. Norvell moved to make the higher limit of this time ten years instead of twenty. This motion (the yeas and nays being ordered on the call of Mr. Prentiss) was carried in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Clay, of Alabama, Clayton, Fulton, Linn, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Preston, Roane, Robinson, Ruggles, Strange, Tipton, Trotter, Walker, White—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Davis, Grundy, Hubbard, Lumpkin, Lyon, Merrick, Pierce, Prentiss, Sevier, Smith, of Conn., Smith, of Indiana, Swift, Williams, Wright—15.

Mr. Niles moved to amend the bill, by adding to the penalty a disability to hold any office of trust or profit under the United States Government.

After debate by Mr. Preston and Mr. Niles, this amendment was lost, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Davis, Grundy, Hubbard, Lumpkin, Niles, Pierce, Prentiss, Smith, of Connecticut, Swift, Trotter, Walker, Williams, Wright—14.

NAYS—Messrs. Clay, of Alabama, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Fulton, Merrick, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Preston, Roane, Robinson, Ruggles, Sevier, Smith, of Indiana, Strange, Tipton, White—17.

Mr. Smith, of Indiana, offered an amendment to the bill, requiring that, whenever there should be good cause to believe, in the opinion of a magistrate, that a duel was about to take place, the parties should be arrested, and bound for one year to keep the peace.

To this amendment Mr. Clayton objected as contrary to the constitution and the spirit of the common law.

Mr. Grundy also objected to making the bill too complicated, and hoped the amendment would be withdrawn.

Mr. Smith accordingly withdrew it.

Mr. Linn inquired whether the surgeons at a duel were to be punished by the bill. The reply was in the affirmative; all persons engaged in aiding or abetting were to be punished.

Mr. White, after a few remarks, which were understood to relate to the difficulty of carrying anti-duelling laws into effect, moved a substitute for the whole bill, requiring that every one about to take office under the United States should, so far as the constitution would allow, make oath that he had never been concerned in a duel, nor had given or accepted a challenge.

This amendment was lost as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Clay, of Alabama, Fulton, Linn, Nicholas, Norvell, Roane, Robinson, Ruggles, Sevier, Strange, Walker, White—13.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Clayton, Davis, Grundy, Hubbard, Lumpkin, Lyon, Merrick, Mouton, Niles, Pierce, Prentiss, Smith, of Connecticut, Smith, of Indiana, Swift, Trotter, Williams, Wright, Young—19.

The question now recurred on the second amendment from the committee, providing that persons going out of the District, with a view to evade the provisions of this bill, should be punished in the same manner as if they had remained in the District. This amendment was lost as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Davis, Grundy, Hubbard, Lumpkin, Merrick, Niles, Pierce, Prentiss, Smith, of Conn., Smith, of Ind., Strange, Swift, Williams, Wright, Young—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Clay, of Ala., Clayton, Fulton, Linn, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Roane, Robinson, Ruggles, Sevier, Trotter, Walker, White—16.

The bill, as amended, was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The senate then adjourned till Monday.

The bill, as it passed the senate, is in the following words:

A bill to prohibit the giving or accepting, within the District of Columbia, of a challenge to fight a duel, and for the punishment thereof.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in congress assembled, That if any person shall, in the District of Columbia, challenge another to fight a duel, or shall send or deliver any written or verbal message, purporting or intended to be such challenge, or shall accept any such challenge or message, or shall knowingly, carry or deliver any such challenge or message, or shall, knowingly, carry or deliver an acceptance of such challenge or message to fight a duel in or out of the said District, and such duel shall be fought in or out of the said District, and either of the parties thereto shall be slain, or mortally wounded in such duel, the surviving party to such duel, and every person carrying or delivering such challenge or message, or acceptance of such challenge or message as aforesaid, and all others aiding or abetting therein, shall be deemed guilty of felony, and upon conviction thereof, in any court competent to the trial thereof in the said District, shall be punished by imprisonment and confinement to hard labor in the penitentiary, for a term not exceeding ten years, nor less than five years, in the discretion of the court.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That if any person shall give or send, or cause to be given or sent, to any person in the District of Columbia, any challenge to fight a duel, or to engage in single combat with any deadly or dangerous instrument or weapon whatever, or if any person in said District shall accept any challenge to fight a duel, or to engage in single combat with any deadly or dangerous instrument or weapon whatever, or shall be the bearer of any such challenge, every person so giving or sending, or causing to be given or sent, or accepting such challenge, or being the bearer thereof, and every person aiding or abetting in the giving, sending, or accepting such challenge, shall be deemed guilty of a high crime and misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof, in any court competent to try the same in the said District, shall be punished by imprisonment and confinement to hard labor in the penitentiary, for a term not exceeding ten years, nor less than five years, in the discretion of the court.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That if any person shall assault, strike, beat, or wound, or cause to be assaulted, stricken, beaten, or wounded, any person in the District of Columbia, for declining or refusing to accept any challenge to fight a duel, or to engage in single combat with any deadly or dangerous instrument or weapon whatever, or shall post or publish, or cause to be posted or published, any writing charging any such person, so declining or refusing to accept any such challenge, to be a coward, or using any other opprobrious or injurious language therein, tending to degrade and disgrace such person for so declining or refusing such challenge, every person so offending, on conviction thereof in any court competent to the trial thereof, in the said District, shall be punished by confinement to hard labor in the penitentiary, for a term not exceeding seven years, nor less than three years, in the discretion of the court.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That in addition to the oath now prescribed by law to be administered to the grand jury in the District of Columbia, they shall be sworn faithfully and impartially to inquire into, and true presentment make of, all offences against this act.

April 9. After the presentation of petitions, chiefly from individuals, and the transaction of some minor business, the senate took up on its third reading, the bill to prohibit the giving and accepting of challenges to duels in the District of Columbia, and for the punishment thereof.

Mr. Clay, of Kentucky, said that he had taken no part heretofore in the debate to which this bill had given rise; but his silence did not proceed from any indifference which he felt to the laudible object which the senator from Vermont (Mr. Prentiss) proposed to accomplish by its introduction. No man would rejoice more sincerely than he should, in witnessing the absolute suppression, forever, of the unjustifiable practice which the bill denounces and seeks to discountenance. But he (Mr. C.) thought that the great object of legislation, on this subject, should be directed to the correction and purification of public opinion. In sections of the union, where the practice was not tolerated, it was public opinion that kept it down, by discouraging a resort to private combat to avenge or settle personal injuries. There it was no disgrace to decline such a combat. The man who should decline it was more, certainly not less, respected than if he had engaged in it. But it was otherwise in those sections where the practice prevailed. In these, the man that fights a duel, acts under the constraint of public opinion, which brands him with cowardice and dishonor if he does not resent with spirit, a personal insult or wrong. There the alternative presented to a person of honor and of nice sensibility, is, whether he shall live, covered with disgrace, an object of reproach, scorn and contempt, or encounter the hazard of death, without dishonor. But few honorable and high-spirited men were resolute enough to avoid the contest. Public opinion, which exacts the sacrifice, is as censurable as those who fall victims or conform to its stern commands. It was when public opinion should be rectified in this respect, that we might expect to see the abandonment of a practice which was contrary to humanity, abhorrent to reason, and condemned by our religion. In the mean time, it is the duty of the legislator to exert all his authority to bring about this desirable state of things. And he (Mr. C.) should vote, with pleasure, for the passage of the bill before the senate, under the anxious hope that, being the deliberate expression of the judgment of congress, it may contribute to enlighten the public mind; and that, if it should not totally eradicate, it may tend materially to diminish, a practice which all ought to unite in completely destroying.

The bill was then passed by the following vote, and sent to the other house for concurrence:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Clay, of Ala., Clay, of Ken., Clayton, Davis, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, Lumpkin, Lyon, McKean, Merrick, Mouton, Niles, Norvell, Prentiss, Roane, Robinson, Ruggles, Smith, of Conn., Smith, of Ind., Strange, Swift, Tipton, Trotter, Walker, Wall, White, Williams, Wright, Young—34.

NAY—Mr. Sevier—1.

The senate resumed the consideration of the bill to reduce and graduate the price of the public (refuse) lands.

Mr. Grundy offered the substitute (before laid on the table by him) providing for the reduction of the price twenty-five cents for every five years during the time the land shall be in market, from December next, down to the minimum price of fifty cents, waiting in each case one year before the reduction should take effect.

Mr. Grundy advocated this substitute at some length, as preferable to the substitute from the committee, which proposed that the lands should be reduced to four different classes, according to their value, to be estimated by the surveyor general and other land officers, chiefly from the field books of surveyors, which Mr. G. described as extremely doubtful and deceptive as a test of value. He regarded the simple test of time as both better and more safe for the public interests.

Mr. Walker explained and vindicated the substitute from the committee, but expressed himself as rather indifferent which of the two should be adopted.

Mr. Grundy said he was not satisfied with this explanation, and went into some further details in support of his substitute.

Mr. Sevier advocated Mr. Grundy's substitute as both more simple and more certain and showed in what respects the surveyor's field books must be deceptive, especially as they usually described the quality of only the small portion of the land which lay on or very near the lines of the survey.

Mr. Clay, of Alabama, argued that the plan proposed by the committee would be the most sure, inasmuch as the officers who were to make the estimate would have not only the field books, but also the position of the land, as near to or distant from a town or river to aid them in making that estimate. They would also have the time itself during which the land should have been in market, to aid them, on which alone the substitute of Mr. Grundy depended. He was, however, willing to take either proposition.

Mr. Clay, of Kentucky, said he wished now merely to remark that he felt an utter reluctance to reduce the price of land as proposed by the bill, or in any form whatever; and he thought it could be shown that the reduction ought not to be made. He was indifferent as to which of the various projects before the senate should be adopted; they might adopt either, and he (Mr. C.) would then take some opportunity to express his sentiments at large against the whole scheme of distributing in any way the existing prices of the public lands.

Mr. Grundy was understood to express himself as not much in favor of any reduction; but he was willing to go for such a measure, if he could in the mean time secure the public interests.

The substitute of Mr. Grundy was adopted without a division.

Mr. Niles proposed to amend the bill, as now modified, by making the minimum price 75 cents, to be obtained by a reduction of 25 cents successively at the end of seven and of twelve years. Negatived: Ayes 18, noes 19.

Mr. Niles then moved simply to make the minimum price 75 cents. Negatived: Ayes 18, noes 19.

Mr. Lyon offered an amendment as an addition to the bill granting to the states all the refuse lands within their respective boundaries, at blank price, after they should have been blank years in the market; but withdrew it after a brief conversation by Messrs. Lyon, Clay, of Alabama, Linn, and Clay, of Kentucky.

At the desire of Mr. Clay, of Kentucky, who said the measure was a very important one, involving an amount of hundreds of millions, as he would endeavor to prove when the senate should be more full, the proceedings on the bill were, by consent, suspended till Wednesday next, and the bill was ordered to be printed as amended.

The senate proceeded to consider the bill supplementary to the acts establishing the northern boundary of Ohio, involving certain large appropriations to the state of Michigan.

The subject of this bill was discussed by Messrs. Norvell, Crittenden, Lyon, Clay, of Ky., Sevier, Walker, Davis, Buchanan, Calhoun, and Tipton. The two main objections to the bill were the present embarrassed state of the treasury, and the undue partiality shown by this and other measures as to the new states.

On motion of Mr. Buchanan, made only on the former ground, and seconded exclusively on the same ground by Mr. Calhoun, the bill was postponed to the next session of congress by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Ala., Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Hubbard, Lumpkin, Merrick, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Prentiss, Rives, Roane, Strange, Swift, Trotter, Walker, White, Williams, Wright—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Fulton, Grundy, Lyon, Norvell, Robinson, Ruggles, Sevier, Smith, of Indiana, Tipton, Wall, Young—11.

The Chair presented a communication from the treasury department, in answer to a senate resolution of February 22d, with copies of the replies of the late deposite banks alluded to in that resolution.

The senate adjourned, after an executive session.

April 10. The Vice President presented a communication from the war department, in pursuance of a senate resolution of the 5th ult. offered by Mr. Davis, with reports from the third auditor and commissioner of pensions. Laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

After the presentation of petitions, &c. the senate took up the resolutions offered some time since by Mr. Davis, calling on the department for information to enable the senate to determine what fortifications might be diminished or dispensed with, and whether a system of defence, by the aid of steam batteries, would not be more economical and efficient than the present system. After Mr. Davis addressed the senate at some length in explanation of the subject, [his remarks shall have a place in our next.]

Mr. Benton insisted that all the information asked for was already before the senate, and he argued, at considerable length, and with much earnestness, that when the treasury was full, gentlemen of the opposition had resisted appropriations for the defences of the country, that they might save the money to debauch the people by the state deposits; and now, when the treasury was empty, they were bringing forward their own projects for expenditures on these defences.

Mr. Davis said, if the gentleman had listened more attentively, he could not have fallen into so a great mistake. Mr. D. had not proposed at all to increase the burden on the treasury; on the contrary, he had reform and retrenchment directly in view, in connexion with a system which he supposed might be more efficient as well as more economical. Mr. D. also went into some further particulars to show the advantages that might arise from the use of the steam batteries as auxiliaries to the existing system of defence.

The resolution was agreed to.

The senate took up the bill for the relief of Bolitha Laws, involving a question of interest, which was debated at much length by Messrs. Hubbard, Roane, Tipton, Wright, Rives, White, and Prentiss, and indefinitely postponed: Yeas 32, nays 5.

The bill for the relief of the heirs of Francis Remard was read a third time, and passed.

Mr. Roane presented a memorial from Georgetown, praying that it might be receded to the state of Maryland. Referred to a select committee of five.

The senate adjourned, after an executive session.

April 11. After the presentation of petitions, on motion of Mr. Walker, a call was made on the secretary of the treasury for statements showing what portion of the public lands in the several districts of the United States have been subject to sale at private entry at — cents and upwards.

The following bills were considered, and ordered to a third reading:

The bill supplementary to the act to provide for the settlement of titles to land in the town of Detroit, Michigan; for the relief of Jabez L. and Asa White; and of James Felton.

The bill for the relief of James McMaher, to remunerate him for expenses incurred by his having, at the instance of the post office department, pursued and prosecuted a mail depredator, was debated at much length, and ultimately passed over informally.

Mr. Walker rose, and called the attention of the senate to our relations with Mexico, and to the resolution on that subject adopted by the senate at the session of 1836-7, and proceeded to make some remarks, which brought on an irregular discussion, (to be given hereafter,) embracing, among other topics, a recent alleged attack on an American steamboat by some Mexican cruisers, in which Messrs. Walker, Buchanan, Clay, of Kentucky, Preston, Benton, and King, participated. The subject was dropped without action, as it was begun without motion; the impression appearing general that action on the subject ought now to originate in the other house.

Mr. Grundy gave notice that he should, on Monday next, move to take up the bill to prohibit the issuing and circulating of notes of the late Bank of the United States.

The senate resumed the consideration of the bill to reduce and graduate the price of the public lands.

Mr. Clay, of Kentucky, spoke at considerable length in opposition to the bill, and to all changes in the land system so long and so successfully in operation.

Mr. Grundy replied in favor of the bill, and offered an amendment providing that it should take effect only on lands already in the market.

This amendment was adopted without a division, although

Mr. Clay remarked that it would be nugatory, because the bill itself would establish a principle that would be used in future legislation on the subject.

After a few remarks from Mr. Hubbard, the bill being still up,

The senate adjourned, after a short executive session.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Friday, April 6. Memorials on the subject of the late duel were presented by Mr. Fairfield, of Maine, and referred.

Leave to present similar memorials being asked by Mr. Grant, of New York, the house refused to suspend the rules for the purpose.

A resolution, offered by Mr. Hall, of Vermont, instructing the select committee on this subject to report by bill certain restrictions upon the practice of duelling among members of congress, &c., was objected to, and, as it could not be received without suspending the rules, was not pressed.

[The following is a copy of the resolution.]

Resolved, That the select committee appointed on the 27th of February last (in addition to any legislative measures they may think proper to recommend for the suppression of duelling) be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing, by a rule of the house, for the expulsion of any member who, during the term for which he is elected, shall be concerned in a duel, either as principal accessory, or who shall send, bear, or accept a challenge; and further to inquire into the expediency of providing by another rule of the house for the appointment, at the commencement of each session, of a standing committee, whose duty it shall be, without special direction from the house, to examine summarily into any personal controversy arising between members, or in which a member is a party; and, if necessary to the adjustment thereof, to report to the house what order, in their opinion, ought to be taken on the same, providing in such rule for the expulsion or other punishment of any member who shall neglect or refuse to comply with such order as the house may make in the premises.]

Reports of committees were next presented in order, among them were the following:

Other memorials upon this and other topics being offered,

Mr. Whittlesy rose and said that, inasmuch as the chair had decided the morning hour to commence at the moment when the call for reports commenced, he should object to the presentation of all petitions at this time, in order that the house may come, as speedily as possible, to the [private] orders of the day.

By Mr. Smith, from the committee on commerce, bill making appropriation for building light-houses, light-boats, beacon-lights, buoys, and making surveys for the year 1838.

Also, a bill to test the practicability of establishing a system of electro-magnetic telegraphs for the United States.

Mr. Cushman, from the same committee, made a report against the memorial of the city council of Boston for measures to prevent the introduction of foreign paupers, and in favor of senate bill authorizing the sale of certain real estate at Bath, in the state of Maine, belonging to the United States, and the appropriation of the proceeds for a custom-house at that place.

Mr. Casey, from the committee on public lands, reported a bill granting a bounty in land to the organized militia men, mounted militia men, volunteers, and rangers, who defended the country during the late war with Great Britain.

Mr. Bronson, from the committee on territories, made a report against the memorial of the legislature of the state of Missouri, asking a cession of that tract of land between the Missouri and Des Moines rivers.

Mr. McKay laid before the house "a plan for the defence of the western frontier, furnished by major general Gaines."

Mr. S. W. Morris, from the committee of accounts, reported against the resolution of the house of the 5th instant, inquiring as to the expediency of allowing a fixed sum of money to each member at each session, of congress, in view of the ad libitum supply of stationery now allowed.

On motion of Mr. Phillips,

Resolved, That the chart accompanying the report of the survey of the harbor of Lynn, in Massachusetts, communicated to the house with the report of the secretary of war on the improvement of said harbor, be lithographed and published with said report.

On motion of Mr. Cambreleng, the speaker was authorized to appoint a member of the committee of ways and means, vice Mr. McKim, deceased.

Mr. Wise rose to make an inquiry of the chairman of the committee for the District of Columbia, if it be intended to make any report on the subject of the retrocession of the District to the states of Maryland and Virginia?

Noreply at first was given. The chairman of the committee was not, at the time, in his seat. But soon after he (Mr. Bouldin) came in, and the question being repeated, that gentleman replied, that that was a subject upon which the committee had not yet deliberated. When they had done so he would be quite happy to give his colleague (Mr. Wise) any information in his power on the subject.

On motion of Mr. Whittlesey, the house resolved itself into committee of the whole, (Mr. Corwin in the chair,) and took up the bill "to establish a board of commissioners to examine and decide certain claims against the United States," reported on the 23th ult. by Mr. Whittlesey, from the committee of claims.

Several amendments were proposed, and a discussion (which we will give hereafter) ensued upon them, and upon the general merits of the bill, in which Messrs. Adams, Whittlesey, of Ohio, Sergeant, C. Morris, of Pennsylvania, Craig, Underwood, and Legare, took part.

On motion of Mr. Bell, the committee rose, asked, and had leave to sit again.

On motion of Mr. Whittlesey, of Ohio, this bill was made the special order for to-morrow.

On motion of Mr. Mitchell, the house then (at 4 o'clock) adjourned.

Saturday, April 7. Mr. Henry, of Pennsylvania, asking leave to present and to have referred memorials upon the subject of the recent duel,

Mr. Whittlesey said that he must object, as he had notified the house yesterday he should do, in order that the private orders may be proceeded with without delay.

The motion by Mr. Pratt yesterday, that 1,000 copies (extra) of the report on the public buildings and grounds be printed, was first in order,

Mr. Sibley moved to amend by striking out 1,000 and inserting 3,000. Lost. Mr. Everett moved to add the letter of Mr. Mills, the architect, laid before the house on a former day. Lost. The house rejected the motion of Mr. Pratt, 66 to 61.

Mr. Hamer rose and stated that he had a resolution which he did not wish to offer at that time, but to ask the consent of the house to have it printed, and gave notice that, on Monday next, he should call it up and move its adoption.

"Considering that the business, commerce, circulation, and exchanges of the country are in a deranged and embarrassed condition: and

"Considering, also, that a part of the banks of the United States have expressed a desire to resume specie payments at an early period:

"Resolved by the senate and house of representatives of the United States of America in congress assembled, That if the banks, or a portion of them, do thus resume, it will be the duty of the general government, within the limits of its constitutional authority, to aid such banks, as the present administration designs to do, in regaining public confidence, and to sustain them in their laudable efforts to fulfil their obligations, to relieve the wants of the community, and to restore to the public a sound circulating medium."

Mr. Taylor, from the committee on invalid pensions, reported, without amendment, senate bill entitled "An act to revive and continue in force an act entitled 'An act to provide for persons who were disabled by known wounds received in the revolutionary war.'"

Also, a bill granting a pension to Harvey Reynolds.

Mr. Sibley, from the committee on revolutionary pensions, reported a bill granting a pension to Susanah Hoogland, and against the petition of Sherman Patterson.

Mr. Garland, of Louisiana, said he deemed the resolution offered by him yesterday so important, that he must again ask for its consideration. The resolution was as follows:

Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury be directed to inform this house, as soon as practicable, whether, in the present financial condition of the country and of the treasury, it will not be most judicious and proper to make such appropriations as will preserve the public works from injury and dilapidation alone: and if such a course will not be judicious and proper, he then inform the house whether some or all the estimates for the service of the year 1833 already submitted, for fortifications, the improvement of harbors and rivers, the establishment of light-houses, beacons, and buoys, the construction of roads, the service of the Indian department, and for all other purposes, cannot be reduced without injury to the public service; and if such reduction can be made, that he designate what proposed appropriations may properly be reduced, and how much; and further, that he inform the house whether some of the appropriations already made may not, without material injury to the country, be suspended for the present; if so, to designate them; also, that he inform this house whether, if all the appropriations made are expended, and those proposed are made, the amount now in the treasury, or estimated to come into it during the present year, will be sufficient to meet them; and, if not, what will be the deficit, and in what manner it is proposed to be met.

Objection being made, Mr. Garland moved that the rules of the house be suspended to enable him to offer it: and on this he asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered: and the vote on the motion to suspend was, yeas 76, nays 60. So the house refused to suspend the rules for this purpose.

The resolution of Mr. Hopkins upon the subject of the public printing was the unfinished business of the morning hour.

Mr. Bond, of Ohio, addressed the house (in reply to the remarks of Mr. Cushman) in support of the resolution, until the expiration of the morning hour.

Board of claims.

The bill upon this subject was resumed in committee of the whole, and several members addressed the committee upon it.

After which, on motion of Mr. Graham, of North Carolina, the committee rose, and had leave to sit again.

The Speaker laid before the house a letter from the acting secretary of war, transmitting a report of the colonel of ordnance, in compliance with the resolution of the house of the 21st ult. requiring information on the subject of the sale of the United States lead mines.

Also, the following letter from Mr. Patton:

WASHINGTON, April 7, 1838.

SIR: I have determined to accept an appointment which has been conferred on me by the general assembly of the commonwealth of Virginia. It seems to be desired by the legislature, that I should, with as little delay as possible, enter upon the duties of that appointment, and consequently vacate my seat in the house of representatives. In cheerful compliance with their wishes, I do hereby resign the same.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JOHN M. PATTON.

To hon. J. K. POLK,

Speaker of house of representatives.

The Speaker was, on motion, directed to acquaint the governor of Virginia that a vacancy existed in the delegation of that state.

The house then adjourned until Monday, at 11 o'clock A. M.

Monday, April 9. The journal being read, Mr. Hamer rose, and made some explanations with regard to the following resolution, which was ordered to be printed, on his motion, on Saturday.

"Considering that the business, commerce, circulation, and exchanges of the country are in a deranged and embarrassed condition: and

"Considering, also, that a part of the banks of the United States have expressed a desire to resume specie payments at an early period:

"Resolved by the senate and house of representatives of the United States of America in congress assembled, That if the banks, or a portion of them, do thus resume, it will be the duty of the general government, within the limits of its constitutional authority, to aid such banks, as the present administration designs to do, in regaining public confidence, and to sustain them in their laudable efforts to fulfil their obligations, to relieve the wants of the community, and to restore to the public a sound circulating medium."

Mr. Hamer remarked that, since the resolution was ordered to be printed, he had added thereto the following words, which now make part of it: "as this administration designs to do." Its presentation had seemed to excite some interest and inquiry in the house, as to its true construction. It had been intimated to him that, were the resolution to be printed without explanation, it might be inferred that the administration really entertained hostility to the banks which were about to resume specie payments; and that it was designed to induce them to alter their course in this respect. He had replied to these suggestions, that he would make such explanations, when the resolution came up; as would tend to avert such a misconception; and, considering the resolution as his own, and not yet in the possession of the house, he had thought he had a right to modify it; and had done so by inserting the words "as the present administration designs to do." If he had mistaken his right to do this, he was sorry, and asked the pardon of the house for doing so. He had merely intended to shield the administration from any distrust that might be occasioned by any act of his.

Mr. H. then modified his resolution by striking out the words above quoted; and asked leave to offer it in that shape.

Objections being made, Mr. H. moved to suspend the rules, and Mr. Sherrod Williams demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. McKennan demanded a call of the house, which was ordered; and 153 members were found to be present; and then the call was, on motion, suspended.

Mr. Parker, of New York, hoped the subject would be postponed until Wednesday.

Mr. Hamer wished as speedily an action upon it as possible.

The question on suspension was decided in the negative by the following vote: yeas 110, nays 61, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Alexander, H. Allen, Bell, Bidale, Bond, Boon, Bouldin, Briggs, Bronson, W. B. Calhoun, J. Calhoun, W. B. Carter, Casey, Cheatham, Childs, Clark, Clowney, Corwin, Cranston, Crockett, Darlington, Dawson, Deberry, Dennis, Dunn, Evans, Everett, Ewing, R. Fletcher, Fillmore, Foster, R. Garland, Goode, J. NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Beatty, Bicknell, Brodhead, Cambreleng, Chapman, Coles, Connor, Craig, Crary, Cushman, DeGraft, Dromgoole, Farrington, Fairfield, Fletcher, Fry, Grant, Harrison, Haynes, Holt, Howard, W. H. Hunter, R. M. T. Hunter, T. B. Jackson, N. Jones, J. W. Jones, Keim, Klingensmith, Mallory, Martin, McKay, McClellan, McClure, Miller, Moore, Morgan, S. W. Morris, Murray, Palmer, Parker, Pennybacker, Peckin, Pickens, Plumer, Potter, Reily, Rives, Robertson, Sheffer, Taylor, Turney, Vail, Webster, J. W. Williams, Worthington, Yell—61.

So (there not being two-thirds in favor) the rules were not suspended to allow Mr. Hamer's motion being received at this time.

Petitions were presented by Messrs. Evans, Fairfield, and Anderson, of Maine; Atherton, Cushman, and Williams, of New Hampshire; Calhoun, Reed, Fletcher, (for Mr. Phillips,) Hastings, and Adams, of Massachusetts; Cranston, of Rhode Island; Haley, and Holt, of Connecticut; Fletcher, Allen, and Everett, of Vermont; Peck, Russell, Grant, Patterson, Marvin, Pratt, Andrews, Moore, Jackson, Mitchell, Sibley, Hoffman, and Childs, of New York; Ayer, and Stratton, of New Jersey; Henry, Reily, Potter, Sergeant, Darlington, Plumer, Klingensmith, McClure, Naylor, and Toland, of Pennsylvania; Milligan, of Delaware; Howard, of Maryland; Morgan, Taliaferro, Beirne, Johnson, Rives, and Pennybacker, of Virginia; Elmore, of South Carolina; Connor, Shepperd, and Shepard, of North Carolina; Grantland, of Georgia; Hawes, and Underwood, of Kentucky; Carter, Turney, and Polk, of Tennessee; Morris, Kilgore, Leadbetter, Harper, Coffin, Goode, Whittlesey, and Allen, of Ohio; Johnson, of Louisiana; Boon, Dunn, White, Ewing, Herod, Rariden, and Graham, of Indiana; Casey, of Illinois; Miller, and Harrison, of Missouri; Yell, of Arkansas; Crary, of Michigan; Downing, of Florida; and Jones, of Wisconsin.

Among these petitions, a great number were upon the following subjects: The recent duel; the sub-treasury scheme; a national bank; the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia; the prevention of trade in slave property in the States; the annexation of Texas to the United States; the resolution of the 21st of December last; the Cherokee treaty, &c. which were appropriately disposed of.

Mr. Adams, presenting memorials against the sub-treasury scheme, and in favor of a national bank, remarked that he hardly knew what to do with these memorials. The sub-treasury scheme was sleeping, and, as he hoped, the sleep of death. He presumed that there was not now much necessity of petitioning congress against that. But he would move to refer the memorials to the committee of the whole on the state of the union, which had under its consideration the project of a new treasury. Ordered accordingly.

Mr. Everett, of Vermont, ordered another protest of the Cherokee nation against the New Echota treaty; which he moved to have printed.

On presenting this memorial and protest, Mr. Everett said he wished to say to the house and to the memorialists, that he considered the previous action of the house as final for this session, and that he should make no other motion than that the memorial and protest be printed; which was ordered.

On motion of Mr. Martin, it was laid on the table. The committees were called, in order, for reports, and the following were presented:

Mr. Whittlesey, of Ohio, from the committee of claims, reported against the petition of John L. Bogardus.

Mr. Taylor, from the committee on invalid pensions, reported a bill granting a pension to John H. Lincoln.

Mr. Sawyer, from the committee on expenditures for the public buildings, made a report, exhibiting a statement of the balance due on the account of the commissioner of public buildings, rendered for 1837, and the money appropriated and expended by act of July 4, 1836, of which the following is an abstract:

Balance due on account of 1836	$16,005 30
Amount drawn by warrants issued by the secretary of the treasury for 1837	89,749 75
Total	105,755 05
Amount expended	94,093 62
Leaving an unexpended balance of	11,661 43
Add for old copper sold	386 62
Leaving to the credit of the United States	$12,048 05

On account of the treasury building.

Amount drawn by warrants issued by the secretary of the treasury	$180,000 00

On motion of Mr. McKay.

The house proceeded to the consideration of the resolution of Mr. Thompson, presented on the 19th of March last, directing the secretary of the treasury to furnish the house with a statement of the amount of revenue received in each state or territory during the year 1836, &c. and the same was read, and agreed to.

On motion of Mr. Ewing.

Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury be directed to inform this house what claims confirmed by the commissioners for examining claims to land in the district of Vincennes, under the act of congress approved March 26, 1804, entitled "An act making provision for the disposal of the public lands in the Indian territory, and for other purposes," have been located and patented, and by and to whom the location was made and the patent obtained; what confirmed claims have been located and not yet patented; and what confirmed claims have not been located or patented, if, according to the construction given to the law by the department, the title of the United States is absolutely and completely vested in the claimants after the location, and before possession is acquired and a patent issued, or, if some title does not remain in the United States, until possession or patent be obtained by the proper claimant; if a territorial act imposing a land tax could by tax sale vest title to confirmed tracts not patented; and if justice and expediency do not urge a quantity of land be set apart equal to satisfy confirmed claims not yet surveyed, located, or patented, with the appointment of commissioners authorized to receive testimony in relation to claims neglected for want of proof, or suspended for want of due attention on the part of the claimant, as set forth in the published report of the former board appointed to receive and decide upon said claims; and, also, that he furnish this house with copies of any opinions of the attorney general of the United States, and all instructions of his department touching or relating to any of the points herein contained.

Mr. Cavalry Morris submitted the following preamble and resolution, which were agreed to:

Whereas, the statement of the expenditure of the moneys appropriated for the contingent expenses of the military establishment for the year 1837, submitted to the house by W. B. Lewis, second auditor in the treasury department, contains an item of $800 allowed to Samuel Lewis, by the secretary of war, for the services of his son, Edward, (a minor) as a clerk in the pension bureau, war department, from July, 1818, to July, 1819, which said services were rendered more than nineteen years since:

And, whereas, the said Samuel Lewis has repeatedly presented said claim to both houses of congress, and it has been rejected; therefore,

Resolved, That the committee on the expenditures of the department of war be instructed to inquire into and report to this house the facts connected with the case, and why said claim was paid after having been repeatedly rejected by both houses of congress.

On motion of Mr. Taylor.

Resolved, That the committee for the District of Columbia be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making provision for giving to Richard Lawrence, confined in the jail of this city as a lunatic, and others similarly situated, the benefits of some suitable lunatic asylum.

Mr. Bond resumed his remarks upon the resolution under consideration during the morning hour, and spoke thereon until the expiration of the hour.

Several bills from the senate received their first and second reading, and were appropriately referred.

The senate anti-duelling bill.

This bill came from the senate, and received its first and second reading. Mr. Fairfield moved that it be referred to the select committee on the subject, now in session. Mr. Dringooole moved its reference to the committee on the judiciary; which motion having precedence, was put first, and prevailed.

A debate arose on the motion of Mr. Montgomery to recommit the bill to the committee of ways and means, for the purpose of obtaining a statement of the precise sum to be expended upon the exploring expedition.

Without taking the question, the house (at half past four o'clock) adjourned.

Tuesday, April 10. Mr. Hunter, of Ohio, and Mr. Lincoln, of Massachusetts, who have both been confined to their rooms for some days by indisposition, have sufficiently recovered to be able to attend the house to-day.

A number of reports were received, among them the following:

Mr. Bouldin, from the committee for the District of Columbia, moved to be discharged from the consideration of the resolution relative to a retrocession of the District of Columbia; which motion was postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. Hemus Allen, from the committee on invalid pensions, reported against the resolution of the 5th of March last, for extending the provisions of the act of 3d March, 1837, so as to embrace all persons who have been or may hereafter be wounded in the service of the United States; also, against the petition of Archibald Brockwell, and moved to be discharged from the petition of John W. Cox, and that it be committed to the committee of the whole house; likewise, against petitions of Maria Everett and Mary Glanville.

On motion of Mr. Briggs.

Resolved, That the chart of the country across the isthmus of Panama, accompanying the president's message on the subject of a canal or water communication between the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, be lithographed and published with said message.

Mr. Dawson, from the committee for the District of Columbia, reported a bill from the senate directing the mode of recording deeds within the District, with amendments, which were agreed to, and the bill as amended was read a third time and passed.

Mr. Thomas, from the committee on the judiciary, moved that that committee be discharged from the consideration of the senate's bill to punish duelling, and that it be referred to the select committee on the late duel, and the means of preventing future duels; which was agreed to.

Mr. Bond occupied the residue of the morning hour in discussing the resolution of Mr. Hopkins, to divorce congress from the newspaper press.

The house then resumed the consideration of the navy appropriation bill.

And the question being on the motion of Mr. Montgomery of North Carolina, to recommit the bill, with instructions, to designate the special amount to be appropriated for the exploring expedition,

Mr. Bronson, of New York, addressed the house at length in support of the motion to recommit.

When, at the request of Mr. Cambreleng,

Mr. Montgomery modified his motion to recommit, and accepted the following proposed by Mr. Cambreleng, viz. to amend the bill by so reducing the several items of appropriation as in effect to cut off the expedition by refusing the means of carrying it on, viz. to strike out $1,312,000 for the pay of officers and seamen, and insert $1,172,100; to strike out $600,000 for provisions, and insert $361,000; to strike out $75,000 for medicines, surgical instruments, hospital stores, and other expenses on account of the sick, and to insert $72,300; and to strike out for miscellaneous expenditures $450,000, and insert $439,300.

The debate, the report of which will be given hereafter, was further continued by Mr. Bronson, Mr. Mercer, and Mr. Crary; all of whom opposed the amendments.

Mr. Cambreleng himself said he should vote against it: he had only suggested it as a substitute of the motion of Mr. Montgomery, to avoid a recommitment of the bill.

Mr. Mallory now moved further to amend the bill by adding as a proviso that no part of the money appropriated by this bill should be applied after the 1st of May next to the south-sea exploring expedition, without the further action of congress.

Mr. Montgomery accepted this as a further modification of his motion.

Mr. Wise then took the floor, and went into an extended speech in opposition to the expedition, and in favor of converting it into a coast squadron.

He was followed by Mr. Reed, who advocated the expedition as a measure of the greatest practical utility, as perfectly practicable, and as now required by the honor of the nation.

Mr. Cushman now moved the previous question: but the house refused to sustain the call, only 36 rising in its favor.

Mr. Sergeant made an earnest appeal against the abandonment of the enterprise.

After a brief explanation by Mr. Wise, the question was put on Mr. Montgomery's motion as modified by the acceptance of the two amendments of Mr. Cambreleng and Mr. Mallory, viz. to reduce the appropriations, and to confine their application to the expedition to the 1st of May next—and decided by yeas and nays in the negative: yeas 57, nays 91.

Mr. Cambreleng offered one or two verbal amendments to the bill, not connected with the exploring expedition, which were agreed to.

Mr. Mallory moved to add a proviso, that in officer the expedition, the law of February, 1799, (which forbids vessels of a certain size to be commanded by officers under the rank of a captain) should not be violated.

This amendment was promptly negatived; and the bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time to-morrow.

The house then adjourned.

Wednesday, April 11. The first business before the house, being a report of the committee for the District of Columbia, in opposition to a memorial praying for a retrocession of the District to the states of Virginia and Maryland—

Mr. Bouldin, chairman of the committee who had made the report, moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the subject, and that the report be laid upon the table.

Mr. Adams hoped the subject would be disposed of in some other manner than that proposed by the gentleman from Virginia. It included very many important considerations, one of which was the continuance of the seat of government in this place. He did not desire a discussion, but hoped to get a direct vote upon the subject.

The question being taken, the committee were discharged, and the report, as moved by Mr. Bouldin, laid on the table.

The following, among other reports, were received from standing committees:

Mr. McKay, from the committee on military affairs, reported a bill concerning the western frontier, and against the resolution of the house of the 19th March last, relative to amending the act of 19th May, 1836, "to provide for the payment of volunteers and militia corps in the service of the United States," by adopting the following section: "That so much of the second section of the act above named as relates to the allowance of ———— a day to the officers of mounted companies, or the use and risk of each horse, shall be considered as extending to all staff officers of said volunteers or militia corps above the grade of captain."

Mr. Harlan, from the committee on private land claims, reported against senate bill No. 17, to provide for issuing patents for certain lands at Green Bay, Wisconsin territory.

Mr. Jones, of New York, reported a bill making an appropriation for the compilation of the laws of Florida.

Mr. Wise, (who had just entered the house,) expressed a desire that some gentleman who had voted to lay the report of the committee for the District of Columbia on the table, would move a reconsideration of the vote, to give an opportunity for him to move that the report be referred to a committee of the whole house on the state of the Union. He believed that the committee had taken a mistaken view of the subject, and that a majority of the house would be found to be in favor of reconsideration.

Mr. Bouldin said he had moved to lay the report on the table only because he believed that a discussion of it would inevitably involve the discussion of a subject which the house had determined should not be agitated in this house. For himself, his own personal opinion was, most decidedly, that it would be far better that all restrictions should be taken off, and that the people should know exactly and fully all that was going on; but in deference to the decision of the house, and also to the wishes of his own constituents, he had made the motion to lay on the table.

Mr. Wise renewed his appeal to the southern gentlemen. The discussion of the report would not involve the subject of abolition in the remotest degree. He wished to avoid that subject, and it was precisely to avoid it that he wanted this report referred to a committee of the whole. He wanted to have the subject put at rest forever. A favorable opportunity was now presented to effect this, and, if it were suffered to pass by, they might never have another.

Mr. Harlan now moved a reconsideration of the decision to lay the report of the committee upon the table. Mr. Wise gave a notice that, if a motion to reconsider should prevail, he would immediately move to refer the report to a committee of the whole on the state of the union. Mr. Mason, of Ohio, moved to lay Mr. Harlan's motion for reconsideration on the table. Mr. Wise demanded on this motion the yeas and nays. Mr. Adams gave notice to the gentleman from Virginia that, if he supposed the subject of abolition would not be involved in the discussion of this report, he was widely mistaken. It would involve that subject most deeply and thoroughly: as well as the question of the continuance of the seat of government within the District of Columbia.

Mr. Wise said all the abolitionists were opposed to reconsideration, because this District was their chosen field of operations; every southern man ought to vote for reconsideration, expressly with a view to take this field out of their hands.

The yeas and nays were taken upon the motion of Mr. Mason, and it was decided in the affirmative—Yeas 82, nays 63.

So Mr. Harlan's motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

The House then passed to the unfinished business of the morning hour, which was the consideration of Mr. Hopkins' resolutions on divorcing the government from the newspaper press.

Mr. Bond resumed and continued his speech in support of the motion; until he was again cut short by the expiration of the morning hour.

Mr. Cambreleng moved that the house proceed to the orders of the day.

Mr. Wise, by consent, put to Mr. Hamer the inquiry when the house might expect his promised resolution on the subject of the resumption of specie payment by the banks.

Mr. Hamer rose, and was about to reply, when Mr. Petrikin objected. [A laugh.]

Mr. Wise, moved to suspend the rules to allow of the reply being given; but the house refused to suspend—Yeas 86, nays 64: not two-thirds.

The navy appropriation bill was then read a third time, and put on its passage, when

Mr. Mallory, of Virginia, after a few prefatory remarks, read a letter from com. Jones, addressed to himself, and vindicatory of his character as connected with the exploring expedition: and said that, at a proper time, he should move its reference to a committee of the house with a view to a regular investigation of the whole subject. Mr. M. then went into a series of remarks explanatory of the course of the commodore.

Mr. Hoffman explained on the subject of the appointment of lieutenant Wilkes, which he insisted was not an infringement of the rights of senior officers, inasmuch as this was a special service, to which the ordinary rules of seniority did not apply, as was manifest in the British practice in the case of Cook, Ross, and Parry, who were all inferior officers when appointed on similar expeditions.

The discussion of this point was continued between Messrs. Hoffman and Wise, in several rejoinders.

Mr. Ingham then made some statements in relation to the alleged expenditures on the expedition, insisting that after the due deductions had been made for the vessels and material still on hand, the loss which had occurred would not amount to $100,000.

Mr. Wise controverted this, and insisted that the loss would be little short of a quarter of a million. He then gave some advice to the friends of the administration on the subject of economy.

Mr. Boon moved the previous question, and, after two counts, the motion was sustained: Yeas 63, nays 64.

The previous question was then put and carried, and the bill was passed.

A bill from the senate for completing the removal of the raft in Red river, was read a third time, and passed.

The bill for continuing the Cumberland road through Indiana and Illinois, with amendments from the committee of the whole on the state of the union, coming up next in order, was debated throughout the residue of the sitting.

Mr. Underwood moved to recommit the bill to the committee of the whole, with instructions to report a bill ceding the whole of the road, in its present state, to the states through which it runs.

The motion was supported by Mr. Campbell, of South Carolina, warmly opposed by Messrs. Ewing and Boon, of Indiana, and explained and defended by the mover, when Mr. Pope, of Kentucky, having obtained the floor, gave way for a motion to adjourn; and the house thereupon adjourned.

THURSDAY'S PROCEEDINGS.

Senate, April 12. Mr. Buchanan presented the proceedings of a meeting in Washington county, Pennsylvania, on the subject of the late duel, and recommending to congress to pass a law prohibiting any one concerned in a duel from holding any office under the government. Laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Norvell offered a resolution, which lies over one day, that senators, if absent, must be absent on leave, or be necessarily detained by sickness, under the penalty of not receiving their pay during such absence.

Mr. Grundy, from the select committee on the case of Mr. Ruggles, accused of corrupt practices, made a report, accompanied with documents, to which was appended the following resolution, unanimously approved by the committee, and which lies on the table for consideration:

Resolved, That there is no sufficient evidence to establish the charges of corruption made against the hon. John Ruggles.

On motion of Mr. Grundy, (the report having been read,) 500 extra copies of the report and documents were ordered to be printed.

On motion of Mr. Wall, the report of captain Carney and others, on certain coast surveys, was referred, and ordered to be printed.

The bills supplementary to the act for the adjustment of titles to land in Detroit, Michigan, and for other purposes; for the relief of Jabez L. and Asa White; and for the relief of James Dutton, were severally read a third time, and passed.

The bills for the relief of Elias Johns, of Christopher Clark, of Thomas Cooper, and of Philip Marshall, and others, were severally considered, and ordered to a third reading.

The bill to authorize the importation, duty free, of one of Napier's improved printing presses, was recommitted to the committee on finance.

The senate resumed the consideration of the bill to reduce and graduate the price of the public lands.

On motion of Mr. Hubbard, the bill was modified so as to make the minimum price seventy-five cents, and the longest time for any particular process of reduction ten years.

Mr. Walker entered into a general argument, chiefly statistical, in favor of the bill. Mr. Benton spoke also in favor of the bill. Mr. Crittenden spoke briefly in opposition to the bill. Mr. Tipton moved to amend the bill by limiting each purchaser under it to a quarter section. Mr. Walker moved to amend this amendment by fixing the limit to one section instead of a quarter.

These amendments were discussed by Messrs. Tipton, Clay, of Alabama, Walker, Sevier, Robinson, King, and Benton.

Mr. Walker's amendment, fixing the limit on one section for each purchaser, was agreed to: Yeas 18, nays 14.

Mr. Tipton, on the suggestion of Mr. Walker, amended his amendment as now modified, by providing that no purchaser under this bill should be prohibited from buying any quantity of land at $1 25 per acre.

The amendment, thus amended, was adopted by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Buchanan, Clay, of Ky. Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Hubbard, McKean, Merrick, Nicholas, Niles, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Roane, Robbins, Smith, of Connecticut, Smith, of Indiana, Swift, Tipton, Walker, Wall, Williams—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Clay, of Alabama, Fulton, Grundy, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Lyon, Norvell, Robinson, Sevier, Trotter, White, Young—14.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Clay, of Alabama, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Lyon, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Robinson, Sevier, Smith, of Indiana, Tipton, Trotter, Walker, White, Young—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Buchanan, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, McKean, Merrick, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Roane, Robbins, Smith, of Connecticut, Swift, Wall, Williams—16.

The senate then adjourned.

House of Representatives, Thursday April 12. Mr. Fairfield and Mr. McKennan, on leave, presented sundry memorials on the subject of the late duel.

Mr. Naylor asked leave to offer two resolutions of inquiry in the following terms:

Whereas a resolution was passed this house on the seventh of December last, requesting the president of the United States "to furnish to this house (among other things,) copies of all letters, documents, and communications which have passed between the secretary of the navy, the commissioners of the navy board, and the officers or persons relative to all matters connected with the preparation, outfit, and sailing of the exploring expedition;" and whereas this house has not yet been furnished with the documents, letters, and communications called for, although upwards of four months have elapsed since the passage of the resolution, and the session is now drawing towards a close:

Therefore, resolved, That the president of the United States be requested to inform this house whether or not he intends to comply with the request of this resolution, by transmitting the copies of the documents, letters, and papers called for, and why they have not long since been furnished.

Resolved, That the president of the United States be requested to communicate as early a time as practicable whether the number of the scientific corps appointed to the exploring expedition has been, or is to be, reduced; and if so, to communicate the names of those who are to be dismissed, copies of their appointments, and the causes of the reduction; as also copies of all letters and correspondence which have passed between them, or either of them, and the secretary of the navy, secretary of war, commissioners of the navy board, or any other agent or officer of the United States relative to the matters connected with the objects, preparation, outfit, and sailing of the expedition.

The house refused leave to Mr. Naylor to offer these resolutions at this time. The vote on this request disclosing the fact that no quorum was present—

Mr. Haynes moved a call of the house.

On this motion, Mr. Petrikin demanded the yeas and nays; which, being taken, resulted as follows—Yeas 58, nays 63. So the call was refused.

The following reports were received:

Mr. Underwood, from the select committee appointed on the 25th December last, reported a joint resolution, requiring the secretary of war to deliver to Frederick Hancock and George W. Woodward the flag carried by the enemy in the battle and massacre of Wyoming in July, 1778, to be deposited

In such place as the people of Wyoming Valley may designate, until the president of the United States may think proper to reclaim it.

Mr. U. briefly explained the grounds of the report, and observed that, since the application for this flag had been made, it had been discovered that it was not the flag borne by the American forces, but by their enemies and cruel destroyers. He also said he had consulted the account of the massacre, as given by Potter in his history of the United States, but on referring to gentlemen from the spot, he had been assured that the representations of that historian were extremely inaccurate, and not at all to be relied upon. He quoted, particularly, Potter's description of the massacre, and said he had been informed that nearly the whole was without foundation. As to the resolution itself, he presumed there could be no objection to it. It merely gave a permission which, under the circumstances, would probably never be acted upon.

Mr. Petrikia, the representative from Wyoming, observed that but one person had been here examining the flag in the first instance; since then, others had seen it, and ascertained that it was the flag of the British party who had been engaged in the massacre, and there was now no desire at Wyoming to possess or to look at it. He hoped the resolution would not pass; and he moved to lay it on the table. He withdrew the motion, however, at the request of

Mr. Potter, of Pennsylvania, who addressed the house in remarks of some length, of which a report shall appear in our next.

Mr. Petrikia now renewed his motion to lay the resolution on the table; which was agreed to. So the resolution was laid on the table.

The house now passed to the orders of the day, and resumed the consideration of the bill to extend the Cumberland road through Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois; and the question being upon the motion of Mr. Underwood, proposing a re-commitment of the bill, with instructions to cede the road to the states through which it passes; together with an amendment thereto moved by Mr. Ewing, as follows:

Provided, however, That the same sum per mile be, and is hereby appropriated to finish and complete the work yet unfinished, to Jefferson city, in the state of Missouri, as has been expended per mile on the portion of said road already transferred and ceded to the states through which it passes; and said average sum per mile shall be paid to the states immediately interested, in three annual instalments, the first to be payable on the passage and approval of this act.

Mr. Pope, who had the floor from yesterday, went into a general discussion of the origin, progress, constitutionality, and expediency of continuing and completing the road. He examined the doctrine of contract as applied to this work, insisting that the government was bound to complete it, and dwelt upon the injustice and the national disgrace of now abandoning the work.

Mr. Halsey, of Georgia, next took the floor, in decided opposition to the bill generally; insisting that the appropriations for this road went to create a national debt, and to advance consolidation. He argued the constitutional question, insisting that the whole system of internal improvements by the general government was unconstitutional, and that the continuance of this road was bad policy in every view. He utterly scouted the doctrine of contract as binding the general government to its construction.

Mr. Robertson expressed much gratification at the presentation of Mr. Underwood's amendment, in which he thought he saw the dawn of better times—when the system of internal improvements by the general government should be totally abandoned, or at least placed upon a footing of more equal justice. He denied the obligation of any contracts in relation to this road between the states and the general government, since the states had received far over the amount of their 2 per cent. fund.

Mr. Underwood supplied him with a statement going to show that more than seven millions had been expended upon this road by the United States.

Mr. Robertson then went into a constitutional argument against the system of internal improvements as a whole. If the system operated unequally, it ought to be abolished as unjust; if it operated equally, it ought to be abolished as useless. He adverted to the exhausted state of the treasury, and appealed to the friends of the administration as having the power to arrest this system; for which there could not be a better opportunity than the present.

Mr. Raviden traced back the history of the road from its commencement; adverted to the continued favor shown it by the government; the sanction of its constitutionality by Jefferson, Madison, and Gallatin, Monroe, Adams, and Jackson; and deprecated the injury which must result from withholding the appropriation now proposed in the bill. He regretted the unexpected quarter from which the opposition to it now proceeded.

Mr. Atherton expressed his concurrence in the views taken by Messrs. Campbell, Underwood, and Robertson, against the bill; denied the obligation of any contract in the matter; quoted a speech of Mr. Clay's in the senate, in 1835, and another of Mr. P. Barbour's in the house, of an earlier date; argued generally against the system, and concluded by sending to be read at the clerk's table certain resolutions adopted by the legislature of New Hampshire.

Mr. Good briefly expressed his regret at the position of Mr. Underwood to the bill.

Mr. Mercer then went into an extended vindication of the bill, and of the system of internal improvements generally; he went into the question of its constitutionality, and referred to Messrs. Giles and Randolph, of Virginia, as having both reported in favor of the system, of which those two decided advocates of state-rights were virtually the fathers. He argued the right to make this and other roads in the new lands, on the ground of proprietorship in the United States, and insisted strongly on their utility and indispensable importance in time of war; an event he dreaded as likely soon to take place on our western frontier. In conclusion, he replied to the speech of Mr. Robertson, whose charges against the manner in which the system had been conducted he considered as very unfair.

Mr. Haynes having obtained the floor, moved an adjournment; which motion prevailing.

The house adjourned.

CHRONICLE.

Texas. The assembly of New York by a vote of 80 to 13, have adopted the following resolution—

Resolved, (if the senate concur,) That the admission of the republic of Texas into this union would be entirely repugnant to the will of the people of this state, and would endanger the union of these United States."

The Boston Post says that the president and cashier of the Commercial bank of that city have been returned by the grand jury as guilty of wilful perjury, and warrants have been issued against them. They have both absconded.

Department of State, Washington April 2, 1838. Information has been received at this department from the consul of the United States at Kingston, Jamaica, in a letter dated on the 19th ultimo, that a duty of six dollars and fifty cents per thousand is now charged at that port on flooring boards that are tongued, grooved and planed, being one dollar sixty-two and a half cents more than when in a rough state.

Gen. Wm. H. Marriott, of the city of Baltimore, was on the 12th inst. unanimously nominated by the convention of the friends of the national administration, as a candidate for congress to supply the vacancy occasioned by the death of Mr. McKim.

Blasphemy. The supreme court of Massachusetts has denied to Abner Kneeland the right of appeal to the supreme court of the United States, against the verdict of a jury, pronouncing him guilty of blasphemy. When Mr. Kneeland had read his reasons for an appeal, the Boston Post says, "That chief justice Shaw replied that an appeal would not lie because the case did not come within any law of the United States. Neither did the state law under which he was convicted, conflict with any provision of the constitution of the United States. That constitution only prohibited congress from passing laws respecting religion; and therefore left it to the state to legislate upon that great subject. His honor added, that if he knew of any way in which Mr. K.'s case could be carried up to the United States supreme court, he certainly would inform him of the best course to pursue to effect that purpose. If the case were appealable, a writ of error was the only method known to the law, by which it could be done."

Dreadful casualty. The Nashua (N. H.) Gazette of Friday states that the following dreadful casualty occurred in the town of Nelson on the previous Saturday. Henry Melville, esq., president of the Manufacturers' Bank at New Ipswich, was engaged in blasting rocks, and was stooping down to communicate fire to the train, when a coal was blown by the wind directly upon the powder, and the whole charge exploded. Mr. Melville was shockingly mangled; his arm and shoulder were broken, his head bruised, and both his eyes put out. In this state he lingered till Tuesday night last, when he expired. He was about fifty years of age, and was extensively known and respected.

Dahlias. It is little more than twenty years since the first dahlia was introduced into Europe, and already it has become the universal favorite of the florists. It is a native of the marshes of Peru; and was called after Dahl, the famous Swedish botanist. The number of known varieties is nearly five hundred.

The net profit derived by the East India Company from the opium sold at Calcutta in the year 1836-7, is estimated at nine and a quarter millions of Spanish dollars. The amount sold in that period was 16,916 chests. It is usually calculated that the cost of the company is 250 rupees per chest, but in the above estimate, the cost is put at 30. The total amount received from the four sales in 1836-7 was 25,395,300 rupees. The value of the sicca rupee is about 46 cents. The amount sold last year is more than double the sale of 1831-2. The greater part of this opium goes to China.

New Orleans and Texas. The intercourse between New Orleans and Texas is becoming daily more frequent, and calls are already made in the New Orleans papers, for increased facilities of conveyance. The steam packet Columbia, the only one in the trade, has been doing a highly profitable business, having conveyed about seven hundred passengers, within the last two months, besides freight sufficient to pay for fuel and other charges. The Bulletin urges that the steam packet Cuba be put into the trade.

Great fire at Natchitoches. A fire occurred at Natchitoches, Lou. on the 17th of March which laid a fair portion of the town in ruins. It broke out in the building owned by Mr. Crossman, and before the citizens could check its progress, it had laid desolate half the square upon which the Episcopal church stood. The residence of Mrs. Harrison, Dr. Hord, Mr. Crossman, Mr. Martin, together with all the out houses from the church (including that building) on church street, to the old Exchange bank on St. Dennis street; from thence the whole width of the square to second street. The loss is estimated at $90,000. It originated through the negligence of a servant in the kitchen.

In the senate yesterday, the bill to prevent the issuing and circulation of the notes of the late Bank of the United States was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading: Ayes 27, nays 14.

BANKS, CURRENCY, &c. It will be seen from our notice of the proceedings of the late bank convention, inserted in a subsequent page, that that body adjourned, sine die, on Monday last, after recommending to all the banks of the several states to resume specie payments on the first Monday of January next, without precluding an earlier resumption on the part of such banks as may find it necessary, or deem it proper. The recommendation was adopted by the following vote:

Yeas.	Nays.	Absent.
Maine,	New York,	New Hampshire,
Vermont,	Mississippi,	Pennsylvania,
Massachusetts,		Maryland,
Rhode Island,		South Carolina,
Connecticut,		Georgia,
New Jersey,		Ohio,
Delaware,		Kentucky,
District of Columbia,		Tennessee,
Virginia,		Alabama,
North Carolina,		Michigan.
Indiana,
Illinois,
Missouri.

The committee was composed of one hundred and forty-three delegates, from eighteen different states, viz:

Maine,	1	Pennsylvania,	2
Vermont,	6	Maryland,	6
N. Hampshire,	1	Dis. of Columbia,	2
Massachusetts,	21	Virginia,	4
Rhode Island,	9	North Carolina,	1
Connecticut,	21	Indiana,	1
New York,	40	Mississippi,	2
New Jersey,	14	Illinois,	2
Delaware,	3	Missouri,	1

We have before us a number of comments upon the proceedings. The Philadelphia U. S. Gazette, in alluding to the negative votes given by New York and Mississippi, says—

The banks of the former are compelled, by legislative enactment, to resume in May. The latter, Mississippi, was most anxious to have the resumption deferred to July, 1839, when the proceeds of another crop would be realized.

"Considering the peculiar outcry recently made in Virginia, undoubtedly many will be surprised to perceive that the banks of that state went for the most distant date of resumption, viz. January; and the Boston banks, carrying with them the votes of Massachusetts, Maine, and Connecticut, were on the same side, notwithstanding the comforting conclusions to which the New Yorkers had come relative to their eastern brethren.

"The banks of New York, it will be perceived, were the only ones that desired the early resumption, and they desire it because, by the laws of that state, they were compelled to resume in May. The bank convention, then, has sustained Mr. Biddle's letter, and thus averted from itself the ridicule which would have followed its adoption of the N. York plan."

The New York Commercial says—"It is understood that the New England delegations avowed themselves ready to resume with New York, provided they could be satisfied that it was best to do so, irrespective of the situation of the banks of the south and west. But of this fact they were not satisfied—their opinion being that the business relations of the whole country ought first to be so far adjusted, as to enable the banks of the union to resume simultaneously. The Connecticut delegates from the first avowed their readiness to resume with New York, provided the banks of the latter would assure them that their depositors were to be paid in specie. The funds of the Connecticut banks being mostly in New York on deposit, they should of course look to the New York banks for the means of sustaining their own resumption."

"It is not to be denied, however, that the eastern delegates were disposed, rather to favor the views of the Philadelphia and Baltimore banks, than those of New York. In a free conversation with several of those delegates, they frankly avowed that their interests and sympathies were with Philadelphia and Baltimore, for the reason that while the course of the New York banks, during the year past, had in a measure closed New York against them as a market, the opposite policy of Philadelphia and Baltimore had opened those cities as markets for their manufactures."

On Thursday, the 12th instant, governor Marcy transmitted a special message to both houses of the legislature, recommending that the commissioners of the canal fund be authorized to issue the state stock, required for the completion of the public works, and loan it to the banks, if the emergency shall arise demanding its use, in aid of a resumption of specie payments.

In the senate, the message was referred to the committee on banks, (Messrs. Powers, Wager, and Moseley,) and in the house, to a committee of one from each senate district, consisting of Messrs. Birdseye, Ruggles, Floyd, J. Miller, Mann, Wardwell, G. W. Patterson, and Hurd. On Tuesday last the committee of the house made a report adverse to the recommendation of the governor, and concluding with the following joint resolutions:

1st. That the senators and representatives of the state of New York in congress, be requested to exert every effort to procure the passage of a law or resolution, directing the officers of the general government to receive the bills of specie-paying banks.

2d. That the governor convene the legislature at any time on or before the 16th of May next, whenever he shall have occasion to believe the banks will be obstructed or embarrassed in the resumption or maintenance of specie payments, whether by the united action of the general government, or that of the Bank of the United States, or any other cause.

3d. That the legislature have entire confidence in the ability of the banks to continue the resumption.

4th. But if it shall be found otherwise, pledges the legislature to come to the rescue of the banks of this state, with the most ample measures and means to the full extent of the resources and credit of the state.

The message shall have a place in the next "REGISTER."

A slip from the Nashville Whig under date of 6th instant, states that the Planters' Bank of Tennessee had refused to receive Alabama bank paper except in payment of debts due it, and it is inferred that the Union bank would adopt the same course.

The same slip says—

The brokers are buying eastern funds to-day—such as U. S. Bank notes, floating bank checks, &c. at 16 a 18 per cent. pre.; Virginia money 14a16 do.; N. & S. Carolina and Georgia 6 to 8 do.; Ky. 14a 15 do.; specie 17a18 do.; gold 18a19 do.; N. O. funds 10a12 do.

The rates of Mississippi money have not varied since last report—river banks 12 1-2 to 15 dis., interior to 20 do.

We again caution our country friends against the notes of the Brandon Bank. A letter from N. O. dated on Sunday says, they are selling there at 30 per cent. disc., and the situation of the bank is believed to be critical.

FROM FLORIDA. The account of the capture of the Indians encamped near fort Jupiter is confirmed. A letter from that post, dated the 23d ult. which we find in a St. Augustine paper of the 7th instant, contains the following notice of that event:

"The grab game has been played. On the morning of the 21st, about two o'clock, we moved, part crossing the creek, the balance heading it. Having formed ourselves according to previous arrangements, we waited the approach of day, and then the signal was given to advance, when the whole force moved up simultaneously, and, before they had time to look around, the Indians were completely surrounded. The whole number, men, women, and children, is 512; 146 rifles, 149 warriors. No news about future movements—many conjectures."

St. Augustine, April 7. Three hundred of the captured Indians have been shipped to Key Biscayne, and the remainder have gone over land to Tampa. More recent arrivals inform us that col. Bankhead had come up with Sam Jones, about 45 miles southwest of fort Jupiter, whom he attacked in front and endeavored to surround; but, after a skirmish of a few minutes, the Indians fled. They are now on an island in the Okee-chobe, from which it is said they cannot escape. Previous to the attack, it is stated a flag of truce was sent to them, but the Indians fired upon it.

The following is an extract of an order issued by general Jesup, in reference to this capture:

ORDERS NO. 77.

Head quarters, army of the south,
Fort Jupiter, Florida, March 23, 1838.

Par. 1. The major-general commanding returns his thanks to colonel Twigg and the officers and soldiers of his command, for the admirable manner in which they performed the duty assigned to them this morning. Colonel Twigg's plan for surrounding and securing the Seminoles was most judicious, and such was the prudence and judgment with which it was executed, that more than five hundred Indians, and among them about a hundred and fifty warriors, were taken and brought into camp, without the loss of a single drop of blood on either side.

By order of major-general Jesup:

THE CHEROKEES. It is said, that general Scott is to be despatched to the Cherokee country, and will repair there in a few days. To look down all opposition at once, and to prevent any repetition of such scenes as have occurred in Florida, it is also said that he will be authorized to call for a military force from Tennessee, Georgia, Alabama, and North Carolina. About seven regiments, besides regular troops, may be called into service—and in the long run, it will be the soundest economy.

PENSIONS, &c. The following circular to pension agents has been issued by the second comptroller, in conformity with the law of the 6th instant, therein referred to:

CIRCULAR.
Treasury department,

Second comptroller's office, April 12, 1838.

SIR: I herewith transmit, for your information and guidance, a copy of "An act directing the transfer of money remaining unclaimed by certain pensioners, and authorising the payment of the same at the treasury of the United States," passed the 6th instant.

Hereafter, you will make no payments where the pension claimed has remained due for the term of eight months after the same became payable. The law above mentioned being peremptory, no payments made in violation of it can be admitted to your credit.

In order that the accounting officers may be in possession of such evidence as will afford a check against double payments, you will, immediately on receipt of this circular, and hereafter immediately on the expiration of eight months subsequent to each semi-annual payment, certify to this office a correct list, containing the name, rank, rate of pension, and amount due, of all the pensioners remaining unpaid on the roll of your agency, whose pensions have been due and payable for the term of eight months prior to the date of such certificate.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
ALBION K. PARRIS, Comptroller.

An act directing the transfer of money remaining unclaimed by certain pensioners, and authorising the payment of the same at the treasury of the United States.

Be it enacted by the senate and house of representatives of the United States of America in congress assembled, That all money which has been, or may hereafter be, transmitted to the agents for paying pensions, which may have remained, or may hereafter remain, in the hands of said agents unclaimed by any pensioners for the term of eight months after the same may have or become due and payable, shall be transferred to the treasury of the United States; and that all pensions unclaimed as aforesaid, shall be thereafter payable only at the treasury of the United States, and out of any money not otherwise appropriated.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the transfer directed by the first section of this act shall be made by the draft of the commissioner of pensions upon the agents for paying pensions, and in favor of the treasurer of the United States; and that the form of said draft shall be prescribed by the secretary of war.

Mr. CHEVALIER, a gentleman appointed by the French government to examine into our system of internal improvements, has the following observations upon the currency in his excellent letters concerning this country. Coming from a source at once enlightened and disinterested, they merit consideration.

"Credit is the primary element of life in the United States; they live on it. Without credit, those populous towns which arise on all sides of it as if by enchantment; those rich states which fringe the margin of the Atlantic, which stretch to the west of the Alleghany, and extend along the coast of the Ohio and Mississippi, would have been still savage forests and bottomless morasses. New York alone possesses twenty banks: the mean of its annual discounts is £25,000,000; whereas, at Paris, the total discounts of the banks were, in 1831 £9,000,000; in 1832, only £6,000,000. At Philadelphia, in 1831, the discounts rose to £32,000,000.

A general shake to credit, even for the shortest time, is here more terrible than the most frightful earthquake. The banks have acted as a lever which has enabled the Americans to establish among themselves, to their own great profit, the agriculture and industry of Europe, and which has covered their own territory with cities, canals, rail roads, manufactories and fertile fields; in a word, every thing which constitutes civilization. Without banks, the cultivator would have been destitute of capital for his necessary advances: he would have had no instruments for clearing his farm; and if the system has led in many cases to absurd and gambling speculations, it is the same system which has enabled the farmer to purchase land for two dollars an acre, which he afterwards sold for ten or a hundred.

The mechanics who are now so loud in their condemnation of the banking system, forget that it is to it that they owe the industrious activity which has enabled them to earn from five to eight shillings a day wages. They forget that it is it which has furnished them with the means, of which so many have availed themselves, of rising to opulence and comfort; for, in America, every enterprising man who can give the guaranty of a tolerable character is sure of obtaining credit and thus certainly accumulating a fortune."

TEXAS. The Albany Argus of the 9th inst. on noticing the discussion, in the assembly, of the resolution against the admission of Texas into the union said, whatever may be the opinions of the people of this state upon the abstract question, one thing is scarcely a matter of doubt, that a legislative expression upon the subject at this time is not required either by the people or by their representatives in congress; and that the effort to act upon it, at the heel of the session, and under a great pressure of the public business, can scarcely be viewed in any other light than a part of the game of abolition and sectional agitation by which the combined forces of the opposition hope to aid their party movements. Whether it is intended to stand in lieu of a direct abolition expression on the subject of slavery in the District of Columbia (to which it is said a majority of the 'whigs' of the present legislature are committed) we are not advised. The first resolution objecting to the admission of Texas as repugnant to the will of the people and hazardous to the union, was passed by the aid of the previous question—the second, however, protesting against such admission, lies over.

ANDREW JACKSON. The extraordinary career of this favorite of fortune, it is universally admitted has made a deep and abiding impression upon the government and people of the United States, but that the hand of nature had stamped his image in the solid and disemboveled rock of the land, is a circumstance not generally known. Nevertheless such is the fact. A recent discovery in geology has rendered his memory immortal, even if his extraordinary actions have failed to secure that boon for him, and wedded his corporeal proportions and facial lineaments to stone as effectually as could the chisel of Grenough, Powers, or Clevinger.

This is no joke, much as the relation may wear the outward garb and habit of one. In rounding and polishing one of the beautiful stone columns which ornament the front of the Franklin Bank of this city on High street, a very striking full length likeness of general Jackson was developed, composed of impressions made by the oxyde of iron, and plainly imprinted by the hand of nature on the third column north of the four front columns. It is not a mere fancied likeness to perceive which it is necessary to call up the imagination; but one remarkably striking and perfect, particularly in the general cast of the countenance, and the position of the hair, the latter so peculiar in the likeness of the general, and never mistaken.

This likeness can be recognised from any part of the opposite side of the street for the extent of a whole square—but it can be seen to the most advantage from the pavement of our friend Russell, almost immediately opposite the bank. The beautiful phenomenon was taken from the stone quarry at Waverly, on the Ohio canal, about sixty miles south of this city. [Columbus (O.) Register.]

MARYLAND BANK LAWS. The following law was passed at the recent session of the legislature of Maryland:

A bill, entitled an act for the better regulation of the banking institutions, in the state of Maryland.

Section 1. Be it enacted by the general assembly of Maryland, That from and after the passage of this act, it shall be the duty of the president and directors of the several banks and saving's institutions in this state, during their suspension of specie payments, to transmit a monthly statement under oath, of their condition to the treasurer of the western shore, to be by him laid before the governor of the state.

Sec. 2. And be it enacted, That it shall be the duty of the president and directors of the several banking institutions in this state, to transmit to each other, at least once in every month, a statement, under oath, containing a particular account of their responsibilities, and their available means to meet them.

Sec. 3. And be it enacted, That no bank in this state, during the suspension of specie payments, shall extend the circulation of its notes, to an amount exceeding three times the amount of gold and silver in its vaults, which may be the property of such institution, and after the resumption of specie payments, to an amount exceeding the capital of such bank actually paid in.

Sec. 4. And be it enacted, That the several banks and saving's institutions of this state, shall resume the payment of their issues in coin on the first day of January next, or within thirty days after such a course shall have been adopted by the banks of New York, Pennsylvania, and Virginia, should they resume specie payments previous to said day, and each and every bank and saving's institution complying with these conditions, shall be and they are hereby released from all the penalties incurred by a suspension of specie payments, or the issues of bank notes or certificates of deposits, not authorised by the provisions of their respective charters.

Sec. 5. And be it enacted, That no bank in the state shall issue, after the first day of May next, any bank note, certificate of deposit, or any paper intended to be used as a circulating medium, of a less denomination than five dollars.

Sec. 6. And be it enacted, That the governor may direct the attorney general to cause a scire facias to be issued against any bank or saving's institution that may fail to comply with the provisions of this act, and in that case the same proceedings shall be had in all respects as are directed by the act of 1818, chap. 177, in regard to banks refusing to pay specie for their notes.

Sec. 7. And be it enacted, That any officer or officers who shall make a false or fraudulent report, required to be made by this act, shall be subject to all the pains and penalties of wilful and corrupt perjury.

THE BANK CONVENTION.

The convention adjourned sine die on Monday afternoon, having previously agreed upon the first Monday of January next as the period for the resumption of specie payments. The following account of its closing proceedings is from the New York Express:

The bank convention. The bank convention adjourned sine die, yesterday afternoon, after a long and wordy session. On Saturday the delegates from Maryland withdrew. The debate on the report fixing the 1st of October for the resumption was continued at great length. The object appeared to be to harmonise, and thus, by a spirit of compromise, to agree on some period when all should unite for that purpose. June, July, and other months were named, but there was not found a sufficient vote to settle on either of the months, when finally the first Monday in January was adopted, thirteen states voting for it, and two states, viz. New York and Mississippi, against it.

The two latter although voting in the negative—thus voting from reasons wholly unlike in feeling. New York wanted May, and Mississippi a year hence. Maryland was not represented in the vote, nor was Pennsylvania. New York was unyielding, and showed no spirit of compromise,—alleging the law of the states as a bar. All representations from other states were willing to yield. Mr. Gallatin urged with great earnestness an early day. Some of the gentlemen supposed that putting off the day would be a victory for Mr. Biddle, or the United States Bank, and all these considerations were disclaimed, yet if this is correct, New York is contending for immediate resumption, and the United States Bank for a more remote day, and the decision has been made in favor of Mr. Biddle. This position, however, is not one that any of the convention took.

The New England states, some of them at least, were ready to resume at a day's notice, but the question was not what would suit them best, but that would be most judicious and most beneficial to the south, as well as the east and west. The proposition which has been adopted will not interfere with the conduct of any bank, as any, all or none, are at liberty to resume at their pleasure, but it is incumbent on them to resume by the first Monday of January next.

The session is now closed, and although there was a good degree of harmony among the members, yet it was not to be supposed that all sections of the country were situated alike; New York, particularly, is in a position of great delicacy, and however much she may wish to prolong the day, she is under the absolute necessity of resuming in May, unless the legislature alter the law, of which there is no prospect at present.

It is hardly to be expected that other banks that are not bound down by their states, should voluntarily place themselves in a condition with New York. There is a preamble to the resolution expressing a hope that the government will co-operate in the plan agreeably to the private letters that had been received from the members of the administration.

The preamble and resolutions which were finally adopted are as follows:

"Whereas it is found necessary in order to simultaneous action by the banks in the resumption of specie payments so to proceed in designating a period for that purpose as to secure the nearest approach to unanimity—and whereas whilst in the judgment of the convention, the return to specie payments and preservation of the currency in a sound condition, will depend essentially on the course of the general government, yet this convention regards it as the duty of the banks to make the effort in good faith, exclusive of any direct reference to the prospective measures of the government. At the same time the convention has been happy to observe in recent letters of the secretary of the treasury, specific assurances of an intention to sustain the banks so far as it may be done through the fiscal operations of that department of the government—

Resolved, That it be recommended to all banks of the several states to resume specie payments on first Monday of January next, without precluding an earlier resumption on the part of such banks as may find it necessary or deem it proper.

The following preamble and resolution will show the course which the New York banks will take on the subject:

NEW YORK, April 16th, 1838.

At a meeting of the delegates of the city and country banks of the state of New York, held in this city, this day, the following preamble, and resolution were unanimously adopted, and ordered to be published.

Whereas the law which legalized the suspension of specie payments will expire, by its own limitation on the 15th of May next, and whereas the effects of a resumption are considerations which more properly pertain to the legislature than to the banks; therefore, without attempting to foresee what the effects may be, but hoping they may not be injurious to the commerce and industry of the state, and with a determination to render to those interests all the assistance which shall be found compatible with a discharge of our legal obligations,

Resolved, That the banks of this state be recommended to resume specie payments on or before the 10th day of May next.

C. W. LAWRENCE, Chairman.

W. M. Vermyle, Secretary.

The following letter was addressed to the bank committee in New York, by the delegation of the Philadelphia banks, which attended the former convention:

PHILADELPHIA, January 31, 1838.

Cornelius Hoyer, John J. Palmer, and J. Boorman, enquies, New York.

GENTLEMEN: Your favor of the 26th instant, addressed to H. Nixon, esq., chairman of the committee appointed by the general delegation of the banks of Philadelphia, has been duly submitted to the delegation, together with a detailed exposition of the views expressed by you in your personal conference with the committee. Both have been considered with the respectful attention due the importance of the proposal, and to the high character of those from whom it comes; and I am instructed by the delegation to communicate to you the result of their deliberation.

The case presented to the delegation, is understood to be, in substance, this,—

That the New York banks being under a legal necessity of resuming specie payments early in May next, and not being able to calculate upon a further extension of the suspension laws of that state, are desirous of ascertaining whether the banks of Philadelphia will now agree to name, either that period, or a later period, for a simultaneous resumption by the banks of the two cities; or, if this be deemed inexpedient, whether they would enter into any agreement for the liquidation of balances on either side, on the principle of mutual forbearance in drawing specie, for a limited period after such resumption by either party.

The decision on this proposal, seems mainly to depend on the relation which the banks of Philadelphia now bear to the other banks of the United States.

The resumption of specie payments was justly regarded by the banks of New York, as a matter not local to any section of country, but of general interest to the whole union; and with this view, their circular, proposing a convention, was addressed to banks in all the states, and especially urged, "the importance of having every state represented;" accordingly, the convention consisted of delegates from nineteen states of the union, who, after full and frequent consultations on the state of the banks they represented, and the general prospects of the country, came to the following resolutions:

1st. That they would resume specie payments when it may be permanently practicable.

2nd. That it is not expedient or prudent now to fix a day for the resumption of specie payments.

3d. That they would adjourn to the second Wednesday of April next, for the purpose of then considering, and if practicable, determining, upon the day when specie payments may be resumed.

4th. That the convention strongly recommend to all the banks in the United States, to prepare themselves for a return to specie payments, within the shortest practical period after the next meeting of the convention; and

5th. That the banks in those states not now represented, be earnestly requested to send delegates to the adjourned meeting of this convention; and that the several delegates from all the states be desired to procure all such information in regard to the condition of the banks in their respective states as may be attainable.

The general scope of these proceedings obviously is, that the convention thought it inexpedient then to name a day for the resumption, but deem it more prudent to postpone their decision to a subsequent period, when the delegates then attending should return, with more precise information of the state of their banks, and other states would be represented; and in the interval all would be preparing for the resumption, when permanently practicable.—The convention then adjourned on the 2nd of December, to meet on the 2d Wednesday in April.

Of this interval, fifty-five days have elapsed at the date of your letter, and seventy-five still remained. It does not appear that any facts have since been disclosed, which were not known to the convention; nor has any circumstances occurred in the general condition of the country, which was not then anticipated. It is undoubtedly true, also, that any resumption, to be easy must be simultaneous, and to be effectual, must be general; nor is it less true that a partial resumption, by any party to the convention, must derange the relations of the whole to each other, and disturb the preparations which all are making to produce a uniform result at the period fixed by the convention. The banks of Philadelphia, therefore, consider it scarcely just or respectful to the banks of other states, whose co-operation was in the first instance invited, to take any steps in opposition to what was settled by the convention, with a full concert with the other members of that body, who separated under conviction that no action would take place, on a matter so important to their interests, until they were re-assembled.

To this opinion they the more readily incline, because, in the convention itself, a distinct proposition to appoint a committee of that body, with power to re-assemble the convention whenever they thought the condition of the country justified the measure, was declined; and a certain day for the adjourned meeting was fixed by the convention, so as to leave no discretionary authority whatever to make an earlier call.

On a careful consideration of all these circumstances, I am instructed to inform you that the banks of Philadelphia think it premature to name any day for the resumption of specie payments, until the adjourned meeting of the convention.

Nevertheless, if the banks of New York shall determine that their peculiar position constrains them to an earlier resumption than was contemplated by the convention, or than they would themselves adopt on general considerations, I am authorized to assure you that this difference of opinion abates nothing of the anxious desire of the Philadelphia banks to resume at the earliest period permanently practicable; and that while preparing for that event, they will abstain, as far as possible, from any measures which may interfere with the efforts of the banks of New York, and will cheerfully adopt any reciprocal agreement for the liquidation of balances on either side.

In the mean time,

I have the honor to be,

With great respect, yours.

SPEECH OF MR. CALHOUN,

OF SOUTH CAROLINA,

In reply to Mr. Webster, on the sub-treasury bill. Delivered in the senate of the United States, March 22, 1838.

MR. PRESIDENT: After having addressed the senate twice, I would owe an apology, under ordinary circumstances, for again intruding myself on its patience. But, after what fell from the senator from Mass., nearest to me, (Mr. Webster,) the other day, the greater part of which was not only directed against my arguments, but at me personally, I feel that my silence, and not my notice of his remarks, would require an apology. And yet, notwithstanding I am thus constrained again to address the senate, I fear it will be impossible to avoid exciting some impatience, fatigued and exhausted as it must be, by so long a discussion; to prevent which, as far as practicable, I shall aim at as much brevity as possible, consistently with justice to myself and the side I support.

The senator's speech was long and multifarious, consisting of many parts, which have little or no connection with the question under consideration. For the sake of brevity and distinctness, I propose to consider it under four heads. First, his preliminary discourse, which treated at large of credits and banks, with very little reference to the subject. Next, his arguments on the question at issue; and that to be followed by his reply to my arguments at this and the extra session; and, finally his conclusion, which was appropriated wholly to personal remarks, and a comparison between his and my public course, without having the slightest relation either to the subject or any thing I had said in the debate, but which the senator obviously considered as the most important portion of his speech. He devoted one day almost wholly to it, and delivered himself with an earnestness and vehemence which clearly manifested the importance which he had attached to it. I shall, as in duty bound, pay my respects first to that, which so manifestly occupied the highest place in his estimation, though standing at the bottom in the order of his remarks.

The senator opened this portion of his speech with much courtesy, accompanied by many remarks of respect and regard, which I understood to be an intimation that he desired the attack he was about to make to be attributed to be political, and not personal motives. I accept the intimation, and shall meet him in the sense he intended. Indeed, there never has been, between the senator and myself, the least personal difference, nor has a word having a personal bearing, ever passed between us in debate, prior to the present occasion, within my recollection, during the long period we have been in public life, except on the discussion of the force bill and proclamation, which, considering how often we have stood opposed on deep and exciting questions, may be regarded as not a little remarkable. But our political relations have not been on as good a footing as our personal. He seems to think that we had harmonized not badly till 1824, when, according to his version, I became too sectional for him to act any longer with me; but which I shall hereafter show originated in a very different cause. My impression, I must say, is different, very different, from that of the senator's. From the commencement of our public life to the present time, we have differed on almost all questions involving principles of government and its permanent policy, with the exception of a short interval, while I was in the war department, when the senator agreed with the south on the protective system and some other measures. I do not consider our casual concert, during the last few years of the late administration, when we were both opposed to the executive power, as constituting an exception. It was understood that we both adhered to our principles and views of policy without the least surrender, and our personal relations were formal and cold, during the whole period. In fact, we moved in entirely different spheres. We differed in relation to the origin and character of the government, the principles on which it rested, and the policy it ought to pursue; and I could not at all sympathize with the grave and deep tone with which the senator pronounced our final separation, as he was pleased to call it, and which, in my opinion, would have been much more appropriate to the separation of those who had been long and intimately united in the support of the same principles and policy, than to the slight and casual relations, personal and political, which had existed between us.

Setting, then, aside all personal motives, I may well ask, what political grief, what keen disappointment is it, which at this time could induce him to make the attack he has on me, and, I might add, in the manner in which he made it? The senator himself shall answer the question. He has unfolded the cause of his grief, and pointed to the source of his disappointment. He told us that "victory was power." These few words are a volume. They disclose all. Yes, victory was within reach; the arm outstretched, the hand expanded to seize it, and I would not co-operate. Hence the grief, hence the keen disappointment, and hence the waters of bitterness that have rolled their billows against me. And what a victory! Not simply the going out of one party and the coming in of another; not merely the expulsion of the administration, and the induction of the opposition, but a great political revolution, carrying with it the great fundamental principles of the government and a permanent change of policy. It would have brought in, not only the senator and his party, but their political creed, as announced by him in the discussion on the proclamation and force bill, with which he now taunts those in power—a fact to be noted and remembered. He, the champion of those measures, against whom I contended foot to foot for one entire session, now casts up to me, that in refusing to co-operate with him, I protect the party in power, not a small portion of whom, I have good reason to believe, were drawn by the adverse current of the times reluctantly from their own principles to the support of those measures, and with it the senator and his principles. Yes, I repeat, it would have brought in the senator and his consolidation doctrines, which regard this government as one great national republic, with the right to construe finally and conclusively the extent of its own powers, and to enforce its construction at the point of the bayonet; doctrines which, at a blow, sweep away every vestige of state-rights, and reduces the states to mere petty and dependent corporations. It would have also brought in his policy, bank, tariff, and all. Even now, when victory is still uncertain, the senator announces the approach of the period when he shall move the renewal of the protective system; a precious confession, that dropped out in the heat of discussion.

[Mr. Webster. No, I spoke deliberately.]

So much, then, the worse. That justifies all I have said and done; that proves my foresight and firmness, and will open the eyes of thousands, especially in the south, who have heretofore doubted the correctness of my course on this question.

The victory would not only have been complete had I co-operated, but it would also have been permanent. The portion of the state-rights party, with which I acted, would have been absorbed—yes absorbed; it is the proper word, and I use it in spite of the sarcasm of the senator. The other would have been scattered and destroyed, and the senator and his party, and their principles and policy, would have been left undisputed masters of the field, unresisted and unresistible. The first fruits of the victory would have been the re-union of the political and money power—a wedded union never more to be dissolved. The tariff would have been renewed. I may now speak positively, after the declaration of the senator, to be again followed by an overflowing revenue, profuse and corrupt expenditures, heavy surplus, and overwhelming patronage, which would have closed the door to wealth and distinction to all who refused to bend the knee at the shrine of the combined powers. All this was seen and fully comprehended by the senator; and hence again, I repeat, his deep grief, his keen disappointment, and his attacks on me, for refusing to co-operate.

The senator must have known that, in refusing, I acted on principles and opinions long entertained and fully declared years ago. In my reply to his associate in this joint war on me, in which I am attacked at once in front and rear, I demonstrated, to the satisfaction of the senate, the truth of what I assert so completely, that the senator's associate did not even attempt a denial. And yet, such is the depth of the senator's grief and disappointment, that it hurried him to a repetition of exploded charges which, in his cooler moments, he must know to be unfounded. He repeated the stale and refuted charge of a summer set, of going over, and of being struck with a sudden thought; and summoned up all his powers of irony and declamation, of which he proved himself to be a great master on this occasion, to make my Edgefield letter, in which, I assigned my reason for refusing to co-operate, ridiculous. I see in all this but the disappointed hopes of one who had fixed his gaze intensely on power that had eluded his grasp, and who sought to wreak his resentment on him who had refused to put the splendid prize in his hands. He resorted to ridicule, because it was the only weapon that truth and justice left him. He well knows how much deeper are the wounds that they inflict than the slight punctures that the pointed, but feeble, shafts of ridicule leave behind; and he used the more harmless weapon only because he could not command the more deadly. That is in my hand. I brandish it in his eyes. It is the only one I need, and I intend to use it freely on this occasion.

After pouring out his wailing in such doleful tones, because I would not co-operate in placing him and his party in power, and prostrating my own, the senator next attacks me because I stated in my Edgefield letter, as I understood him, that I rallied on gen. Jackson with the view of putting down the tariff by executive influence. I have looked over that letter with care, and can find no such expression. [Mr. Webster. It was used at the extra session.] I was about to add that I had often used it, and cannot but feel surprised that the senator should postpone the notice of it till this late period, if he thought it deserving reply. Why did he not reply to it years ago, when I first used it in debate? But the senator asked what I meant by executive influence. Did I mean his veto? He must have asked the question thoughtlessly. He must know that the veto can only apply to bills on their passage, and could not possibly be used in case of existing laws, such as the tariff acts. He also asks if there was concert in putting down the tariff between myself and the present chief magistrate? I reply asking him a question, to which, as a New England man, he cannot object. He has avowed his determination, in a certain contingency, which he thinks is near, that he will move the renewal of the tariff. I ask, is there concert on that point, between him and his associate, in this attack? And finally, he asks if I disclosed my motives then? Yes; I am not in the habit of disguising them. I openly and constantly avowed that it was one of my leading reasons in supporting gen. Jackson, because I expected he would use his influence to effect a gradual, but thorough, reduction of the tariff that would reduce the system to the revenue point; and when I saw reason to doubt whether he would accomplish what I deemed so important, I did not wait the event of his election, but moved openly and boldly in favor of state interposition, as a certain remedy which would not fail to effect the reduction, in the event he should disappoint me.

The senator, after despatching my letter, concluded his speech by volunteering a comparison between his and my public character, not very flattering to me, but highly complimentary to himself. He represented me as sectional; in the habit of speaking constantly of the unconstitutional and oppressive operations of the tariff; which he thought very unpatriotic; of having certain sinister objects in view in calling on the south to unite, and of marching off under the state-rights banner, while he paints himself in the most glowing and opposite colors. There is, Mr. President, no disputing about taste; such are the effects of a difference of organization and education, that what is offensive to one is often agreeable to another. According to my conception, nothing can be more painful than to pronounce our own praise, particularly in contrast with another, even when forced to do so in self-defence; but how one can rise in his place, when neither his motive nor conduct is impeached, and when there is nothing in the question, or previous discussion, that would possibly justify it, and pronounce an eulogy on himself, which a modest man would blush to pronounce on a Washington or a Franklin to his face, is to me utterly incomprehensible. But, if the senator, in pronouncing his gorgeous piece of autobiography, had contented himself in simply proclaiming, in his deep tone, to the senate and the assembled multitude of spectators, that he came into congress as the representative of the American people; that, if he was born for any good, it was for the good of the whole people, and the defence of the constitution; that he habitually acted as if acting in the eyes of the framers of the constitution; that it would be easier to drive these pillars from their bases, than to drive or seduce him from his lofty purpose; that he would do nothing to weaken the brotherly love between these states, and do every thing that they should remain united, beneficially and thoroughly, I would have gazed in silent wonder, without uttering a word at the extraordinary spectacle, and the happy self-delusion in which he seems to exist. But when he undertook not only to erect an image to himself, as an object of self-adoration, but to place alongside of it a carved figure of myself, with distorted limbs and features, to heighten and render more divine his own image, he invited, he challenged, nay, he compelled me to inquire into the high qualities which he arrogates to himself, and the truth of the comparison which he has drawn between us. If the inquiry should excite some reminiscences not very agreeable to the senator, or disturb the happy self-delusion, in which he reposes, he must blame not me, but his own self-sufficiency and boasting at my expense.

Know yourself, is an ancient maxim, the wisdom of which I never before so fully realized. How imperfectly even the talented and intelligent know themselves! Our understanding, like our eyes, seems to be given not to see our features, but those of others. How diffident we ought to be of any favorable opinion that we may have formed of ourselves! That one of the distinguished abilities of the senator, and his mature age, should form so erroneous an opinion of his real character, is indeed truly astonishing. I do not deny that he possesses many excellent qualities. My object is truth, and I intend neither to exaggerate nor detract. But I must say, that the character which he attributes to himself is wholly dissimilar from what really belongs to him. So far from that universal and ardent patriotism which knows neither place nor person, that he ascribes to himself, he is, above all the distinguished public men with whom I am acquainted, remarkable for a devoted attachment to the interest, the institutions, and the place where Providence has cast his lot. I do not censure him for his local feelings. The author of our being never intended that creatures of our limited faculties should embrace with equal intensity of affection the remote and the near. Such an organization would lead us constantly to intermeddle with what we would but imperfectly understand, and often to do mischief, where we intended good. But the senator is far from being liable to such a charge. His affections, instead of being too wide and boundless, are too concentrated. As local as his attachment is, it does not embrace all within its limited scope. It takes in but a class even there—powerful, influential, and intelligent, but still a class which influences and controls all his actions, and so absorbs his affections as to make him overlook large portions of the union, of which I propose to give one or two striking illustrations.

I must then remind the senator that there is a vast extent of wide-spread union, which lies south of Mason and Dickson's line, distinguished by its peculiar soil, climate, situation, institutions, and productions, which he has never encircled within the warm embraces of his universal patriotism. As long as he has been in public life, he has not, to the best of my knowledge, given a single vote to promote its interest, or done an act to defend its rights. I wish not to do him injustice. If I could remember a single instance I would cite it; but I cannot, in casting my eyes over his whole course, call to mind one. As boundless and ardent, then, as is his patriotism, according to his own account, it turns out that it is limited by metes and bounds, that exclude nearly one-half of the whole union!

But it may be said that this total absence of all manifestation of attachment to an entire section of the union is not to be attributed to the want of an ardent desire to promote its interest and security, but of occasion to exhibit it. Unfortunately for the senator, such an excuse is without foundation. Opportunities are daily and hourly offering. The section is the weakest of the two, and its peculiar interest and institutions expose it constantly to injustice and oppression, which afford many and fine opportunities to display that generous and noble patriotism which the senator attributes to himself, and which delights in taking the side of the assailed against the assailant. Even now, at this moment, there is an opportunity which one professing such ardent and universal attachment to the whole country as the senator professes, would greedily embrace. A war is now, and has been systematically and fiercely carried on in violation of the constitution, against a long-standing, and widely-extended institution of that section, that is indispensable, not only to its prosperity, but to its safety and existence, and which calls loudly on every patriot to raise his voice and arm in its defence. How has the senator acted? Has he raised his mighty arm in the defence of the assailed, or thundered forth his denunciation against the assailants? These are searching questions. They test the truth of his universal and boasted attachment to the whole country; and in order that the senate may compare his acts with his professions, I propose to present more fully the facts of the case and his course.

It is well known, then, that the section to which I refer, is inhabited by two races, from different continents, and descended from different stocks; and that they have existed together under the present relation from the first settlement of the country. It is also well known that the ancestors of the senator's constituents (I include the section,) brought no small portion of the ancestors of the African, or inferior race, from their native home across the ocean, and sold them as slaves to the ancestors of our constituents, and pocketed the price, and profited greatly by the traffic. It is also known, that when the constitution was formed, our section felt much jealousy lest the powers which it conferred should be used to interfere with the relations existing between the two races; to ally which, and induce our ancestors to enter the union, guards, that were deemed effectual against the supposed danger, were inserted in the instrument. It is also known that the product of the labor of the inferior race has furnished the basis of our widely extended commerce and ample revenue, which has supported the government and diffused wealth and prosperity through the other section. This is one side of the picture. Let us now turn and look at the other.

How has the other section acted? I include not all, nor a majority. We have had recent proof, during the discussion of the resolutions I offered at the commencement of the session, to what great extent just and patriotic feelings exist in that quarter, in reference to the subject under consideration. I then narrow the question, and ask, how has the majority of the senator's constituents acted, and especially a large portion of his political supporters and admirers? Have they respected the title to our property, which we trace back to their ancestors, and which, in good faith and equity, carries with it an implied warranty, that binds them to defend and protect our rights to the property sold us? Have they regarded their faith plighted to us on entering into the constitutional compact which formed the union, to abstain from interfering with our property, and to defend and protect us in its quiet enjoyment? Have they acted as those ought who have participated so largely in the profits derived from our labor? No; they are striving, night and day, in violation of justice, plighted faith, and the constitution, to divest us of our property—to reduce us to the level of those whom they sold to us as slaves, and to overthrow an institution on which our safety depends.

Come nearer home. How has the senator himself acted? He who has such influence and weight with his constituents, and who boasts of his universal patriotism and brotherly love and affection for the whole union? Has he raised his voice to denounce this crying injustice, or his arm to arrest the blow of the assailants, which threatens to dis sever the union, and forever alienate one-half of the community from the other? Has he uttered a word in condemnation of violated faith, or honor trampled in the dust? No; he has sat quietly in his place, without moving a finger or raising his voice. Without raising his voice, did I say? I mistake. His voice has been raised, not for us, but for our assailants. His arm has been raised, not to arrest the aggressor, but to open the doors of this chamber, in order to give our assailants an entrance here, where they may aim the most deadly blow against the safety of the union, and our tranquillity and security. He has thrown the mantle, not of protection over the constitution, but over the motive and character of those whose daily avocation is to destroy every vestige of brotherly love between these states, and to convert the union into a curse, instead of a blessing. He has done more. The whole senate has seen him retire from his seat, to avoid a vote on one of the resolutions that I moved, with a view to rally the patriotic of every portion of the community against this fell spirit, which threatens to dissolve the union, and turn the brotherly love and affection in which it originated into deadly hate, which was so obviously true he could not vote against, but which he dodged, rather than throw his weight on our side, and against our assailants. And yet, while these things are fresh in our recollection, notorious, and known to all, the senator rises in his place, and proclaims aloud that he comes in as the representative of the United States; that, if he was born for any good, it was for the good of the whole people, and defence of the constitution; that he always acts as if under the eyes of the framers of the constitution; that it would be easier to drive these pillars from their bases, than him from his lofty purpose; that he will do nothing to destroy the brotherly love between these states, and every thing, that the union may exist forever, beneficially and thoroughly for all! What a contrast between profession and performance! What strange and extraordinary self-delusion.

But this is not the only instance. There is another in which the contrast between the course of the senator and his lofty pretension of unbounded and ardent patriotism is not less astonishing. I refer to the protective tariff, and his memorable and inconsistent course in relation to it.

His history may be told in a few words. It rose subsequent to the late war with Great Britain. The senator's associate in this attack was its leading supporter and author. Its theory rested on the principle, that all articles which could be made in our country should be protected, and it was an axiom of the system that its perfection consisted in prohibiting the introduction of all such articles from abroad. To give the restrictions on commerce necessary to effect its object a plausible appearance, they were said to be for the protection of home industry, and the system itself received the imposing name of the American system. Its effects were desolating in the staple states. The heavy duties imposed on their foreign exchanges left scarcely enough to the planter to feed and clothe his slaves, and educate his children, while wealth and prosperity bloomed around the favored portion of the union.

The senator was at first opposed to the system. As far back as the autumn of 1820, he delivered a speech to the citizens of Boston, in Faneuil hall, in opposition to it, in which he questioned its constitutionality, and denounced its inequality and oppression.

His speech was followed by a series of resolutions embodying the substance of what he had said, and which received the sanction of himself and constituents, who, at that time, were less interested in manufactures than in commerce and navigation, which suffered in common with the great staple interests of the south. I ask the secretary to read the resolutions:

"Resolved, That no objection ought ever to be made to any amount of taxes equally apportioned and imposed for the purpose of raising revenue, necessary for the support of government; but that taxes imposed on the people for the sole benefit of any class of men, are equally inconsistent with the principles of our constitution, and with sound judgment.

"Resolved, That the supposition that until the supposed tariff, or some similar measure, be adopted, we are and shall be dependent on foreigners for the means of subsistence and defence, is in our opinion, altogether fallacious and fanciful, and derogatory to the character of the nation.

"Resolved, That high bounties on such domestic manufactures as are principally benefited by that tariff, favor great capitalists rather than personal industry, or the owners of small capitals, and therefore that we do not perceive its tendency to promote national industry.

"Resolved, That we are equally incapable of discovering its beneficial effects on agriculture, since the obvious consequence of its adoption would be, that the farmer must give more than he now does for all he buys, and receive less for all he sells.

"Resolved, That in our opinion, the proposed tariff and the principles on which it is avowedly formed would, if adopted, have a tendency, however different may be the motives of those who recommend them, to diminish the industry, impede the prosperity, and corrupt the morals of the people.

What can be more explicit or decided? They hold the very sentiments and language which I have so often held on this floor. That very system was then pronounced to be unconstitutional, unequal, oppressive, and corrupting in its effects, by the senator and his constituents, for pronouncing which now he accuses me as being sectional, and holding language having a mischievous effect on the rising generation.

Four years after this, in April, 1824, the senator delivered another speech against the system, in reply to the then speaker, and now his associate on this occasion, in which he again denounced the inequality and oppression of the system with equal force in one of the ablest arguments ever delivered on the subject, and in which he completely demolished the reasons of his then opponent. But an event was then fast approaching which was destined to work a mighty and sudden revolution in his views and feelings. A few months after, the presidential election took place; Mr. Adams was elected by the co-operation of the author of the American system, and the now associate of the senator. Those who had been enemies came together. New political combinations were formed, and the result was a close alliance between the east and the west, of which that system formed the basis. A new light burst in on the senator. A sudden thought struck him; but not quite as disinterested as that of the German sentimentalist. He made a complete sunset, heels over head; went clear over; deserted the free trade side in a twinkling; and joined the restrictive policy, and then cried out that he could no longer act with me, whom he had left standing where he had just stood, because I was too sectional! At once every thing the senator had ever said or done was forgotten; entirely expunged from the tablets of his memory. His whole nature was changed in an instant, and thereafter no measure of protection was too strong for his palate. With a few contortions and slight choking, he even gulped down, a few years after, the bill of abomination—the tariff of '28; a measure which raised the duties so high as to pass one-half of the aggregate amount in value of the whole imports into the public treasury. I desire it to be noted and remembered that, out of an importation of sixty-four millions of dollars, including every description of imports, the free and dutied articles, the government took for its share thirty-two millions under the tariff of 1828, and that the senator, yes, he, the defender of the constitution and equal protector of every section and interest, voted for that measure, notwithstanding his recent denunciation of the system as unconstitutional, unequal, and oppressive? But he did more, and things still more surprising, as the sequel will show.

The protective tariff did not change the character of its operation with the change of the senator. Its oppressive and corrupting effects grew with its growth, till the burden became intolerable under the tariff of '28. Desolation spread itself over the entire staple region. Their commercial cities were deserted. Charleston parted with its last ship, and grass grew in her once busy streets. The political condition of the country presented a prospect not less dreary. A deep and growing conflict between the two great sections agitated the whole country, and a vast revenue, beyond its most extravagant wants gave the government, especially the executive branch, boundless patronage and power, which were rapidly changing the character of the government, and spreading corruption far and wide through every condition of society. Something must be done and that promptly. Every hope of reformation, or change through this government had vanished. The absorbing force of the system had drawn into its support a fixed majority in the community, which controlled irresistibly every department of the government. But one hope was left short of revolution, and that was in the states themselves, in their sovereign capacity as parties to the constitutional compact. Fortunately for the country and our institutions, one of the members of the union was found bold enough to interpose her sovereign authority, and declare the protective tariff that had caused all this mischief, and threatened so much more, to be unconstitutional, and therefore, null and void, and of no effect within her limits; and thus an issue was formed which brought events to a crisis.

We all remember what followed. The government prepared to assert by force its usurped powers. The proclamation was issued, and the war message and force bill followed, and the state armed to maintain her constitutional rights. How, now, I ask, did the senator act in this fearful crisis; he who had, but a short time before, pronounced the system to be unconstitutional, unequal, unjust, and oppressive? Did he feel any sympathy for those who felt and thought as he did but a brief period before? Did he make any allowance for their falling into the same errors (if such he then considered them) into which he himself had fallen? Did he show that ardent devotion to preserve the brotherly love between the members of the union he now so boastfully professes? Did he, who calls himself the defender of the constitution, feel any compunction in resorting to force, to execute laws which he had pronounced to be in violation of the constitution? Did he, who manifested such deep distrust of those in power, who had been foremost in proclaiming their own usurpations, and calling on the patriotic of all parties to oppose them, show any dread in consigning to them unlimited power to crush one of the members of the union, and which, after accomplishing that, might be so readily turned to crush the liberty of all? Quite the reverse. A sudden thought again struck him. He again, in a twinkling, forgot the past, and rushed over into the arms of power; and took his position in the front rank, as the champion of the most violent measures to enforce laws at the point of the bayonet, which he had pronounced unconstitutional, unjust, and oppressive? And this too at the hazard of civil war, and the manifest danger of subverting the constitution and the liberties of the country; refusing all terms of adjustment, and resisting to the last with violence the bill which compromised and settled the conflict! And yet, with all this fresh in the recollection of himself and all present, he can rise in his place and proclaim himself the universal patriot; the defender of the constitution, and benefactor of every portion of the union; the man who has done every thing to preserve brotherly love between its members, and who is ready to make every sacrifice to make it beneficial to all the parties!

But what is more extraordinary, what is truly wonderful and astonishing, is, while these words were on his tongue, he, in the same breath, with a full knowledge of all the disastrous consequences which have and must necessarily follow the renewal of the protective system, should declare that he anticipates the speedy arrival of the time when he will again undertake to revive the system! More cannot be added. The contrast between the senator's course and the character which he ascribes to himself cannot be rendered more striking. I shall not add another instance, as many of them as are at my command. A volume could not more conclusively prove how unfounded are his pretensions to that lofty, universal, and ardent patriotism which he claims for himself, and how strong the delusion under which he is in regard to his true character.

Let us now turn and inquire what has been my course; I whom he represents as sectional, whose course he pronounces to be unfriendly to the union, because I now call the protective system unconstitutional and oppressive; who, he intimates, desires to unite the south for no patriotic purpose, and represents as going off under the state rights banner. And here, Mr. President, let me say, I put in no claim to the lofty destiny to which the senator says he was born. Instead of coming here, like the senator, as the representatives of the whole people, I appear in the more humble character of the representative of one of the states of this union, sent here to watch over her particular interests and to promote the general interest of all, as far as the constitution has conferred power upon us, and as it can be done without oppression to the parts. These are my conceptions of my representative character, with the trust confided to me, and the duties attached to it, which I endeavor to discharge with industry, fidelity, and all the abilities which it has pleased my Creator to confer on me. Instead of falling short of what I profess, I trust my public life, if examined with candor, will show that I have ever so interpreted my duty to my state as to permit it in no instance to interfere with the just claims of the union. It is my good fortune to represent a state which holds her character far above her interest, and which claims the first place, when a sacrifice is to be made for the safety and happiness of all, and would hold me to a strict account if, in representing her interest, I should forget what is due to her honor among her confederates. All her acts prove that she is as liberal in making concessions, when demanded by the common good, as she is prompt and resolute to resist aggression to promote the interest of others at her expense. Acting in the same spirit, as whilst her representative, I have never failed to meet and repel aggressions, while I trust, I have on no occasion been unmindful of her honor and the general interests of the whole union. Having made these remarks, I shall now proceed to show that, as humble as my pretensions are, and as sectional and unpatriotic as he has thought proper to represent me, my course for liberality and a just regard to the interest of every portion of the union will not suffer in comparison with his, as lofty as are his pretensions.

In making the inquiry I have into the course of the senator in relation to the section to which I belong, I called on him to point out a single instance, with all his boasted patriotism, in which he has given a vote to promote its interests, or done an act to defend its rights; but now, when the inquiry is into my course in relation to his section, I propose to reverse the question, and to apply to myself a much more severe test than I did to him. I ask, then, from what measure, calculated to promote the interests of his section, have I ever withheld my support, except, indeed, the protective tariff, and certain appropriations, which, according to my mode of construing the constitution, I regard as unconstitutional, and would of course be bound to oppose, wherever the benefit should fall? I call on the senator to point out a single instance; and, if he desires it, I will yield him the floor in order to give him an opportunity to do so. Will the senator call, on his part, for instances in which I have supported the interest of his section? I can point to numerous; to my early and constant support of the navy; to my resistance to system of embargoes, non-importation and non-intercourse acts; to my generous course in support of manufactures that sprung up during the war, in which my friends think I went too far; to the liberal terms on which the tariff controversy was settled, and the fidelity with which I have adhered to it; and the system of fortifications for the defence of our harbors, which I projected and commenced, and which is so important to the two great interests of commerce and navigation, in which his section has so deep a stake. To which I might add many more; but these are sufficient for one, represented as so sectional, against the blank list of the senator in relation to my section, with all his claim to ardent and universal patriotism. If we turn to the west, my course will at least bear comparison with his for liberality towards that great and growing section of our country. To pass over other instances, I ask him what measure of his can be compared with the cession I have proposed of the public lands to the new states on the liberal conditions proposed? It is a measure, above all other, calculated to promote their interest, to elevate their character, to terminate their political dependence, and to raise them to a complete equality with the old states for the mutual benefit of us and them, but which, sectional, as I am represented to be, proved too liberal for the senator, with all his wide-extended and ardent attachment to the whole union.

But it seems that I mean something very sinister in my call on the south to unite, and the senator very significantly asks me what is meant. I have nothing to disguise, and will readily answer. If he would look at home, and open his eyes to the systematic and incessant attacks made on our peace and quiet by his constituents; if he would reflect on his threat to renew the system of oppression from which we have freed ourselves with such difficulty and danger, and bear in mind that we are the weaker section, and, without union among ourselves, we cannot resist danger that surrounds us, he will see that there is neither mystery nor danger in the call. I go farther. Our union is not only necessary to our safety and protection, but is also to the successful operation of our system. We constitute the check to its over-action; and, as experience proves, the only power through which, when disordered, reformation can be peacefully effected. Our union is dangerous to none, and salutary to all. The machine never works well when the south is divided, nor badly when it is united.

The senator next tells us that I declared I would march off under the state rights banner, which he seized on to impugn my patriotism and to boast of his own. It is an easy task, by misstating or garbling, to distort the most elevated or correct sentiment. In this case the senator, by selecting a single member of the sentence, and throwing a strong emphasis on "off," gave a meaning directly the opposite of representing me as abandoning the cause of the constitution and country, and himself as being their champion, which it seems was sufficient for his purpose. The declaration is taken from my opening speech at the extra session; and that the senate may judge for itself, I shall give the entire passage:

"We are about to take a fresh start. I move off under the state rights banner, and go in the direction in which I have been so long moving. I seize the opportunity thoroughly to reform the government; to bring it back to its original principles; to retrench, economize, and rigidly to enforce accountability. I shall oppose strenuously all attempts to originate a new debt, to create a national bank, to reunite the political and money power, (more dangerous than church and state,) in any form or shape."

That is what I did declare, and which the senator represents as deserting the constitution and country; and this is the way I am usually answered. I know not whether I have greater cause to complain or rejoice at the fact that there is scarcely an argument or sentiment of mine, which is attempted to be met, that is not garbled, or misstated. If I have reason to complain of the injustice, I have at the same time the pleasure to reflect that it is a high implied compliment to the truth and correctness of what I say.

There still remains an important chapter to complete the comparison between the public character of the senator and myself; I mean the part which we took in the late war between Great Britain and this country. I intended at one time to enter on it, and to trace the rise and progress of the war, with its various vicissitudes of disasters and victories, and the part which the senator and his political associates acted at that important period; but those are by-gone events, belonging to the historian, in whose hands I am content to leave them, and shall not recur to them, unless the senator hereafter shall provoke me by a renewal of his attack.

Having now dispatched the personalities of the senator, I turn next to his argument, which, as I have stated, consists of three parts; the preliminary discourse on credit and banks; the discussion of the question at issue; and the reply to my remarks at this and the extra session. I shall consider each, as I have begun, in the reverse order. The argument of the senator is indeed so miscellaneous and loosely connected, that it is a matter of but little importance in what order it is considered.

When he announced his intention to reply to my remarks, both at this and the extra session, I anticipated that they would be met fully, if not satisfactorily, point by point. Guess, then, my surprise, on finding him pass by, without even attempting an answer to the numerous objections which I made to the union of the political and money power, as affecting the morals, the politics, the currency, the industry, and prosperity of the country, which, if the fourth part be true, is decisive of the question, and noticing but two out of the long list, in his reply. If we may judge of the strength of those which he has passed over by his own inconclusive answer (as I shall presently show) to the two which he selected, my argument may be pronounced to be impregnable. I shall begin with his reply to my remarks at the present session.

It will be remembered, among other objections against the connexion with the banks, I urged that the government had no right to make a general deposit in bank, or receive the notes of banks in the public dues. I placed the first on the ground, that when public money was placed in deposits in banks, and passed to the credit of the government, it was, if ever, in the treasury; and that it could not be drawn out and used for any purpose, unless under an appropriation made by law, without violating an express provision of the constitution, which provides that no money should be drawn out of the treasury, but in consequence of appropriation by law. I then urged, that to place money in general deposit in banks, with the implied understanding always attached to such transactions, that they would have the right to draw it out and use it as they please, till called for by the government, was a manifest violation of this provision of the constitution.

In support of the other objection against receiving of bank notes in the public dues, I laid down the known and fundamental rule of construction on all questions touching the powers of this government, that it had no right to exercise any but such as are expressly given by the constitution, or that may be necessary to carry into effect the granted powers. I then insisted that no such power was granted, nor was its exercise necessary to carry any granted power into effect, and concluded, that the power could not be exercised unless comprehended under one or the other head. To which I added the further objection, that if we had the right to receive the notes of state banks in our dues as cash, it would necessarily involve the right of taking them under our control and regulation, which would bring this government necessarily into conflict with the reserved rights of the states; and to this I added, that the receipt of the bank notes by the government tended to expel gold and silver from circulation, and depreciate and render their value more fluctuating, and, of course, could not be reconciled with the object of the express power given to congress to coin money, and regulate the value thereof, to which it is as repugnant in its effects, as the debasing or the clipping the current coin would be. I, at the same time, conceded that the practice of the government had been the opposite from its commencement. Such are my reasons, and how have they been met?

The senator commenced by stating, that he would consider the two objections together, as they were connected; but, instead of that, he never uttered another word in relation to the right of making a general deposit. That was surrendered without an attempt to meet my objections, which at least proved his discretion. He next undertook to show that precedents were in favor of receiving bank notes, which I had conceded, and no one disputed. Among other things, he stated, I was the first to authorize the receiving of bank notes by law, and, in proof, referred to my amendment to the joint resolution of 1816, which authorizes the receipt of the notes of specie paying banks in the dues of the government. He stated, that the resolution, as proposed by himself, provided that nothing but gold and silver and the notes of the United States Bank should be received, and that my amendment extended it to the notes of state banks. This is all true, but is not the whole truth. He forgot to inform the senate that, at the time, the notes of non-specie paying banks, as well as specie-paying, were received in the dues of the government, and that my amendment limited, instead of enlarging, the existing practice. He also forgot to state that, without my amendment, the notes of the United States Bank would have been exclusively received in the public dues, and that I was unwilling to bestow a monopoly of such immense value on that institution, which would have been worth ten times the amount of the bonus it gave for its charter.

After bestowing much time to establish what none denied, the senator at length came to the argument; and what do you suppose were the convincing reasons he urged against my positions? Why, simply, that he had no time to reply to them! with which, and the erroneous assertion that I had denied that the government could exercise any incidental power, he passed over all the weighty objections I had urged against the constitutionality of receiving and treating bank notes as cash in the public dues. It was thus he met the only argument he attempted to answer of the many and strong ones which I have urged in support of my opinion on this important question, and to which he proposed to make a formal reply.

I shall next notice the reply he attempted to my remarks at the late session. And here, again, he selected a single argument, and to which his answer was not less inconclusive and unsatisfactory than to that which I have just considered. Among other objections to the union of the government with the banks, I stated that it would tend to centralize the circulation and exchanges of the country; to sustain which, I showed that no small portion of the credit and circulation of the banks depended on the public deposits, and the fact that the government received and treated their notes as cash in its dues. I then showed that it was that portion which pre-eminently gave a control over the circulation and exchanges of the country. In illustration, I asked if the government, when it first went into operation, had selected a merchant of New York, and entered into a contract with him that he should have the free use of the public revenue from the time it was collected till it was disbursed, and that nothing but his promissory notes, except gold and silver, should be received in the public dues, whether it would not give him a great and decided control over the circulation and exchanges of the country, accompanied with advantages to the port where he resided over all others? I next asked, whether the location of a bank of the United States at the same place, with the same privileges, would not give equal control and advantages? Nay, much greater, as, in addition, it would concentrate at the same place an immense amount of capital collected from every portion of the country.

Such was my argument, which the senator, months after it was delivered, undertakes to contovert; but, I must say, for my life, I could not understand his reasons. He lost his usual clearness, and became vague and obscure, as any one must who attempts to refute what is so perfectly evident. To escape from this difficulty, he, with his usual address, confounded what I had said on another subject, with another point, which he thought more easily answered, and against which he directed his attack. He stated that I proposed a government paper; and then insisted that it would be the union of the political and money power, and would do more to centralize the currency and exchanges than the connection of the government with the banks.

Now, unfortunately for the senator, I proposed no such thing, and expressed no notion of the kind, nor any thing like it. He may search every speech I have delivered at this and the extra session, and he can find nothing to justify his assertion. To put this beyond all dispute, I will quote what I did say, and the only thing that I ever did that could afford him even a pretext for his assertions. The extracts are taken from my remarks at the extra session.

"I intend to propose nothing. It would be impossible, with so great a weight of opposition to pass any measure without the entire support of the administration; and, if it were, it ought not to be attempted when so much must depend on the mode of execution. The best measure that could be devised might fail, and impose a heavy responsibility on its author, unless it met with the hearty approbation of those who are to execute it. I then intend merely to throw out suggestions, in order to excite the reflections of others," &c.

"Believing that there might be a sound and safe paper currency founded on the credit of the government exclusively, I was desirous that those who are responsible and have the power should have availed themselves of the opportunity of the temporary deficit in the treasury, and the postponement of the fourth instalment intended to be deposited with the states, to use them as the means of affording a circulation for the present relief of the country and the banks, during the process of separating them from the government," &c.

Here is not a word about proposing; on the contrary, I expressly stated, I propose nothing; that I but threw out suggestions for reflection. Instead of excluding all paper from circulation, I suggested the use (not of treasury notes, as he stated, or any other paper containing a promise to pay money) but simply one which should contain a promise to be received in the dues of the government; and that, too, only to the extent necessary to meet the temporary deficit of the treasury, and to alleviate the process of separating from the banks; and this he has arbitrarily construed and perverted to suit his purpose in the manner I have shown!

It is a great misfortune that there should be brought into this chamber the habits contracted at the bar, where advocates contend for victory, without being scrupulous about the means; while here the only object ought to be truth and the good of the country. All other considerations ought to be forgotten within these walls, and the only struggle ought to be to ascertain what is true and calculated to promote the honor and happiness of the community. Great individual injustice is done by such misstatements of arguments. The senator's speech will be published and circulated in quarters where my correction of his statements will never reach; and thousands will attribute opinions to me that I never uttered nor entertained.

The suggestions which he has so perverted have been a favorite topic of attack on the part of the senator, but he has never yet stated nor met what I really said truly and fairly; and, after his many and unsuccessful attempts to show what I suggested to be erroneous, I now undertake to affirm positively, and without the least fear, that I can be answered, what heretofore I have but suggested; that a paper issued by government, with the simple promise to receive it in all its dues, leaving its creditors to take it, or gold and silver, at their option, would, to the extent that it would circulate, form a perfect paper circulation, which could not be abused by the government, and would be as steady and uniform in value as the metals themselves, and that, if, by possibility, it should depreciate, the loss would fall, not on the people, but on the government itself; for the only effect of depreciation would be virtually to reduce the taxes, to prevent which the interest of the government would be a sufficient guaranty. I shall not go into the discussion now, but on a suitable occasion I shall be able to make good every word I have uttered. I would be able to do more, to prove that it is within the constitutional power of congress to use such a paper, in the management of its finances, according to the most rigid rule of construing the constitution; and that those, at least, who think that congress can authorize the notes of private state corporations to be received in the public dues, are estopped from denying its right to receive its own paper. If it can virtually endorse by law, on the notes of specie-paying banks, "receivable in payment of the public dues," it surely can order the same words to be written on a blank piece of paper.

Such is the character of the paper I suggested, and which the senator says would do more to centralize the circulation and exchanges than the union of the government and the banks, which, however, he signally failed to prove. That it would have a greater tendency than the exclusive receipt in its dues of gold and silver, I readily acknowledge, and to that extent I think it objectionable; for I do not agree with the senator that there should be some one great emporium, which should have control of the commerce, currency, and exchanges of the union. I hold it desirable in neither a political nor commercial point of view, and to be contrary to the genius of our institutions and the spirit of the constitution, which expressly provides, among other things, that no preference should be given to the ports of one state over another. But that a receivable paper, such as I suggested, would have a greater, or as great tendency to centralize the commerce and currency of the country as the union with the banks, I utterly deny; and if I had no other reason, the vehement opposition of the senator, who approves of such tendency, would be conclusive; but there are others that are decisive.

The centralizing tendency of such a paper would result exclusively from the facility it would afford to remittance from distant portions of the union, in which respect it would stand just on a par with bank notes when received in the dues of the public; while the latter would, in addition, give to the favored port where the mother bank might be located, (or the head of the league of state banks), the immense profits from the use of the public deposits, and the still greater from having their notes received in government dues. The two united would afford unbounded facilities in the payment of custom-house bonds, and give millions of profit annually, derived exclusively from the use of government credit. This great facility and vast increase of profit would give a great and decided advantage to the commerce of the section where the head of the system might be located, and which, in a great measure, accounts for the decay of the commerce of the south, where there were no banks, when this government was established, and which, of course, gave to the other section exclusively all the benefit derived from the connection. If specie had from the first been exclusively received in the public dues, the present commercial inequality would never have existed; and I may add, it never will cease till we return to the constitutional currency. What the senator has said as to the union of the political and money powers, and the tendency to extravagance from the use of treasury notes and their depreciation, is so clearly inapplicable to the description of paper I suggested, that I do not deem it necessary to waste words in reply to it.

Having now repelled his reply to my remarks at this and the extra session, I shall next proceed to notice his argument on the question under discussion, which, extraordinary as it may seem, constitutes by far the most meagre and inconsiderable portion of his speech. The structure he reared with so much labor, is composed of a little centre building, of some twenty or thirty feet square, with an extended wing on each side, and a huge portico in front. I have, I trust, effectually demolished the wings, and propose next to go through the same process with the centre building.

As long as was the speech, it contained but three, or, at the utmost, four arguments, directly applicable to the question under discussion; of which two have again and again been repeated by him every time he has addressed the senate; another was drawn from an argument of mine in favor of the bill, which the senator has misstated, and pressed into his service against it, and the other is neither altogether new, nor very well founded, or, from its character, of much force. I shall begin with it.

The senator objected to the collection of the public dues in gold and silver, because, as he conceives, it would be exceedingly inconvenient; in proof of which, and in order to present as strong a picture as possible, he went into minute calculations and details. He first supposed that the average peace revenue would be equal to thirty millions annually, and the average deposits to twenty-one. He then estimated that this vast sum would have to be counted at least five times in the year, and then estimated that it would require eight hundred thousand dollars to be counted daily, which would require a host of officers, in his opinion, to perform the task. The answer to all this is easy. In the first place, the senator has over-estimated the average receipts by at least one hundred per cent. Fifteen millions ought to be much nearer the truth than thirty. Even that I regarded as exceeding what the expenditure ought to be; and I venture to assert, that no administration which expends more on an average for the next few years can maintain itself, unless there should be some unexpected demand on the treasury. In the next place, twenty-one millions is at least five times too large for the average deposits. Should this bill pass, three millions would be much nearer the truth. We shall hear no more of surplusses, when the revenue is collected in gold and silver. This would make a great deduction in his estimate of the trouble and labor in counting. But I give the senator his own estimate, and ask him if he never heard of other and shorter modes than counting, of ascertaining the amount in coins? Does he not know that it can be ascertained with as much certainty and exactness by weight as by counting, and with more despatch, when the amount is large, in coins than in his favorite bank notes? If I am not misinformed, it is the mode adopted at the English exchequer, and that it is done with the greatest possible promptitude by experienced individuals; so that his formidable objection vanishes.

But the senator next tells us, that I stated, in my remarks, that the bill, should it pass, would place the banks and the government in antagonist relation to each other, which he considers as a very weighty objection to it. I again must correct his statement. I made no such remark. I indeed said, when the banks were connected with the government, they had a direct interest in increasing its fiscal action. The greater the revenue and expenditures, and the larger the surplus, the greater would be their profit, but, when they were separated, the reverse would take place. That the greater amount of gold and silver collected and withdrawn from circulation, the less would be left for banking operations, and, of course, the less their profit; and that in one case they would be the allies, and, in the other, the opponents of the government, as far as its fiscal action was concerned; or, to express it more concisely, when united with the government, they would be on the side of the tax-consumers, and when separated, on that of the tax-payers. Such were my remarks; and now I ask, is it not true? Can any one deny it? Or admitting its truth, can its importance be disputed? Were there no other reasons in favor of the bill, I would consider this of itself decisive. It would be almost impossible to preserve our free institutions, with the weight of the entire banking system thrown on the side of high taxes and extravagant disbursements, or to destroy it if thrown into the opposite scale.

But the senator regards the expression of tax-consumers and tax-payers as mere catch-words, of dangerous import, and tending to divide society into the hostile parties of rich and poor. I take a very different view. I hold that the fiscal action of the government must necessarily divide the community into the two great classes of tax-payers and tax-consumers. Taking taxation and disbursements together, and it is unavoidable that one portion of the community must pay into the treasury, in the shape of taxes, more than they receive back in disbursements, and another must receive more than they pay. This is the great disturbing principle in all governments, especially those that are free, around which all other causes of political divisions and distractions finally rally. Were it otherwise, if the interest of every portion and class of the community was the same in reference to taxation and disbursements, nothing would be more easy than to establish and preserve free institutions; but as it is, it is the most difficult of all tasks, as history and experience prove. This principle of disorder lies deep in the nature of men and society; and extends equally to private associations as to political communities. There will necessarily spring up in both a stockholding and direction interest; the latter of which, without wise provisions and incessant vigilance, will absorb the former, of which the winding up of many a bank will prove.

The two remaining arguments of the senator have been often asserted and as often refuted; and I shall deparch them with a few words. He tells us, as he has often done, that we are bound to regulate the currency; and that the constitution has given to congress the express power to regulate it; with many other expressions of similar import. It is manifest, that the whole argument turns on the ambiguity of the word currency. If, by it, is meant the current coin of the United States, no one can doubt that congress has the right to regulate it. The power is expressly given by the constitution, which says, in so many words, that it shall have power to coin money and regulate the value thereof; but if it is intended to include bank notes, as must be the intention of the senator, there is no such express power given in the constitution. It is a point to be proved and not assumed, and every attempt of the senator to prove it has ended in signal failure. He has not, and cannot, meet the an-answer which he received from the senator from Pennsylvania at the extra session, and his repetition of the assertion, after so decisive an answer, serves but to prove how much more easy it often is to refute an argument than to silence him who advanced it. But I do not despair even of silencing the senator. There is one whose authority on this point I am sure he must respect: I mean himself. When the bill granting a charter to the late United States Bank was under discussion in the other house, in 1816, he then took the opposite side, and argued with great force, against the very right for which he now so obstinately contends. He then maintained that the framers of the constitution were hard money men; that currency meant the current coin of the United States; and that congress has no right to make any other. But the senator shall speak for himself; and that he may be heard in his own words, I shall read an extract from his speech delivered at the time:

"Mr. Webster first addressed the house. He regretted the manner in which this debate had been commenced, on a detached feature of the bill, and not on a question affecting the principle; and expressed his fears that a week or two would be lost in the discussion of this question, to no purpose, inasmuch as it might ultimately end in the rejection of the bill. He proceeded to reply to the arguments of the advocates of the bill. It was a mistaken idea, he said, which he had heard uttered on this subject, that we were about to reform the national currency. No nation had a better currency, he said, than the United States; there was no nation which had guarded its currency with more care; for the framers of the constitution, and those who enacted the early statutes on this subject, were hard money men; they had felt, and therefore duly appreciated the evils of a paper medium; they, therefore, sedulously guarded the currency of the United States from debasement. The legal currency of the United States was gold and silver coin; this was a subject in regard to which congress had run into no folly.

"What then, he asked, was the present evil? Having a perfectly sound national currency, and the government having no power in fact to make any thing else current but gold and silver, there had grown up in different states a currency of paper, issued by banks, setting out with the promise to pay gold and silver, which they had been wholly unable to redeem: the consequence was, that there was a mass of paper afloat, of perhaps fifty millions, which sustained no immediate relation to the legal currency of the country—a paper which will not enable any man to pay money he owes to his neighbor, or his debts to the government. The banks had issued more money than they could redeem, and the evil was severely felt, &c. Mr. W. declined occupying the time of the house to prove that there was a depreciation of the paper in circulation: the legal standard of value was gold and silver; the relation of paper to it proved its state, and the rate of its depreciation. Gold and silver currency, he said, was the law of the land at home, and the law of the world abroad; there could, in the present state of the world, be no other currency. In consequence of the immense paper issues having banished specie from circulation, the government had been obliged, in direct violation of existing statutes, to receive the amount of their taxes in something which was not recognized by law as the money of the country, and which was, in fact, greatly depreciated, &c. This was the evil."

What can be more decisive? What more pointed? They are the very doctrines which he is in the daily habit of denouncing under the name of loco-foco. The senator may hereafter be regarded as the father of the party; and I deem it not a little unnatural that he should be so harsh and cruel to his offspring.

But it may be said that I then advocated the opposite side. Be it so, and it follows that his authority and mine stand as opposing qualities on the opposite side of an equation; and I feel confident that the senator will really admit that his will at least be sufficient to destroy mine.

I really acknowledge that my opinion, after the lapse of upwards of twenty years, with the light which experience in this long period has shed on the banking system, has undergone considerable changes. It would be strange if it had not. I see more clearly now, than I did, the true character of the system and its dangerous tendency; but I owe it to myself and the truth of the cause, to say I was, even at that early period, far from being its advocate, and would then have been opposed to the system had it been a new question. But I then regarded the connection between the government and the banks indissoluble, and acquiesced in a state of things that I could not control, and which I considered as established. The government was then receiving the notes of non-specie-paying banks in its dues, to its own discredit and heavy loss to its creditors. The only practical alternative was at that period between a league of state banks and a bank of the United States, as a fiscal agent of the government. I preferred then, as I now do, the latter to the former, as more efficient, and not a whit more unconstitutional; and, if I now were again placed in the same state of things that I then was, with all my present feelings and views, I could hardly have acted differently from what I then did.

The senator greatly mistakes, in supposing that I feel any disposition to repudiate or retract what I then said. So far from it, I have, just cause to be proud of the remarks I made on the occasion. It put the question for the bank, for the first time, on its true basis, as far as this government is concerned, and the one on which it has ever since stood; which is no small compliment to one then so inexperienced as myself. All I insist on is, that the report contains but a very hasty sketch—a mere outline, as the reporter himself says—of my remarks, in which four-fifths is omitted, and that it would be doing me great injustice to regard it as containing a full exposition of my views. But, as brief as it is, what is reported cannot be read, in a spirit of fairness, without seeing that I regarded the question at the time as a mere practical one, to be decided under all the circumstances of the case, without involving the higher questions which now, that the connection between the government and the banks is broken, come rightfully into discussion. At that time the only question, as I expressly stated, was, not whether we should be connected with the bank, for that was existing in full force, but whether it was most advisable, admitting the existence of the connection, that the United States, as well as the separate states, should exercise the power of banking. I have made these remarks, not that I regard the question of consistency, after so great a change of circumstances, of much importance, but because I desire to stand where truth and justice place me on this great question.

The last argument of the senator on the question at issue was drawn from the provision of the constitution which gives to congress the right to regulate commerce, and which he says involves the right and obligation to furnish a sound circulating medium. The train of his reasoning, as far as I could comprehend it, was, that, without a currency, commerce could not exist, at least to any considerable extent, and, of course, there would be nothing to regulate; and, therefore, unless congress furnished a currency, its power of regulating commerce would become a mere nullity; and from which he inferred the right and obligation to furnish, not only a currency, but a bank currency! Whatever may be said of the soundness of the reasoning, all must admit that his mode of construing the constitution is very bold and novel. To what would it lead? The same clause, in that instrument, which gives congress the right to coin money and regulate the value thereof, gives it also the kindred right to fix the standard of weights and measures. They are just as essential to the existence of congress as the currency itself. The yard and the bushel are not less important in the exchange of commodities, than the dollar and the eagle; and the very train of reasoning which would make it the right and duty of the government to furnish the one, would make it equally so, to furnish the other. Again: commerce cannot exist without ships and other means of transportation. Is the government also bound to furnish them? Nor without articles, or commodities, to be exchanged, cotton, rice, tobacco, and the various products of agriculture and manufactures. Is it also bound to furnish them? Nor these in turn, without labor; and must that, too, be furnished? If not, I ask the senator to make the distinction. Where will he draw the line, and on what principles? Does he not see that, according to this mode of construction, the higher powers granted in the constitution would carry all the inferior, and that this would become a government of unlimited powers?—Take, for instance, the war power, and apply the same mode of construction to it, and what power would there be that congress could not exercise—nay, be bound to exercise? Intelligence, morals, wealth, numbers, currency, all are important elements of power, and may become so to the defence of the union and safety of the country; and, according to the senator's reasoning, the government would have the right, and would be in duty bound to take charge of the schools, the pulpits, the industry, the population, as well as the currency of the country; and these would, comprehend the entire circle of legislation, and leave the state governments as useless appendages of the system.

Having now, I trust, taken down to the ground the little centre building, with its four apartments, nothing remains of the entire structure but the huge portico in front, and on which I shall next commence the work of demolition. The senator opened his discourse on credits and banks, by asserting that bank credit was, in truth and reality, so much capital actually added to the community. I waive the objection, that neither credit, nor the banking system, is involved in the question; and that those who are opposed to the union of the political and money power oppose that union with other reasons, on the ground that it is unfavorable to a full development of the credit system, and dangerous to the banks themselves, which they believe can only be saved from entire destruction by the separation; and it follows, of course, all that he said in relation to them is either a begging of the question, or irrelevant. But, assuming what he said to be applicable, I shall show that it is either unfounded in fact, or erroneous in conclusion.

So far from agreeing with the senator, that what he calls bank credit is so much real capital added to the country, I hold the opposite—that banks do not add a cent of capital, or credit. Regarded strictly, the credit of banks is limited to the capital actually paid in. This usually is the only sum for which the stockholders are liable; and, without what is called banking privileges, they would not have a cent of credit beyond that amount. But the capital subscribed and paid is not created by the banks. It is drawn out of the general fund of the country. Now, I ask, what constitutes its credit beyond its capital? In the first place, and mainly, it is derived from the fact that both general and state governments receive and treat bank notes as cash, and thereby, to the extent of their fiscal action, virtually give them the use of their credit. It is an existing credit, belonging to them exclusively, and is neither created, nor increased, by permitting the banks to use it. In the next place, the deposits with the banks, both public and private, add a large amount to their credit; but this again is either the property or credit of the government and individuals, which they are permitted to use, and which they neither create nor increase. Finally, notes and bonds, or other credits discounted by the banks, make up their credit, which are neither more nor less than the credit of the drawers and endorsers, on which the banks do business. They take in the paper or credit of others, payable at a given day, deduct the interest in advance, and give out their own credit or notes, payable on demand, without interest; that is, the credit of their own paper rests on the credit of the paper discounted, or taken in exchange, which credit they neither create nor increase. In a word, all their credit beyond the capital actually paid in, is but the credit of the public, or individuals, on which, by what is called banking privileges, they are permitted to do business and make profit; and so far from creating credit or capital, they in fact add not a cent of capital or credit to that which previously existed.

But the senator next tells us that there is three hundred millions of banking capital in the union, and that it is real bona fide solid capital, as much so as the plantations of the south. This is certainly news to me. I had supposed that this vast amount was little more than a fictitious mass of credit piled on credit, in the erection of which, but little specie or real capital was used; and that, when a new bank was created, the wheelbarrow was put in motion to roll the specie from the old to the new institution, till it got fully under way, when it was rolled back again. But it seems that all this is a mistake; that the whole capital is actually paid in cash, and is as solid as terra firma itself. This certainly is a bold assertion, in the face of facts daily occurring. There have been, if I mistake not, four or five recent bank explosions in the senator's own town, in which the whole vanished into thin air, leaving nothing behind but ruin and desolation. What has become of that portion of his solid capital? Did the senator ever hear of a plantation thus exploding and vanishing? And I would be glad to know how large a portion of his three hundred millions of solid capital will finally escape in the same way? A few years may enable us to answer this question.

The senator next, by way of illustration, undertook to draw a distinction between bank credit and government credit, or public stocks, in which he was not very successful. It would be no difficult task to prove that they both rest substantially on debt, and that the government stock may be, and is to a great extent, actually applied in the same mode, as bank credit in the use of exchanges and business. It in fact constitutes, to a great extent, the very basis of banking operation; but, after having occupied the senate so long, it would be unreasonable to consume their time on what was introduced as a mere illustration.

The senator next undertook to prove the immense advantage of banking institutions. He asked what would be done with the surplus capital of the country, if it could not be invested in bank stocks? In this new and growing country, with millions on millions of lands, of the best quality, still lying unimproved; with vast schemes of improvements, constantly requiring capital; with the immense demand for labor for every branch of business, the last question I ever expected to hear asked is that propounded by the senator. I had supposed the great difficulty was to find capital, and not how to dispose of it; and that this difficulty had been one of the main reasons assigned in favor of the banking system.

The next benefit he attributes to the system was the vast amount of lands, which had passed out of the hands of the public into that of individuals of late, which he estimated, during the last three years, at thirty-six millions of acres, forming a surface equal in extent to England, and which he stated would rise in value greatly, in consequence of their passing into private hands. That this immense transfer has been effected by the banks, I admit; but that it is to be considered an advantage to the country, I certainly never expected to hear uttered any where, especially on this floor, and by one so intelligent as the senator. I had supposed it was infinitely better for the community at large, and particularly for those not in affluent circumstances, that the lands should remain in possession of the government than of speculators, till wanted for settlement; and that one of the most decided objections to our banking system is, that it becomes the instrument of making such immense transfers, whenever the currency becomes excessive. This is a point not without interest, and I must ask the senate to bear with me, while I pause for a few moments to explain it.

The effect of an expanding currency is to raise prices, and to put speculation in motion. He who buys, in a short time seems to realize a fortune, and every one is on the look-out to make successful investments, and thus prices receive a constant upward impulse, with the exception of the public lands, the price of which is fixed at $1 25, excepting such as are sold at public auction. The rise of other landed property soon creates a new demand for the public lands; and speculation commences its giant operations in that quarter. Vast purchases are made, and the revenue of the government increases in proportion to the increased sales. The payment is made in bank notes, and these pass from the land offices to the deposit banks, and constitute a large surplus for new banking facilities and accommodations. Applicants from all quarters press in to partake of the rich harvest, and the notes re-pass into the hands of speculators to be re-invested in the purchase of public lands. They again pass through the hands of receivers, and thence to the banks, and again to the speculators, and every revolution of the wheel increases the swelling tide, which sweeps away millions of the choicest acres from the government to the monopolizers for bank notes, which in the end prove as worthless as the paper on which they are written. Had this process not been arrested, by the deposit act of 1836, and had the banks avoided an explosion, in a short time the whole of the public domain, the precious inheritance of the people of this union and their descendants, would have passed through the same process with the thirty-six millions of acres which the senator so highly commends. What took place then will again take place, at the very next swell of the paper tide, unless, indeed, this bill should become a law, which would prove an effectual check against its recurrence.

The senator next attributes our extraordinary advance in improvement and prosperity to the banking system. He puts down as nothing our free institutions; the security in which the people enjoy their rights, the vast extent of our country; and the fertility of its soil, and the energy, industry, and enterprise of the stock from which we are descended. All these, it seems, are as dust. The banks are every thing, and without them we would have been little advanced in improvement or prosperity. It is much more easy to assign our prosperity to the banking system than to prove it. That in its early stages it contributed to give an impulse to industry and improvement I do not deny; but that, in its present excess, it impedes rather than promotes either, I hold to be certain. That we are not indebted to it for our extraordinary advance and improvements, wholly or mainly, there is an argument, which I regard as decisive. Before the revolution, we had no banks, and yet our improvement and prosperity, all things considered, were as great anterior to it, as since, whether we regard the increase of population or wealth. At that time not a bank note was to be seen, and the whole circulation consisted either of gold and silver, or the colonial paper money, which all now, and especially the senator, considers so worthless. Had the senator lived during that period, he might with equal plausibility, have attributed all the improvement and prosperity of the country to the old colonial paper money, as he now does to the banks; and have denounced any attempt to change or improve it, as an overthrow of the credit system, as warmly as he now does the separation of the government from the banks. I tell the senator that the time is coming, when his present defence of the banking system, as it is now organized, will be considered as extraordinary as we now would regard a defence of the old and exploded system of colonial paper money. He seems not to see that the system has reached a point, where great changes are unavoidable; and without which, the whole will explode. The state of its manhood and vigor has passed, and it is now far advanced in that of decrepitude. The whole system must be reformed, or it must perish in the natural course of events.—The first step toward its renovation is the measure he denounces in such unmeasured terms—the separation from the government; and the next a separation between discount and circulation. The two are incompatible; and so long as they are united, those frequent vicissitudes of contractions and expansions, to which bank circulation is so subject, and which is rapidly bringing it into discredit, must continue to increase in frequency and intensity, till it shall become as completely discredited as continental money.

The senator seems not to be entirely unaware of the danger to which the system is exposed from its frequent vibrations and catastrophes. He tells us, by way of apology, that had it not been for the specie circular the present catastrophe would not have occurred. That it hastened it, I do not in the least doubt; but that we should have escaped without it, I wholly deny. The causes of the explosion lay deep—far beneath the circular, and nothing but the most efficient measures, during the session immediately after the removal of the deposits, could have prevented it. That was the crisis, which having passed without doing any thing, what has since followed was inevitable. But admitting what he says to be true, what a picture of the system does it exhibit? How frail, how unstable must it be, when a single act of the executive could bring it to the ground, and spread ruin over the country? And shall we again renew our connexion with such a system, so liable from the slightest cause to such disasters? Does it not conclusively show that there is some deep and inherent defect in its very constitution, which renders it too unsafe to confide in without some radical and thorough reform?

The senator himself seems conscious of this. He entered into the question of its expansions and contractions, and suggested several remedies to correct an evil, which none can deny, and which all must see, if not corrected, must end in the final overthrow of the system. He told us that the remedy was to be found in the proportion between bullion and circulation, and that the proper rule to enforce the due proportion between the two, was, when exchange was against us, for the banks to curtail. I admit that the disease originates in the undue proportion, not between bullion and circulation, but between it and the liabilities of the banks, including deposits as well as circulation, (the former is even more important than the latter,) and that the remedy must consist in enforcing that proportion. But two questions here present themselves: what is that due proportion? and how is it, under our system of banking to be enforced? There is one proportion which we know to be safe, and that is, when for every dollar of liability there is one dollar in bullion or specie; but this would bring us back again to the old, honest, and substantial bank of Amsterdam, so much abused by all the advocates of banks of discount. If that proportion be transcended—if we admit two, or three, to one, to be the due proportion, or any other that would make banking more profitable and eligible than the mere loaning of money or other pursuits of society, the evil under which we now suffer would continue. Too much capital would continue to flow into banking, to be again followed by the excess of the system, with all its train of disasters. But admit that such would not be the fact, how are we to compel the twenty-six states of this union to enforce the due proportion, all of which exercise the right of establishing banks at pleasure, and on such principles as they may choose to adopt? It can only be done by an amendment of the constitution; and is there any one so wild and visionary as to believe that there is the least prospect of such an amendment? Let gentlemen, who acknowledge the defect, before they insist on a re-union with a system acknowledged to be exposed, as it now stands, to such frequent and dangerous vicissitudes, first apply a remedy and remove the defect, and then ask for our cooperation.

But the senator tells us that the means of enforcing the due proportion is to be found in the regulation of the exchanges, and for this purpose the only rule necessary to be observed is to curtail when exchanges are against us, and, as a counterpart, I suppose, to enlarge when in our favor. How much dependence is to be put on this rule, we have a strong illustration in the late catastrophe, under which the country is now suffering. The exchanges remained in our favor till the very last; and before the rule, on which the senator so confidently relies, could be applied, the shock was felt and the banks engulfed; and this will ever be the case, when preceded by a general expansion in the commercial world, such as preceded the late.

The cause of that commenced on the other side of the Atlantic, and originated mainly in the provisions on which the recharter of the Bank of England was renewed; which greatly favored extension of banking operations in a country which may be considered as the centre of the commercial system of the world. The effect of these provisions was a depreciation of the value of gold and silver there, and their consequent expulsion to other countries, and especially to ours, which turned the exchange with England in our favor; and which, in combination with other causes, the removal of the deposits and the expiration of the charter of the late Bank of the United States, was followed by a great corresponding expansion of our banking system. The result of this state of things was, a great increase of the liabilities of the banks, compared with their specie in both countries, which laid the train for the explosion. The Bank of England first took the alarm, and began to prepare to meet the threatened calamity. It was unavoidable, and the only question was, where it should fall. The weakness of our system, and the comparative strength of theirs, turned the shock on ours, but of the approach of which, the exchanges gave, as I have stated, no indications almost to the last moment. And even then, so artificial are exchanges, and so liable to be influenced by other causes, besides the excess of currency on one side, and the deficit on the other, after it began to show unfavorable indications, we all remember that a single individual, at the head of a state institution, I mean Mr. Biddle, by appearing in New York, and bringing into market bonds on England, drawn on time, turned the current and restored the exchange. All this conclusively proves, that when there is a general expansion, (the most dangerous of all,) exchanges give no indication of the approach of danger, and, of course, their regulation, on which the senator relies, affords no protection against it.

I might go further, and show that at no time is it to be relied on as the index of the relative expansion or contraction in different countries, and that it is liable to be influenced by many circumstances besides those to which I have alluded, some of which are fleeting, and others more permanent. It presupposes the perfect fluidity of currency, and that it is not liable to be obstructed or impeded by natural or artificial causes in its ebbs and flows, which is far from being true, as I have already shown in the instance of Mr. Biddle's operation preceding the late shock. In fact, it may be laid down as a rule, that where the currency consists of convertible paper, resting on a gold and silver basis, the small portion of specie which may be required to uphold the whole has its fluidity obstructed by so many and such powerful causes, as to afford no certain criterion of the relative expansion of the currency between it and other countries, and, of course, afford no certain rule of regulating banking operations. The subject is one that would require more time to discuss than I can bestow on the present occasion; but of its truth we have a strong illustration in the state of things preceding the late shock, when, as I have stated, the exchanges remained favorable to the banks, while the vast amount of our imports, and the unusual character of many of the articles imported, clearly indicated that our currency was relatively greatly expanded, compared with those countries with which we have commercial relations.

To correct the defects of the system, the senator must go much deeper. The evil lies in its strong tendency to increase; and that again, in the extraordinary and vast advantages which are conferred on it, beyond all other pursuits of the community, which, if not diminished, must terminate in its utter destruction, or an entire revolution in our social and political system. It is not possible that the great body of the community will patiently bear that the currency, which ought to be the most stable of all things, should be the most fluctuating and uncertain; and that, too, in defiance of positive provisions in the constitution, which all acknowledge were intended to give it the greatest possible stability.

TWENTY-FIFTH CONGRESS.

SECOND SESSION—SENATE.

[The report in the case of Mr. Ruggles was made by Mr. White, and not by Mr. Grundy, as stated in the last "REGISTER."]

April 13. The Vice President presented a communication from the post office department, on the subject of contracts, and allowances made to contractors. Laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Petitions, &c. were presented by the following gentlemen:

By Mr. McKean: Eight memorials signed by 867 citizens of Pennsylvania, praying that the alleged treaty of New Echota, made with the Cherokee nation of Indians, may not be enforced contrary to the consent of that tribe. Laid on the table, and ordered to be printed. By Mr. Buchanan: Memorials of the same import, from 1,100 or 1,200 citizens of Pennsylvania. Laid on the table. Also, from citizens of Lancaster county, against duelling. Laid on the table. By Mr. Moulton and Mr. Rouse: From individuals. Referred. By Mr. Crittenden: From the heirs of Richard K. Meade. Referred. The senate took up the resolution offered yesterday by Mr. Norvell, in relation to the absence of senators.

The resolution was modified by Mr. Norvell so as to make sickness the only valid excuse for absence.

Mr. King objected to the resolution, that the existing law rendered it nugatory. Mr. White objected to it, that by implication it took it for granted that a senator might at any time be absent if he chose, during that time, to surrender his pay; an implication which Mr. W. thought should by no means be admitted. There were duties resting upon them which were paramount to all considerations of compensation.

Mr. Clay, of Kentucky, objected to it, that it also took it for granted that all the duties of the senators for the public interest were to be performed in the senate chamber, while Mr. C. for one, performed much the greater part of his labor for the public interests in his own room, where he was in the practice of laboring day and night on public subjects; and he was unwilling, therefore, to give any cause for the impression that all the public business of senators was done, or to be done, in the senate chamber.

The resolution was withdrawn, Mr. Norvell remarking that his whole object was to secure a quorum of the senate during the hours of their sitting.

On motion of Mr. Niles, the committee on the judiciary were instructed to inquire into the expediency of defining and limiting the term of all the bureau officers connected with the departments, and of all appointments made by the heads of departments.

On motion of Mr. Ruggles, the committee on commerce were instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a system of telegraphs for the United States, and report thereon.

The bills for the relief of Thos. Cooper, of Philip Marshall, and others, of Christopher Clark, and of Elias Johns, were severally read a third time, and passed.

The senate took up the bill, on its third reading, to reduce and graduate the price of the public lands.

Mr. Calhoun said, that as the bill was now on its passage, he was desirous of stating in a few words the reasons which had governed him.

The bill was certainly liable to but little objection as to the details; but he could not give it his support. He felt satisfied that we had arrived at that period when one of two courses of policy ought to be pursued in relation to the public lands: either to adhere rigidly to the laws, as they now stand, without making any material change, or to make a cession of them to the new states within whose limits they are respectively situated, on terms mutually satisfactory. It cannot be disguised that the extent of interest involved in the public domain is too great, and the parties interested too powerful and influential, to permit the laws which regulate and dispose of the public lands to be the subject of frequent changes. Numerous and popular as these states have now become, (at which he rejoiced,) it was impossible to prevent this mighty question from being thrown into the party struggles of the day, and from having a most pernicious effect on our politics, so long as they are under our control, unless we should abstain altogether from touching them, which he feared was impossible.

It was well known that under this impression he was in favor of ceding them to the states, as the only practicable remedy against the evil he apprehended, and that under it he had introduced a bill to cede them. He hoped that the committee on the public lands would call up the bill at an early day. He was prepared to give it his best aid, and he did hope it would receive the sanction of the senate. In the mean time, he should feel it to be his duty to vote against all measures which provided for any material change in the land laws as they now stood.

Mr. Buchanan also, at considerable length, assigned the reasons why he felt constrained to vote against the bill.

The bill was passed by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Clay, of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Lyon, Monton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Robinson, Sevier, Smith, of Conn. Smith, of Indiana, Strange, Tipton, Trotter, Walker, White, Wright, Young—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, McKean, Merrick, Prentiss, Rives, Roane, Robbins, Ruggles, Swift, Wall, Williams—16.

The bills for the relief of Windsor Sears, and others, of Thomas Sumpter, of James Campbell, of Ann W. Johnson, of James McMaher, of Pierre Bernard, and others, of Patrick McGibbony, of Charles M. Keller, and — Stone, of Moses Merrill, to refund to the Georgia railroad and banking company certain duties paid on railroad iron, to refund such duties paid by the Harlem railroad company; to establish a pension agency at Montpelier, Vermont; for the relief of Thomas Tyner, and others; of the heirs of Francis L. B. Goodwin, of Michael Ambriester, of the heirs of William Coggeswell, of Freeman Brady, of Captain John Talford, of Hugh McDonald, and of D. W. Healey, were severally considered, and ordered to a third reading.

After an executive session, the senate adjourned till Monday.

April 16. The Vice President presented, from the treasury department, in pursuance of a senate resolution, offered by Mr. Walker, a report of the commissioner of the general land office, with statements, showing what portion of the public lands in the several land districts of the United States have been subject to sale at private entry for twenty-five years and upwards. Laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

The following petitions, &c. were presented:

By Mr. McKean: From citizens of Pennsylvania, against the enforcement of the late alleged treaty with the Cherokees contrary to their wishes. Laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

By Mr. Norvell: Resolutions relating to certain harbors and light-houses. Referred.

By Mr. Swift: The petition of 182 women of New Britain, Connecticut, remonstrating against the annexation of Texas to the United States. Laid on the table.

Also, the petition of the same persons, praying congress to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia. Motion to receive laid on the table.

By Mr. Baya d: From 439 citizens of New Castle county, Delaware, and from 168 vessel owners and captains, against the division of Delaware into two collection districts. Ordered to be printed, and laid on the table to await the action on the bill on that subject now in progress.

By Mr. Fulton: A resolution of instructions from the legislature of Arkansas, in favor of the passage of a law authorizing a certain township in Arkansas to sell the 16th section of land for the use of schools. Referred.

Several other petitions were presented, and resolutions offered, after which

Mr. King offered a joint resolution, which lies on the table for consideration, that congress adjourn on the first Monday in June.

A message was received from the president of the United States, through Mr. A. Van Buren, his private secretary.

The bills for the relief of James McMaher, of Curtis Grubb, of Alexander C. Morgan, of Jonathan Elliott, of John Wilson, of Thomas Tyner and others, of James L. Kenner, of H. W. Russell, of Freeman Brady, of James Callan, of Hugh McDonald, of D. W. Healey, of Ann W. Johnson, of Winthrop Sears, of Thomas Sumpter, of the legal representatives of Patrick McGibbony, of Charles M. Keller and Henry Stone, to refund certain duties on railroad iron to the Georgia railroad and banking company, to refund certain duties on railroad iron to the New York and Harlem railroad company, for the relief of the legal representatives of capt. Robert White, of the heirs of Francis L. B. Goodwin, of Michael Ambriester, of the heirs of William Coggeswell, and of the heirs of captain John Talford, were severally read a third time, and passed.

The bill for the relief of E. W. and H. Smith was considered, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The senate concurred in the amendment of the house to the senate bill for quieting claims, &c. in the District of Columbia.

The senate proceeded to consider the bill to prevent the issuing and circulation of the notes of the late United States Bank.

Mr. Grundy argued at much length, that the late letter of Mr. Biddle contained a virtual declaration of war against the administration, [in the part relating to getting "behind cotton bales," &c.] and that the measure proposed by the bill was constitutional, just, and expedient. He replied also particularly to the various portions of Mr. Biddle's letter, which he characterized as one of the most extraordinary productions of the time. When he had concluded,

On motion of Mr. Hubbard, the senate held an executive session, and then adjourned.

April 17. Among the petitions, &c. presented, were the following:

By Mr. White: Resolutions of the legislature of Tennessee, in favor of annexing Texas to the Union. Read, laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Also, in favor of paying the troops in Tennessee, who were organized but not received into the service of United States. Read, referred, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Fulton, from the joint committee on the public buildings, made a report, identical with the report made in the other house, on the subject of the new treasury building and the building for the general post office, accompanied by a bill providing for the removal of the walls of the new treasury building and for the erection of a fire-proof building for the post office department. Read, and ordered to a second reading.

The claims of David Allen, John Laub, and several others, (unheard,) were rejected.

The bill to extend the charter of the Union Bank of Georgetown, was read twice, and referred.

The bill for the relief of E. W. and H. Smith, was read a third time, and passed.

The bill for the relief Samuel Gibson, providing for indemnity for property destroyed by Indian depredations, was debated at considerable length by Messrs. White, Young, Linn, King, and Davis, chiefly on the objection that the government was not in the practice of making indemnity for robbery or piracy; and on the ground in favor of the bill, that government had not taken the proper measures to punish and prevent such depredations. In the end, the bill was indefinitely postponed.

The bill for the relief of Charles Bemis was also indefinitely postponed.

The senate resumed the consideration of the bill to prohibit the issuing and circulation of the notes of the late bank of the United States, under a penalty of not more than ten years' confinement to hard labor, and a fine not exceeding $10,000, one or both, at the discretion of the court, and giving the United States courts jurisdiction to issue injunctions.

Mr. Grundy said as no one appeared prepared to speak on the subject, it might be well to delay the action on the bill for a day or two.

Mr. Clay of Kentucky, said it was quite possible that no one was desirous to speak, but they might, notwithstanding, be ready to vote upon it.

Mr. King, said the bill was one of much importance, and he therefore thought it had better be over till to-morrow.

Mr. Clay said, certainly, if the friends of the bill desired it; but Mr. C. was very desirous to have the vote taken, to see if a majority of the senate were ready to assert the power claimed by the bill.

Mr. Linn said if the gentleman from Alabama desired to speak on the subject, he would be very glad to hear him; otherwise he thought it as well to take the vote at once.

Mr. King had now no intention of speaking, and if the senate thought best to take the vote now, he must vote against the bill.

Mr. Strange said he agreed with the chairman of the committee on the judiciary (Mr. Grundy) that the conduct complained of was a very great abuse; and he doubted the power of congress to pass the bill, and he should therefore vote against it.

Mr. Smith, of Connecticut, said he had not examined the bill so as to be ready to vote upon it, and as gentlemen in whom he had confidence expressed a doubt respecting it, he wished it postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. Wall said the bill had been on the table more than a month; but if any gentleman had not examined it, he had no objection to postpone it a day, though in saying this he did not mean to intimate the least doubt of the constitutional objections, he would like to hear them expressed.

Mr. Niles was also in favor of delay; and The bill was accordingly postponed till to-morrow.

The following bills were severally considered, and severally ordered to a third reading, viz:

The bill to authorize the appointment of four additional clerks in the office of commissioner on Indian affairs; for the benefit of the levy court of Calvert county, Maryland, for the relief of the heirs of John Campbell; for the relief of Thomas Cushing; for the relief of Thomas L. Winthrop and others, of the Mississippi land company, [advocated by Mr. Davis, and Mr. Buchanan, opposed by Mr. Benton, amended on motion of Mr. Davis, so as to render sufficient any proof satisfactory to the department that certain certificates were lost, and to require said company to secure the United States against loss by ad certificates, and carried by yeas [23, nays 14;] for the relief of David Gilmore: to authorize payment to the Missouri volunteers for horses lost in the voyage to Tampa Bay; and the bill granting patents to A. M. Perkins and J. H. Kyan.

Various bills from the house were severally read twice and referred.

The bill fixing the salaries of several district judges of the United States was discussed at length by Messrs. Smith of Indiana, Swift, White, Wall, Prentiss, Roane, and Rives.

It was amended on motion of Mr. Smith, by raising the salary of the judge in Indiana from $1,000 to $1,500; and pending a motion of Mr. Swift to make the same increase in the salary of the judge in Vermont.

The senate went into executive session, and then, on motion of Mr. Norvell, adjourned.

April 18. After the presentation of petitions, the senate took up the resolution offered by Mr. King, for closing the present session of congress on the first Monday in June.

Mr. King expressed the hope that the resolution would be adopted by the senate and go to the other house, who might fix on another day, if they thought the one in the resolution too early. He thought the agitation of the question would of itself have a favorable effect on the progress of business in congress.

Mr. Grundy wished the resolution might lie on the table a day or two, that the senate might be better able to estimate the amount of business before them.

Mr. Calhoun hoped the resolution would now be adopted. He thought the time sufficient for the senate to get through their business.

Mr. Preston also spoke in favor of its adoption, and argued that the extra session had diminished the amount of business that must otherwise have been done at this session.

Mr. Norvell hoped the resolution would not pass. Congress had neither determined on the great financial and pecuniary question which had been under discussion, nor had they provided the ways and means for the service of the country; and if this resolution should be sent as it was to the other house, and they should adopt it, these great questions would probably not be decided.

Mr. King said he should not press the resolution, but, as it was, it would still leave seven weeks of the session yet to come. At the short sessions, little was usually done till after Christmas, leaving only nine weeks for active business, and yet experience showed that business was about as much and as well done as in the long sessions; and it seemed, therefore, as if seven weeks, which was nearly as much as was employed at the short sessions, would now be time ample enough. If congress should not act at all on this subject, he feared much time would be consumed in idle debate.

Mr. Norvell moved to lay the resolution on the table; which motion was negatived by yeas and nays, ordered on the call of Mr. Davis, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Beiton, Grundy, Norvell, Pierce, Roane, Robinson, Ruggles, Strange, Wall, White, Wright—12.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Davis, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, McKean, Merrick, Monton, Nicholas, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Smith, of Connecticut, Smith, of Indiana, Southard, Swift, Tipton, Trotter, Williams, Young—26.

The resolution was then ordered to a third reading.

The bills published in the report of yesterday as ordered to a third reading, were to-day read a third time and passed.

The senate took up the bill to provide for the security and protection of the emigrant and other Indians west of Missouri and Arkansas.

Mr. Tipton explained, and advocated the bill at length, entering especially into historical and statistical facts relating to the subject. He concluded by moving that the bill be postponed to Tuesday next.

Mr. White, in behalf of the committee, invited the special attention of all the senators to this subject. They were desirous of obtaining every assistance to render the bill as perfect as possible.

Mr. Lumpkin expressed his entire concurrence in what the two gentlemen from the committee had said on this subject. He concurred also in the wish that gentlemen of the senate would turn their attention, one and all, to the subject. It was one of great importance, and Mr. L. believed the outlines of this bill would meet the views of every considerable gentleman in this part of the country; and Mr. L. entertained the hope that if every gentleman would turn his attention to this subject, and if the proper measures could be adopted, these Indians might not only be saved from ruin, but Mr. L.

looked for the day when they would become a part and portion of our happy union.

The bill was then postponed, and made the special order for Tuesday next.

Mr. Clay, of Kentucky, rose, and said that a bill which might be called the penitentiary bill had been made the order for to-day, with the understanding that it would now be considered. Mr. C. had no wish to press its consideration, if the friends of the bill were not ready to act upon it; but it had been laid on the table with the understanding that it would be now taken up.

Mr. Buchanan said the gentleman need not fear that he would not have an opportunity to vote on the bill. There was no disposition in its friends to suppress it. But Mr. B. would like to hear the senator justify the issue of the old notes of the U. S. Bank after the expiration of its charter.

Mr. Clay said he was afraid the senator would not be gratified in the fulfilment of any such expectation. Mr. C. would undertake no such justification; but he wished to see if gentlemen were ready to vote that government had any such power as that claimed by the bill.

The subject was here dropped, no motion being made to take the bill up, and no announcement of the bill from the chair.

The senate proceeded to consider the bill to establish a board of commissioners to hear and examine claims against the United States.

The subject of this bill was discussed by Messrs. Grundy, Prentiss, Strange, Hubbard, Preston, Calhoun, and Buchanan; some amendments from the committee were agreed to, provision was made for a special solicitor, and the bill, as amended, was then laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

The senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Friday, April 18. Memorials on the subject of duelling were presented by Messrs. Atherton, of New Hampshire, and Darlington, of Pennsylvania, and were referred to the select committee now in session.

The memorial presented by Mr. Atherton was from the inhabitants of the town of Antrim, in the county of Hillsborough, state of New Hampshire, which town contains three hundred and seventeen legal voters, praying, agreeably to a unanimous vote of a full meeting of the citizens of said town, for the passage of a law to suppress the practice of duelling.

Mr. Darlington presented the memorial of Wm. Hall and sixty others, citizens of Lancaster county, Pennsylvania, praying congress to pass a law to disqualify any person who may hereafter be engaged in a duel from holding office under the general government.

On motion of Mr. Williams, of N. C.,

Resolved, That the committee on the public lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing land districts in the United States, the receipts from which do not authorize their longer continuance.

Among the reports made were the following.

Mr. Mercer, from the committee on roads and canals, reported, without amendment, senate bill No. 29, making appropriations for certain roads in the territory of Wisconsin.

Mr. Cambreleng, from the committee of ways and means, reported the following bill:

A bill supplementary to the act entitled "An act to authorize the issuing of treasury notes."

Be it enacted, &c. That the secretary of the treasury, with the approbation of the president of the United States, is hereby authorized to cause treasury notes to be issued according to the provisions of an act entitled "An act to authorize the issuing of treasury notes," approved the 12th day of October last, in place of such notes as have been issued under the authority of the act aforesaid, and which have been paid into the treasury and cancelled.

The bill was twice read and committed.

The Speaker laid before the house a communication from the postmaster general, transmitting, in obedience to the act of July 2, 1836, a statement of all land and water mails established or ordered within the year preceding the 1st July, 1837, other than those let to contract at the annual lettings, and other than the express mails, which have been heretofore reported.

The Speaker laid before the house a letter from the secretary of the treasury, transmitting statements prepared in obedience to the order of the house on the 19th February, containing information, as far as it is now practicable to furnish the same, as to the value of exports from 1791 to 1837; the value of imports from 1821 to 1837; the value of imports free of duty and dutiable from 1821 to 1837; and the amount of duties and drawbacks from 1791 to 1836.

Mr. Whittlesey, of Ohio, moved that the special order for to-day (the bill to establish a board of claims) be postponed until Friday next; and that the house to-day proceed to the consideration of such private bills as shall not give rise to debate.

Mr. Cambreleng asked for a division of the question; and the postponement asked for was ordered by a vote of two-thirds.

The question recurring on the last division of Mr. Whittlesey's motion—

Mr. Thomas suggested that the following resolution, offered by him on a former day, be taken up and considered. This was an amendment to the 20th rule, as follows:

"And on the first Friday of each month, the calendar of private bills shall be called over, and the bills to the passage of which no objection shall then be made shall be first considered and disposed of; private bills from the senate having a preference over private bills of the house."

Objection being made, Mr. Whittlesey pressed his motion to take up such private bills (to-day) as would give rise to no debate.

Some objection being made to this course by Mr. Williams, of North Carolina, who was opposed to what he denominated "dumb legislation" upon private bills.

The Chair said that this was not a debateable motion; and that it required a vote of two-thirds, inasmuch as it proposed a suspension of the rules of the house.

The motion prevailed—Ayes 110, noes 46.

Mr. Hunter, of Virginia, moved that the house go into committee of the whole to take up and consider the bill to extend the charter of the Union Bank of Georgetown to the first July 1842, in order to close up its concerns.

The motion prevailed, and Mr. Hopkins of Virginia, took the chair. The bill being read,

Mr. Fillmore said the noise in the house had been such during the reading that he could not distinctly hear all the provisions of the bill, and asked some explanations of certain parts thereof, which were given by Mr. Hunter; and the result was, a proposition (which prevailed) to amend the bill by inserting 1845 instead of 1842, as the date of the extension of the charter.

The bill was then reported to the house, the amendment adopted, and ordered to a third reading this day.

Several bills from the senate were then put upon the first and second readings, and were properly referred.

The house (on motion of Mr. Whittlesey) went into committee of the whole, (Mr. Atherton in the chair,) and took up several private bills which were not likely to give rise to debate. Several were passed over, as not falling within this order of the house; and others were read; but a disposition to debate them appearing.

Mr. Mercer moved that the committee rise, for the purpose of moving the rescinding of the order by which it was made the duty of the committee to take up only those bills which would not give rise to debate. Lost.

Other bills were then taken up, and the same difficulty occurring.

Mr. Petrikin, at this point, renewed the motion to rise, and demanded a count. Ayes 12, noes 57. No quorum.

The motion was then withdrawn; and the list was proceeded with.

A large proportion of the bills on the calendar, thus far, proposed the payment of interest on certain claims, which was objected to by several members; and the motion to rise was very frequently made, in order that the order of the house might be rescinded, in order to enable this point to be debated.

Mr. Ewing, of Indiana, renewed the motion to rise, and report the bills to the house. Ayes 51, noes 46. So the committee decided to rise, but, as there was no quorum, the chair decided that the bills could not be reported. The question was then put, "Shall the committee now rise?" and decided in the affirmative—Ayes 65, noes 28. So the committee rose. Mr. Whittlesey then rose, and moved that the order of this morning be rescinded. The Speaker said that the fact of the presence of a quorum must be first ascertained. Mr. Adams moved a call of the house. Ayes 67, noes 73. So the motion did not prevail; and the Speaker then said that a quorum having appeared, the chairman would resume the chair: which being done, Mr. Ewing moved that the committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again. Mr. Wise was of the opinion that there had been no "progress" made, and proposed that the committee should report that they had made none.

Mr. Polk said that the committee of the whole on the state of the Union always reported that they had had under consideration certain unfinished business, but had come to no conclusion thereon; but the committee of the whole house always reported progress, and asked leave to sit again.

The motion of Mr. Ewing then prevailed: the speaker took the chair, and leave to sit again was then granted the committee.

Mr. Whittlesey then renewed his motion to rescind the order of this morning, and that the committee proceed with the calendar in the regular order.

Mr. Adams then rose and asked if the bills acted on in the committee of the whole were not now before the house? The chair responded in the negative. Mr. Adams moved a call of the house, and asked for the yeas and nays; which were not ordered: and the motion was lost. Mr. Adams then asked to have this motion entered on the journal, promising to renew it every time it would be in order during the day.

Mr. Wise moved an adjournment, and Mr. Briggs asked for the yeas and nays; which were not ordered: and the motion to adjourn was lost. Mr. Whittlesey's motion recurring,

Mr. Adams renewed his motion for a call of the house, and asked for the yeas and nays. His object was to get the house together to do business. It was discreditable to the house that it was impossible to keep a quorum to do the business of the nation. The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. Wise moved to adjourn. Lost. The motion of Mr. Adams that there be a call of the house was decided in the negative—Yeas, 62, nays 93.

Mr. Whittlesey's motion then prevailed: and the house went into committee of the whole upon the first twenty bills on the calendar, (Mr. Lyon in the chair.)

Several bills at the head of the calendar, were, on motion, laid aside for the present, without action upon them.

Another bill was then taken up and read. After some incidental discussion, the question was put on its passage, when there appeared to be no quorum present—Yeas 63, nays 24, and the committee then rose and reported this fact to the house.

Mr. Adams moved a call of the house, which was ordered: and one hundred and twenty-five members answered to their names. The absentees having been called, it appeared that one hundred and forty members were present. Mr. Chapman moved that all further proceedings upon the call be suspended.

Mr. Adams asked if all the names of absentees (supposing the motion to suspend prevails) would appear upon the journal?

The Chair responded affirmatively.

The motion to suspend did not prevail. The doors were closed, and the names of the absentees were called by the clerk.

Mr. Buchanan was excused on account of illness and other causes, and on the same account Messrs. Bruyn, Biddle, Chaney, (illness at home,) Coffin, Clowney, Davee, Dennis, Fletcher, of Vermont, Glascock, Grantland, and Grennell, (on the committee sitting during the sessions, on leave,) Hunter, of Ohio, Logan, Loomis, M. Morris, Noble, (death in his family,) Phillips, (similar reason,) Plumer, Robertson, Spencer, Shepler, Trucey, (on the select committee,) and J. L. Williams.

During the call of absentees, the name of Mr. Hawkins being called, he responded himself to his name.

Mr. Dawson said that the member had responded from the gallery.

The Speaker said no person was permitted to speak in the gallery; and ordered the clerk to erase the name of Mr. Hawkins.

Mr. Petrikin moved that Mr. Hubley be excused on account of being called to Pennsylvania by the near departure of Mr. Muhlenberg from the country. [Laugh.] Lost.

On motion of Mr. Dromgoole, the call at this point was suspended, (the whole roll having been called, and the absentees noted,) and then, on motion, the house adjourned at quarter before five o'clock.

Saturday, April 14. Mr. Evans, of Maine, asked and obtained leave of absence for his colleague, Mr. F. O. J. Smith, from and after the 1st day of May next.

Mr. Fairfield, of Maine, Mr. Peck, of New York, and Mr. Williams, of New Hampshire, presented memorials on the subject of the late duel.

Among the reports received was the following: By Mr. Everett, from the committee on Indian affairs, a bill supplementary to the act entitled an act to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, and to preserve peace on the frontiers; approved June 30, 1834.

Mr. Everett, submitted the following, which lies one day:

Resolved, That the secretary of war be directed to lay before this house a statement of the amount paid, and of the amount of arrears on account of the expenses of the Seminole war; and an estimate of the sum necessary, in addition to the former appropriation to pay such arrears, and for carrying on said war until the 1st day of June next.

After several resolutions of minor importance had been offered,

The resolution of Mr. Hopkins, of Virginia, on divorcing the government from all connexion with the public press, again coming up, Mr. Bond resumed and concluded his remarks upon it.

Mr. Hopkins gave notice that, if Mr. Hamer should not, on Monday next, offer his resolution on the subject of the resumption by the banks of specie payments, he (Mr. H.) would.

Mr. Petrikin gave notice he should object to its reception if offered. [A laugh.]

The house now passed to the orders of the day, and on motion of Mr. Whittlesey went into committee of the whole, (Mr. Lyon in the chair,) and considered a number of private bills. After which the committee rose and reported the bills, which had been considered, to the house; when those which had passed the committee were ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time on Monday next.

In regard to those bills whose enacting clauses had been stricken out, the question of concurrence in striking them out having been stated—

Mr. Tullioferro moved an adjournment, and the house thereupon adjourned.

Monday, April 16. As soon as the journal was read,

Mr. Hamer rose, and asked leave to make a statement to the house, to which no objection was made.

Mr. H. then said that he had been requested to state whether he intended again to offer the resolution presented by him on Monday last. In regard to that matter he legged to advert to what had been thrown out elsewhere. He understood from the newspapers that various opinions were entertained as to the object he had in view. By some it was suggested that it had been offered as a sort of antagonist proposition to Mr. Biddle's letter. Now, it would be recollected that Mr. H. presented his resolution on Saturday, and Mr. Biddle's letter was only printed on the same day in Philadelphia. He himself did not hear of it till Sunday night, nor see it till Monday morning, and could necessarily, therefore, have no knowledge of it on Saturday.

Another suggestion had been thrown out, that Mr. H. had offered it with reference to the charter election in the city of New York. However important that election might be in itself, or however important some gentlemen might deem it, he trusted he had higher objects in view than the New York city or any other election. He looked to the great interests of the country, and to them alone.

Mr. H's object was simply this: He knew that the bank convention was to assemble on Wednesday last, and he had reason to believe that many gentlemen who had gone as delegates thereto entertained an apprehension that the course of the general government, the legislation of congress, as well as the action of the treasury department, in carrying out that legislation, might be hostile to the resumption of specie payments. For himself he did not believe that the congress of the United States would pass any law, at the present session, without having special reference to the existing condition of the country, or that it would not so modify any law it might pass as to throw no hindrance in the way of resumption.

Neither did Mr. H. believe that the treasury department, in carrying out that legislation, did feel or would feel any disposition to throw any impediment in the way of effecting that resumption. His object, therefore, was to give such assurances to those banks which had gone into convention, as might encourage them to go on, for it was surely desired by every patriotic man in the country, of every party, that the banks should resume.

Again: the house refused to entertain the proposition on Monday; and when he was called upon, two days afterwards, to give an explanation, he was refused, and he was not disposed to put himself in the attitude of impeding the business of the house by moving, day after day, to suspend the rules.

Besides, he found that, by moving this proposition, he placed a number of his political friends in this embarrassing condition: that, although they did not disapprove of the principle involved in it, or the object sought to be attained by it, still some of them did not approve of its phraseology, and therefore they were compelled to vote against it. Many were actuated by another feeling. They feared a premature discussion on the whole currency question, which would inevitably spring up, and amendments of the resolution, which might compel them and himself to vote against a proposition, the general tenor of which, in its present shape, they approved. He understood amendments were to be offered on both sides of the house. In voting against the suspension of the rules, therefore, they would be placed in the embarrassing attitude of seeming to oppose his resolution.

Mr. Bell rose to order. The gentleman from Ohio was proceeding with an argument to go before the country, and he would like to have an opportunity to reply.

Mr. Hamer observed that he should finish what he had to say in a word or two.

Mr. Bell then remarked, that if the gentleman from Ohio had risen to explain, and not to make an argument, he should be candid enough to state to the house and to the country what relief he did propose to the nation from its present embarrassed state. Mr. B. called upon the gentleman to be explicit on this head, and state specifically what was proposed.

Mr. Hamer said that since he had offered this resolution, for the purpose of giving assurance to the banks the secretary of the treasury had written a letter (which had been published) to a similar effect. The same assurances had also been given, repeatedly, by the official organ of the government here.

Mr. Sherrod Williams rose to order. The gentleman from Ohio had had leave to make an explanation of a matter personal to himself, but not to explain and apologise for the conduct of all his political friends. He (Mr. W.) was in favor of letting every man explain for himself.

Mr. Hamer then said he had nothing more to say, at this time, than that there was now no necessity for the adoption of the resolution he had proposed, and that, therefore, he should not again ask for its adoption.

Mr. Menefee had risen to make a single remark, if the house would give him leave. [Cries of leave! leave!]

Objection being made,

Mr. Menefee moved to suspend the rules, in order to be able to move that he be permitted to go on.

Mr. Chambers demanded the yeas and nays on the question of suspending the rules; which were ordered. Being taken; there were yeas 87, nays 71, not two-thirds. So the house refused to suspend the rules.

The Speaker then called the states in order for resolutions, and the following were offered:

When the state of Tennessee was called, Mr. Shields of that state, presented the following resolution of the legislature, in favor of the annexation of Texas to the United States.

Whereas we have been anxious and attentive observers of the progress of events in Texas, and have not been unmoved spectators of her late gallant and glorious struggle for freedom, and have seen that freedom achieved by those near and dear to us by the ties of kindred and common ancestry; and whereas we have seen, by a vote of the people of that republic, an anxious desire manifested to become citizens of these United States; and whereas we believe that the gallant and chivalrous bravery of Texans, in their struggle for liberty and free government, is an assurance of their worth, and sufficient evidence of their qualification to entitle them to brotherhood and citizenship with us; and whereas, also, we believe that the annexation of Texas to these United States is a "consummation devoutly to be wished," and an end worthy our best exertions to attain, if it can be done without the infraction of the law of nations, or a departure from the policy or principles of this government.

Now, therefore, Resolved by the general assembly of the state of Tennessee, That we desire most anxiously that Texas be acquired by these United States; and resolved that our senators and representatives in congress be informed of our desire to acquire the territory of Texas, and to annex it to the United States, by treaty or purchase, and at such time as they may deem most expedient.

Resolved, That a copy of this preamble and resolution be forwarded by the governor of this state to our senators and representatives in congress, with a request that they introduce them to the consideration of both branches of congress.

JOHN COCKE,

Speaker of the house of representatives

TERRY H. CAVAL,

Speaker of the senate.

Mr. Shields moved to refer this resolution and all others on file touching the same subject, to a select committee.

Mr. Bronson moved to lay the motion on the table.

On this question Mr. Shields asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered and taken, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alexander, H. Allen, John W. Allen, Anderson, Andrews, Albertson, Averie, Beatty, Beirne, Bicknell, Birdsall, Bond, Boon, Brodhead, Bronson, Bruyn, Cambreleng, W. B. Carter, Casey, Chapman, Clark, Cleveland, Coles, Corwin, Craig, Cushman, an, Darlington, Dawson, Deberry, DeGraff, Dromole, Dunn, Edwards, Everett, Farrington, Fairfield, ry, James Garland, Glascock, Goode, Grantland, Grant, Graves, Haley, Hall, Hulsted, Hamer, Harrington, Hawkins, Haynes, Herod, Halsey, Holt, Hopkins, gham, T. B. Jackson, J. Jackson, J. Johnson, N. Jones, J. W. Jones, Kemble, Klingensmith, Lawler, Leadbetter, Lincoln, Loomis, S. Mason, Maxwell, McKay, R. McClellan, McClure, Mercer, Morgan, W. Morris, Noble, Palmer, Parker, Farmenter, Paynter, Pearce, Pennybacker, Petrikin, Phelps, Pope, Pratt, Randolph, Reily, Rives, Sheffer, A. H. Shepherd, Smith, Southgate, Spencer, Stuart, Stratton, Taylor, Thomas, Titus, Towns, Vanderveer, A. S. White, J. White, E. Whittlesey, L. Williams, J. W. Williams, J. L. Williams, Yorke—107.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Bell, Borden, Bouldin, Briggs, W. B. Calhoun, J. Calhoun, W. B. Campbell, John Campbell, Cheatham, Childs, Clowney, Coffin, Conner, Cranston, Crockett, Curtis, Cushing, Davies, L. Shepard, Shields, Sibley, Slade, Snyder, Stone, Taliaferro, Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Turney, Underwood, Sherrod Williams, C. H. Williams, Wise, Yell—75.

So the whole subject was laid on the table.

When the state of Virginia was called, Mr. Hopkins, in pursuance of notice given on Saturday last, offered a resolution, (being the same as that presented on Monday last, by Mr. Hamer.)

Mr. Hopkins said that it was not his wish to interrupt the presentation of resolutions; but he should call up this proposition for consideration so soon as the call of the states had been finished.

When the state of Massachusetts was called, Mr. Cushing offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury be directed to inform this house whether a certain letter, bearing his signature, and the date of the 18th of March, 1833, which has appeared in the public papers, and which purports to make known the purpose of the treasury department in relation to the receipt and disbursements of the promissory notes of the state banks by the federal government, is authentic or not; and, if it be, to communicate to the house a copy of the same; and also copies of any and every other official letter on the same subject-matter; and that he be further directed to report to the house the views and intentions of the department in the premises, and the measures adopted, or to be adopted, in execution thereof.

Mr. Cushing asked for the consideration of this resolution at the present time.

Objections being made—

Mr. Cushing moved a suspension of the rules, for the purpose of considering the motion; and asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and stood as follows: Yeas 97, nays 85.

Not being two-thirds, the motion to suspend the rules, did not prevail.

Mr. Adams presented the following resolution, which was adopted without objection:

Resolved, That the president of the United States be requested to communicate to this house, if not incompatible with the public interest, any information which he may have received, officially or otherwise, relating to an attack by a Mexican armed vessel upon the sloop Columbian, bearing the flag of the United States, in the Gulf of Mexico.

On the motion of Mr. Yell,

Resolved, That the secretary of war be directed to communicate to this house copies of all instructions to Major General Gaines, relating to the selection of sites for military posts on the western frontier of Arkansas and Missouri; whether he has entered upon the duties assigned him, and when probably a report may be expected from him; and such other information as may be in the power of the department to communicate touching the commencement and progress of the defence of the western frontier.

On motion of Mr. Snyder,

Resolved, That the committee on naval affairs be instructed to provide, by law, for the appointment of midshipmen in the navy, so that an equal number may be chosen from each congressional district in the United States.

Mr. Rice Garland offered the following resolution, which lies over one day:

Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury be directed to inform this house, as soon as practicable, whether, in the present financial condition of the country and of the treasury, it will not be most judicious and proper to make such appropriations as will preserve the public works from injury and dilapidation alone; and if such a course will not be judicious and proper, he then inform the house whether some or all the estimates for the service of the year 1833, already submitted, for fortifications, the improvement of harbors and rivers, the establishment of light-houses, beacons, and buoys, the construction of roads, the service of the Indian department, and for all other purposes, cannot be reduced without injury to the public service; and if such reduction can be made, that he designate what proposed appropriations may properly be reduced, and how much; and further, that he inform the house whether some of the appropriations already made may not, without material injury to the country, be suspended for the present; if so, to designate them; also, that he inform this house whether, if all the appropriations made are expended, and those proposed are made, the amount now in the treasury, or estimated to come into it during the present year, will be sufficient to meet them; and, if not, what will be the deficit, and in what manner it is proposed to be met.

On motion of Mr. Shields,

Resolved, That the committee of claims be instructed to inquire into the expediency of allowing additional pay to such troops as have been, or are, employed in the service of the United States in the present Florida or Seminole war, and have lost their horses and baggage in said service, without any fault of theirs, because the United States had failed to provide forage for said horses, and who were required to perform, and did perform, after they were dismounted, on foot, the same services which were required of mounted men, so as to make their monthly arrearages equal to that of mounted men in said service; and, also, of providing that the horses of any kind of said troops which may have died from excessive fatigue, in executing extraordinary orders of the commanding officers, without any fault of their riders, or such of said horses as were killed by accident or casualty, while under the immediate orders and direction of said officers, shall be paid for by the United States.

On motion of Mr. Leadbetter,

Resolved, That the committee on the judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for an interchange of duty by the judges of the circuit court of the United States, where one or more of the said judges are interested in any matter therein pending, or where trial cannot be had without prejudice to parties.

Mr. Bond submitted the following, which lies over one day:

Resolved by the senate and house of representatives of the United States of America in congress assembled, That no order should be adopted by the executive of the United States which discriminates the medium in which payment of debts or public dues shall be made to the government, and that if any such order now exists, the same ought to be forthwith rescinded.

Mr. S. Williams offered the following, which lies over:

Resolved, That the committee of ways and means be instructed to report a bill making it unlawful for the secretary of the treasury, or any other officer of this government, to continue in force or make any general or special order making a distinction or discrimination in the medium or kind of currency in which the different branches of the revenue (either from the sales of the public lands or from any other source) of the United States shall be collected.

Mr. Southgate offered the following, which lies over one day:

Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury transmit to congress the names of all receivers, collectors, and disbursers of the public money in office on the 1st of January, 1833, who were in default to this government at that period, designating the amount of each respective liability.

On motion of Mr. McKay,

Resolved, That the committee on naval affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of repealing the law establishing the board of navy commissioners.

Resolved further, That said committee inquire into the expediency of fixing by law the number of vessels; and also of officers, petty officers, and seamen, to be employed in time of peace.

On motion of Mr. C. H. Williams,

Resolved, That the committee on the public lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of indemnifying the settlers in that section of the country commonly called the Strip, (embracing that part of the state of Tennessee south of Winchester line,) for the injury received by a disregard (on the part of the government) of the treaty of 1813, in disposing of the lands in said limits for the benefit of the Chickasaw Indians, contrary to the provisions of said treaty.

On motion of Mr. Jos. L. Williams,

Resolved, That the committee on Indian affairs inquire into the propriety of reporting a bill providing the rate of compensation due to such warriors of the Cherokee tribe of Indians as were wounded in the service of the United States, pursuant to the 14th article of the treaty between the United States and said tribe, concluded 29th December, 1835, and ratified 23d May, 1836.

On motion of Mr. Harlan,

Resolved, That the postmaster general be directed to inform this house whether he has collected a judgment rendered in favor of the post office department against Samuel B. Crockett and Francis P. Blair, in the federal court of Kentucky, and reported by him to this house the 3d of March, 1837, of balances due to the department prior to 1st of July, 1836, in the following words: "Suit ordered, and judgment obtained, May, 1834, for $1,827 01; credited by $431 37; penalty remitted by postmaster general, leaving balance as stated; application for relief refused by the department; December 20, 1835, fa. issued, and returned March, 1836, no estate found; information was sought by the department relative to the parties November 30, 1835; referred to the district attorney December 30, 1835; also, wrote to him February 13, 1837." And if he has not collected said judgment, what steps, if any, have been taken to enforce the collection of the same.

Resolved further, That the postmaster general be directed to inform this house whether it is the practice of the department to remit the penalty incurred by defaulting deputy postmasters, without the payment of the principal debt; and that he be further directed to inform this house what amount of moneys has been paid by his department to the said Francis P. Blair for printing ordered by said department since the rendition of the judgment, and return of the writ of execution aforesaid.

The states having been gone through with—

Mr. Hopkins, as he had expressed his intention to do, moved to take up for consideration the following resolution:

"Considering that the business, commerce, circulation, and exchanges of the country are in a deranged and embarrassed condition; and considering, also, that a part of the banks of the United States have expressed a desire to resume specie payments at an early period,

Resolved by the senate and house of representatives of the United States of America in congress assembled, That, if the banks, or a portion of them, do thus resume, it will be the duty of the general government, within the limits of its constitutional authority, to aid such banks in regaining public confidence, and to sustain them in their laudable efforts to fulfil their obligations to relieve the wants of the community, and to restore to the people a sound circulating medium.

Mr. Petrikin (as he promised to do) objected.

Mr. Hopkins moved to suspend the rules for the purpose of now considering this resolution.

Mr. Clark asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and stood as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Alexander, H. Allen, J. W. Allen, Averigg, Bell, Biddle, Bond, Borden, Bouldin, Briggs, W. B. Calhoun, J. Calhoun, W. B. Campbell, W. B. So, there not being two-thirds, the rules were not suspended for the purpose of considering Mr. Hopkins's resolution.

Petitions and memorials on various subjects were presented, when Virginia was called, Mr. Wise offered the following:

"Resolved, That the committee for the District of Columbia inquire in the propriety of receding, under proper restrictions and reservations, with the consent of the people of this District, and of the states of Maryland and Virginia, the said District to the said states."

Mr. Pratt moved that the above resolution be laid upon the table; on which motion Mr. Wise demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. Wise then called for the reading of the memorial; and it was read accordingly.

Mr. Wise stated that the legislature of Maryland had declared itself willing to receive the District if retroceded.

Mr. Taylor inquired if the District committee had not been discharged from the further consideration of this memorial?

Mr. Wise said, that committee had reported adversely to the desire of the memorialists.

The question on laying the resolution on the table was ordered by yeas and nays, as follows: Yeas 89, nays 73.

So the resolution was laid on the table.

Mr. Wise gave notice that, if this proposition were still to be refused, he would go with the west, to remove the seat of government from this place to that section of the country.

Petitions from Maryland were called and presented; at this point, Mr. Atherton, at the request of Mr. Thomas, moved to reconsider the vote of Saturday last, granting leave of absence to Mr. Smith after the 1st of May next.

The motion was entered, and the call for petitions proceeded in regular order.

All the states having been called,

The house then took up several senate bills, which were read twice, and referred.

At 4 o'clock the house, on motion, adjourned.

Tuesday April 17. Mr. Campbell, of South Carolina, stated that he had on yesterday voted from misapprehension against granting leave to Mr. Hopkins, of Virginia, to offer a resolution on the subject of affording the support of the government to the banks in resuming specie payments, and, in if order, would move a reconsideration of that motion; not that he suspected the administration of any hostility to the banks, or any wish to impede them in bringing back the country to a sound and healthful currency; but as the subject was confessedly one of great importance, he did not desire to be misunderstood in relation to it.

The Chair said that the motion was in order, and would be entered on the journal, to be considered hereafter.

Mr. Adams, from a select committee to whom had been referred a memorial on the subject of encouraging a system of meteorological observations throughout the United States, was directed to ask the use of the hall, previously to the sitting of the house, on Wednesday and Thursday mornings, to afford to professor Espey an opportunity to deliver two lectures on that subject.

Objection being made to receiving the motion,

The Chair reminded Mr. Adams that when select committees should be called, the motion would be in order.

Reports of committees were then called, when the following, among other reports, were received.

Mr. Boon, from the committee on public lands, reported, without amendment, senate bill providing for the reduction and graduation of the price of the public lands.

Mr. Harlan, from the same committee, reported against senate bill for giving effect to the 8th article of the treaty of 1819 with Spain.

Mr. Yell, from the committee on military affairs, reported a bill for providing for the defence of the western frontier.

Mr. Ingham, from the same committee, reported senate bill to remunerate the captors of the privateer Lydia, without amendment.

Mr. Howard, from the committee on foreign affairs, reported against the petition of Samuel Goldsberry for property captured and condemned under the Neapolitan government in 1807.

Mr. Fairfield, from the same committee, reported a bill to provide for surveying the northeastern boundary line of the United States, according to the provisions of the treaty of peace of 1783.

Mr. Sibley, from the committee on revolutionary pensions, reported against the petitions of sundry officers and soldiers, &c. of the revolutionary war, praying that all pensioners who were struck from the pension roll under the law of 1820 may be restored to their pension.

Mr. Fletcher, from the committee on patents, reported "An act in addition to an act to promote the encouragement of the useful arts," accompanied by a report thereon.

Mr. Calhoun, of Massachusetts, from the select committee, reported a bill granting a bounty in land to such soldiers of the old fourth regiment of United States infantry as served during any part of the war with Great Britain.

Mr. Taylor, from the committee on invalid pensions, reported the following resolution, which was disagreed to by the house:

Resolved, That this house will proceed on Friday next, after 12 o'clock, to consider the bills which have been reported by the committee on invalid pensions, and those that may be reported before that time.

Mr. Fletcher presented the following resolution, which was read, and referred to the committee on the library:

Resolved, the senate concurring herein, That the commissioner of patents have the privilege of taking books from the library of congress, for the use of his department, under the same rules and regulations as are prescribed to members of congress.

Select committees being called on for reports,

Mr. Adams again presented the request of professor Espey for the use of the hall.

The request was supported by Messrs. Whittlesey, Connor and Tillinghast, and opposed by Messrs. Pickens and Petrik, the latter of whom demanded the yeas and nays upon it, but the house refused to order them; and the discussion was briefly ended by Mr. McKenna's demanding the previous question, when the question was agreed to: Ayes 99.

Mr. Lincoln from the committee on the public buildings, and by direction of that committee, moved that the house go into committee of the whole on the state of the union, and take up the bill providing for taking down the materials of the new treasury building, and applying them in the erection of a post office. He stated the urgency of the case, one hundred and fifty mechanics having their employ suspended, and it being of importance, on all accounts, that the question be settled one way or the other.

Mr. Rencher, of North Carolina, objected; but, on the suggestion of Mr. Whittlesey, consented to waive his objection. Mr. Boon renewed it; whereupon, the question being put, the house, by a vote of two-thirds, (required to change the order of business,) assented to the motion, and went accordingly into committee of the whole (Mr. Pope in the chair) on that bill.

The bill having been read,

Mr. Lincoln went into an expose of the grounds of the bill, giving a complete history of the present building, from its inception, «xonerating the late and present administration from all blame as to its location, size, or defects, and explaining the course of the present architect, and of the committee, in relation to the whole subject.

It is impossible, at present, to present even a sketch of the debate, which occupied the house during the residue of the sitting, and terminated, for this day, without the house having arrived at any decision respecting the bill.

When Mr. Lincoln had concluded, Mr. Cumbrerling, objecting to the probable extent of the discussion while appropriation bills were delayed, moved that the committee rise.

Mr. W. Thompson opposed the motion, and took occasion from the bill to go into a general attack upon the extravagance of the administration.

Mr. Pickens made a speech in opposition to the bill, in which he spoke highly of Mr. Mills, and his reputation in South Carolina, where he had erected a number of buildings. Mr. Mercer followed, in defence of the bill, and in reply to Messrs. Thompson and Pickens. Mr. Boon replied to Mr. Thompson's attack, and vindicated the administration's economy. Mr. Rencher earnestly opposed the bill, and remonstrated against relying on the opinions of interested architects from abroad, &c.

Mr. Williams, of North Carolina, replied to his colleague, and defended the bill, insisting on the ability and disinterestedness of those who had condemned the present building, which he proposed to replace by a plain, economical structure. Mr. Yell spoke warmly against the bill, inveighing against the extravagance of the good-society party, and lauding the economy of the soup-and-bread party, who, he prophesied, would erect a greater obstruction to the prospect of the president's house from the other end of the capital than would be interposed by this treasury building. Mr. Everett went into a calculation to show the vast expense to which a completion of the present building would pledge the house, and the economy of arresting the plan, and pulling down the present defective edifice. Mr. Tuliaferro inquired why the present materials could not be used in erecting a new treasury building, rather than be transported to a distance to build a post office? Mr. Lincoln explained; and some conversation ensued between those gentlemen and Mr. Mercer on the relative merits of sand stone and granite, when,

Mr. Naylor, having obtained the floor, moved for the raising of the committee.

The motion prevailing, the committee rose accordingly, and thereupon the house adjourned.

Wednesday, April 18. Mr. Peck asked leave to present a memorial relative to the late duel between members of this house.

Mr. Garland, of Louisiana, objected to its reception at this time; and it was not received.

Mr. Naylor asked leave to offer a resolution (heretofore presented, but objected to) making certain inquiries relative to this subject.

Mr. Ingham made objection.

Mr. Naylor moved that the rules be suspended to enable him to offer it; which motion was lost.

Mr. Corwin, from the committee on the judiciary, reported, with an amendment, senate bill to provide for the better security of the lives of passengers on board vessels impelled in whole or in part by steam.

Mr. Stanley, from the committee on invalid pensions, reported a bill for the relief of Benjamin D. Townes.

Mr. Johnston, of Va., from the committee on revolutionary pensions, made an unfavorable report on the petition of Wm. Neves: ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. Williams, of Ky., asked leave to offer the following preamble and resolutions, which were read:

Whereas, it was some years since declared to be the people of the United States, by the illustrious Andrew Jackson, that reform and retrenchment in their government and its expenditures were necessary; and whereas, the declaration of the late president, in relation to the promised reform and retrenchment of the expenditures of the government, was not carried out by his friends in congress; and whereas, instead of lessening the expenditures of the government, that they have been largely and enormously increased; and whereas, it is highly important to the people of the United States that their government should be usefully administered upon as cheap a scale or price as is consistent with the public good:

Therefore, resolved, That a select committee of nine members be appointed to take into consideration, and report to this house, what salaries of the officers of the government may be reduced, what officers may be dispensed with, and what items of expenditures in the various offices or departments of this government can be entirely or in part dispensed with; and for the purposes of enabling the committee to make a correct report whether or not the expenses of the different executive departments of this government have increased within the last ten years, and what salaries may be reduced, what officers may be dispensed with, and what items of expenditure may be lessened:

Therefore, resolved, That the secretaries of state, treasury, war, navy, and the postmaster general be, and they are respectively, required to report and communicate to this house, as soon as practicable, what were the expenses of their respective departments, including every item of expenditure in the year commencing on the 4th day of March, 1828, and ending on the 3d day of March, 1829, and so on for each successive year, up to the 4th day of March, 1833, placing each item of expenditure under its proper head.

Objection being made from several quarters,

Mr. W. moved a suspension of the rule, and asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

Mr. McKay requested the gentleman to withdraw the preamble, and then he would vote for the resolutions.

Mr. Williams replied that he could, on no account, consent to do that. Mr. Cumbrerling wished to know if the house was again disposed to set aside all the public business of the nation, as it did yesterday, to consider this proposition. Mr. McKay inquired of the chair if the question could not be taken on the preamble and resolutions separately? The Chair replied that the question was not divisible, for a proposition could not be divided till it was before the house. Mr. McKay reiterated that he would willingly vote to suspend for the resolutions, but not for the preamble. Mr. Tillinghast solicited the gentleman to withdraw one single word of the preamble. Mr. Williams. Not one word, nor one letter.

The house refused to suspend the rules—yeas 92, nays 87.

The unfinished business of the morning hour was the resolution submitted some time since by Mr. Hopkins, of Virginia, to divorce the public press from the patronage of the government.

Mr. Dramgoole moved to add the following to the resolution:

And that the said committee be also instructed to inquire whether the individual elected printer by this house, at the extra session, does now execute, and has, in fact, since his election, executed the public printing at his own establishment, with the press, types, and hands employed in his own office, and subject to his immediate orders, directions, and control; or whether the public printing has not, since the period of said election, been executed, and whether it is not now executed, at the office of the political journal other than that of the printer to this house, and under the directions and regulations of other editors; and if so, to inquire upon what authority, and upon what terms, conditions, and stipulations, the public printing has been transferred to individuals other than the one appointed and required by this house to perform the same. And that the said committee inquire further, whether, prior to the final ballot, and before the close of said election of printer, there was not some bargain, agreement, or understanding, express or implied, inchoate or complete, that in the event of the election of the individual now holding the appointment, the public printing should be executed at the office of another political journal, whose editors were, at the same time, also candidates for the appointment; and that the committee report to this house, specially, the nature and the terms of any such bargain, agreement, or understanding.

And that the committee be also instructed to ascertain and state, under separate and specific heads, the various expenditures growing out of the action of the special committee of this house, appointed on the 3d day of January, 1837; and in like manner the various expenditures growing out of the action of the select committee of this house, appointed on the 17th day of January, 1837; and also the various expenditures growing out of the action of the committee on the judiciary on the memorial of Richard S. Coxe, and William L. Brent, presented to this house on the 30th day of January, 1837; and also the expenditure incurred under the orders of this house of the 15th and 18th September last, in relation to the printing of the rules and orders of the house, with Jefferson's manual of practice.

Mr. Wise said he should vote for this amendment, or the reason that the bare presentation of it showed the necessity of Mr. Hopkins's resolution being adopted. He suggested another point of inquiry to Mr. Dromgoole, viz. how much public patronage had been distributed during the last two years, and how much of that public patronage had gone into the pockets of the editors of the official organ.

In reference to the alleged bargain between the Madisonian and Intelligencer offices, Mr. W. disavowed any privacy, though he had no doubt the parties on the other side (the Globe) would have made a similar bargain, if such existed, if they could have done so.

A message in writing was received from the president of the United States, by the hands of his private secretary, A. Van Buren, esq. transmitting a large mass of documents and correspondence in relation to the delay in the sailing of the exploring expedition.

Mr. Ingham, moved to refer them to the committee on naval affairs. He would not move their printing at present, for the documents were very voluminous, and the committee would report at an early day what ought to be printed. Mr. Naylor moved the printing of the whole. Mr. Mason of Ohio understood that a vast amount of the correspondence had been already printed. Mr. Ingham confirmed that statement, and added that a great number of the other documents had also been printed. Mr. Mullory assented to Mr. Ingham's motion. Mr. Naylor modified his motion, by excepting what had been already printed. Mr. Wise was at a loss to see the necessity of referring the subject to the committee on naval affairs, for the time had gone by when the information would be of service. It was locking the stable door after the horse was stolen. The motion of Mr. Naylor to print was rejected.

Mr. Wise then moved to instruct the committee to inquire into, and report the causes, of the failure of the exploring expedition. Mr. Ingham accepted this amendment; and, so modified, his motion to commit was agreed to.

The speaker laid before the house a communication from the secretary of the treasury, transmitting certain custom-house returns.

On motion of Mr. Cushman, laid on the table.

Also, a communication from the postmaster general containing statements of the postages received on paid and unpaid letters sent by express mail, from and to the cities of New York, Philadelphia, New Orleans, and Mobile.

On motion of Mr. Johnson, of La. laid on the table.

The business then in order was "the bill making appropriations for the continuation of the Cumberland road in the states of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois."

The question was on concurring with the committee of the whole on the amendment making an appropriation for guard fences east of the Ohio, and the improvement of the Laurel Hill descent, and that pending was the motion of Mr. Underwood to recommit the bill to the committee of ways and means, with instructions to report in lieu thereof a bill to cease said road to the states respectively, through which it passes.

Mr. Underwood expressed a wish to postpone the bill, on the ground of getting a response to a call for certain information respecting it. Mr. Mason of Ohio warmly opposed the suggestion as an indirect mode of killing the bill. There could be nothing wanting in the way of information. Mr. Underwood wanted some information as to the cost per mile up to this time. Mr. Mason informed the gentleman that he would find that information in a document printed at the first session of the last congress. Mr. Boon also insisted that the motion to postpone the bill for further information was only another mode of killing the bill, and with a view to test the sense of the house, he demanded the previous question.

On taking the second, by tellers, there was a tie, yeas 64, noes 64, but the speaker voting in the affirmative, it prevailed—yeas 65, noes 64, and the main question was ordered without a division.

Mr. Montgomery asked for the yeas and nays thereon; which were ordered. Mr. Wise moved a call of the house. Mr. Briggs remarked that the motion was not in order at that stage, and the Chair so ruled. The question was then taken: but, before the vote was announced,

Mr. Elmore appeared in his place, and asked leave to record his vote, stating that he was in attendance on a select committee, by leave of the house, when the vote was taken. Objection being made, Mr. E. moved a suspension of the rule; which was agreed to—113 to 43. Mr. Elmore's name was then called; and that gentleman having responded, Mr. Bell rose and inquired if the gentleman's vote varied the vote of the house? The Chair could not answer the question, as the vote had been cast up. Mr. Bell protested against this practice of allowing gentlemen to vote by a mere suspension of the rules, instead of by unanimous consent—a practice which had grown up within the last two or three years, and was not known previously in the ten years of which he had been a member. He raised the point as one of order. The Chair decided the practice to be in order. Mr. Bell took an appeal, and the house affirmed the decision of the chair.—yeas 97, noes 56. Mr. Mercer then moved a reconsideration of the vote by which the house had suspended the rule to allow Mr. Elmore, to vote; but the motion was rejected—yeas 74, noes 89. The vote on the engrossment of the bill was then announced as follows—yeas 96, nays 99. So the bill was rejected. Mr. Everett then moved a reconsideration of the last vote. Mr. Briggs moved a call of the house. Mr. Dromgoole inquired if a motion to lay the motion to reconsider on the table would be in order? The Chair replied that it would, but not pending the motion for a call of the house. The call was then ordered, and proceeded in for some time; and 203 members having answered to their names, Mr. Pettrien moved that all further proceedings in the call be dispensed with; which was agreed to—yeas 96, noes 71. Mr. Dromgoole then moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table. Mr. Briggs called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 85, nays 112. So the motion to lay on the table was decided in the negative, and the question recurring upon reconsidering the vote by which the bill was rejected, Mr. Rencher asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 110, nays 87. So the house determined to reconsider the vote. Mr. McKenna then moved the previous question on the engrossment of the bill, but the house refused to second it—yeas 70, nays 79. Mr. Haynes briefly opposed the bill. The debate was further continued by Messrs. C. H. Williams, of Tennessee, and Graves, of Kentucky, in opposition to the bill, and by Mr. Southgate, in its support. Mr. Underwood then renewed his motion to recommit the bill to the committee of ways and means, with instructions to report a bill surrendering the road to the respective states through which it passed; and, having spoke a short time in support of his motion, and in opposition to the bill,

On his motion,

The house adjourned.

THURSDAY'S PROCEEDINGS.

In senate, April 19. The Vice President presented a communication from the secretary of the treasury, in pursuance of a senate resolution of the 8th instant with copies of three reports from the president of the United States Bank of Pennsylvania, made at the commencement of the months of February, March, and April, respectively. Laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

After the presentation of a number of memorials, &c., the joint resolution for the adjournment of congress on the first Monday in June, coming up on its third reading—

Mr. Grundy said he thought the senate were acting too hastily on this subject. Perhaps there had been no period of the government when more important business was before congress than at this time; and if this resolution should be passed, the subject would then be beyond the control of congress. The better way, he thought, was, not to decide the question at this early day, because they could not now tell when the business would be done; but when the main part of the business should have been completed, they would know better how to decide. He would, therefore, move that the subject be postponed till Monday next.

Mr. Preston hoped the consideration of the resolution would not be postponed. It seemed desirable that the resolution should be passed in order to hasten the progress of the business in congress; and looking at the business of the senate, they would undoubtedly be ready to adjourn on the day specified in the resolution; and it was desirable that they should intimate to the other house the state of business here. The whole business of the country, if entered into, might require more time: but it would, in that case, be competent in congress to alter the time. Early in the session the senate had acted on its most important business, and after their great financial measure had been perfected by the senate according to their wishes, they had sent it to the other house, and it was well known that the house had rejected it. Congress had met at the extra session for the express purpose of regulating the finances. At that session, and at this, the senate and the house had both acted on the subject, and it was not known that any further action was now proposed in either house; and Mr. P. did not know that it was the duty of the senate to wait the action of the house on this important matter.

Mr. Grundy said he had not moved the postponement of the resolution with any reference to that measure.

Mr. Preston resumed: The subject, he said, naturally forced itself on their consideration; and if congress were not to act further on the finances, was there the slightest reason why they might not be ready to adjourn by the time specified? But if other measures on the finances were to be proposed and acted upon, Mr. P. would be very glad to be informed, and, if such were the fact, he would be willing to accede to any time that might be required. Congress had now been more than four months in session, and no measure of relief for the country or for the government had been provided, and they had the right to complain that they were not informed whether any thing further was likely to be proposed. If there was to be any thing, they ought to be informed, and, if not, they ought to adjourn; and whether there was or not, ought not to be determined by any talk or rumor out of doors, but by express action in one or the other body. The sub-treasury bill, it was well known, was dead and buried. If there were to be any new schemes or projects offered, Mr. P. was ready for them, and would like to see them.

Mr. Wright said he had contented himself yesterday with a silent vote to lay the resolution on the table, and he would not now enter into any political considerations connected with the subject; but he would notice some very important measures on which the senate had acted and had sent to the other house, who had not yet acted upon them. Of these he enumerated the bill in reference to the currency, on which the senate had consumed two months, the bill to increase the army, the bill granting pre-emption to settlers on the public lands, the bill graduating and reducing the price of the public lands. In regard to the treasury bill being dead and buried, that might be the opinion of the majority of the two houses; but Mr. W. did not think so. That measure, in any shape, had occupied the attention of the house only two weeks; and, supposing a majority of the house were opposed to the views of the executive, were they consequently opposed to act at all on the subject? If they were not, they would want time for action; and Mr. W. hoped and believed that they would feel it their imperative duty to act on the subject, and that they would act. No provision had been made for the southern Indian war in either house, and it was expected that there would be a debate for weeks in the other house on that subject alone.

Mr. Calhoun said that when he voted yesterday for the resolution, he did it on the ground that there would be ample time for the senate to finish its business. But if it were regarded as a measure to prevent action in the other house on the subject of the treasury bill, because it was considered dead, Mr. C. would not vote for it. He did not consider that as dead; but he believed that the other house would feel it an imperative duty to act on that measure, yea or nay; and if this resolution was to take from the other house the responsibility of doing so, Mr. C. would not vote for it, but move to lay it on the table. He thought there would be no such other calamity as for congress to rise without action on that great question.

Mr. King took a similar view of the subject, and said that from the remarks of Mr. Preston he was induced to regard the resolution in a new aspect; and if it was likely to give the other house an opportunity to evade the financial question, without acting upon it definitely, Mr. K. would vote against his own resolution.

Mr. Hubbard also spoke, briefly, in favor of delay, and of keeping the resolution still before the senate, so that when the proper time should come they might take it up, and pass it as it was, or modified according to circumstances.

Mr. Preston wholly disavowed any such design as had been intimated. His whole object was to put the subject in the possession of the other house, so that they might adopt the resolution or modify it to suit themselves; and he was surprised that the senator from Alabama should now reject his own offering because Mr. P. had patted in on the head, and said that notwithstanding its paternity it was a clever child. Mr. P. had often felt his own weakness, when he addressed the senate, and saw that he was unable to make any impression on gentlemen of the opposite side; but now, by advocating a measure, agreeable to them, he had rendered his remarks effective, and had turned the friends of the resolution directly against it. But the purpose of enabling the minority to worry out the majority in the other house was not in Mr. P.'s mind, and, if it had been, he would have been acting against himself, for the majority in the other house were his political friends on this question. He insisted, further, that the sub-treasury was dead, and no human power could call it from the tomb, where it had lain more than four days.

The resolution was now postponed to Monday week, by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lyon, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Roane, Robinson, Smith, of Connecticut, Tipton, Trotter, Walker, Wall, Williams, Wright, Young—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Buchanan, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Lumpkin, McKean, Merrick, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Smith, of Indiana, Southard, Swift, White—16.

On motion of Mr. Wall, the senate proceeded again to consider the bill to prohibit the issuing and circulation of the notes of the late United States Bank.

Mr. Niles moved to modify the bill so as to make the time of confinement in the penitentiary from one to five years, instead of from five to ten. Mr. Calhoun moved to strike out the whole penitentiary provision. Mr. Grundy, after a remark or two, understood to be unfavorable to this motion, said he felt no particular interest about it. Mr. Smith, of Connecticut, and Mr. Niles spoke briefly, but strongly, in favor of retaining the penitentiary penalty. Mr. S. urging that a fine of $10,000 would amount to nothing in a case in which the profits were hundreds of thousands.

Mr. Niles and Mr. Calhoun temporarily withdrew their amendments, with a view to give way to the general debate.

Mr. Wall then spoke at some length in favor of the bill, and in vindication of the constitutional power of congress to pass it.

Mr. Niles' proposition to make the penitentiary term from one to five years, was again offered by him, and agreed to.

After a brief explanatory conversation by Messrs. Crittenden, Wall, Grundy, and Ruggles.

The bill was modified so as to confine the penalty more explicitly to directors, trustees, agents, and other officers, and the agents of the trustees of the late bank of the United States, as before designed to be provided for in the bill.

The bill was further discussed by Messrs. Preston, Prentiss, Smith, of Connecticut, Wall and Niles; and on a request of Mr. Rives for farther time to consider the subject before taking the vote.

The senate held an executive session, and then adjourned.

In the house, Thursday, April 19. After a number of reports, chiefly on private claims, had been received, the house passed to the unfinished business of yesterday morning, being Mr. Hopkins' resolution for divorcing the government from the public press.

Mr. Wise rose and said, that since the publication in the papers of the amendment yesterday moved by his colleague, (Mr. Dringcole,) to the amendment of his other colleague, (Mr. Hopkins,) he perceived, what he did not know yesterday, that it referred to the expenses of the two investigating committees which had been instituted at the last session. He then proceeded to comment at considerable length on this point in the amendment, vindicating the appointment of those committees, inviting investigation as to their expense, and insisting that the good they had effected overbalanced, by far, what they had cost the country.

Mr. Dringcole replied; disclaimed all intention to reflect on those committees, or their appointment; but said that his amendment was mainly directed to the additional expense occasioned by the exercise of the power of sending for persons and papers. He then went into an explanation and defence of the several items in his amendment.

Mr. Garland, of Virginia, obtained the floor, and then the morning hour expired.

A communication was received from the acting secretary of war, enclosing a report from the commissioner of Indian affairs, in answer to a resolution of the house of the 26th ultimo, relative to the destruction of property of the late gen. Nathaniel Taylor, by the Cherokee Indians.

Also, a communication from the acting secretary of war, enclosing the memorial of inhabitants of Knightstown, in the state of Indiana, praying congress to provide for the construction of a bridge across Blue river, at that place, with the report of the chief engineer thereon; which memorial was referred to this department on the 17th of February last.

Also, a communication from the secretary of the treasury, transmitting a portion of the information called for by the house on the 9th of April instant, in relation to the amount of revenue received in each state in the year 1836, and the amount expended during the same year.

Mr. Everett inquired of Mr. Cambreleng when it was his purpose to call up the bill making appropriations for the Seminole war. Mr. Cambreleng replied that as soon as the house should have disposed of the bill for the issue of treasury notes, he should call up the Seminole bill. Mr. Everett then asked leave to move that the resolution offered by him on Saturday last, calling for information as to the amount of arrears due on that war, and an estimate of its probable expenses up to the 1st of June next. Mr. Cushman objected; whereupon, Mr. Everett moved a suspension of the rules for that purpose, and demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

The yeas and nays were taken accordingly, and resulted as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Alexander, Heman Allen, John W. Allen, Bell, Bond, Borden, Briggs, Bynum, W. B. Calhoun, John Calhoun, Cambreleng, W. B. Campbell, John Campbell, W. B. Carter, Chambers, Cheatham, Clowney, Coffin, Corwin, Cranston, Curtis, Cushing, Darlington, Dawson, Davies, Deberry, De Graff, Dunn, Everett, Ewing, R. Fletcher, Fillmore, Rice Garland, Glascock, James Graham, Wm. Graham, Graves, Griffin, Halsted, Harlan, Harper, Hastings, Hawes, Haynes, Henry, Herod, Howard, R. M. T. Hunter, Ingham, Jabez Jackson, Lincoln, Loomis, Lyon, Mulloy, Marvin, S. Mason, Maury, May, Maxwell, McKennan, Mercer, Milligan, Mitchell, Calvary Morris, Murray, Naylor, Noyes, Ogle, Patterson, Pearce, Peck, Pope, Potts, Randolph, Reed, Rencher, Ridgway, Robertson, Ramsey, Russell, A. H. Shepherd, Shields, Sibly, Snyder, Southgate, Sanly, Stone, Stratton, Talaferro, Tillinghast, Toland, Underwood, A. S. White, John White, E. Whitesey, L. Williams, S. Williams, J. L. Williams, C. H. Williams, Yorke—101.

NAYS—Messrs. Andrews, Atherton, Beatty, Beirne, Bicknell, Birdsall, Boon, Bouldin, Broadhead, Bronson, Casey, Chapin, Cyles, Connor, Craig, Cray, Cushman, Dringcole, Edwards, Farrington, Fairfield, Fry, Gray, Haley, Hamer, Harrison, Hawkins, Thomas B. Jackson, J. Jackson, N. Jones, J. W. Jones, Keim, Kingensmith, Lawler, Leadbetter, Logan, J. M. Mason, Martin, R. M. McClellan, A. McClellan, Montgomery, Morgan, Samuel W. Morris, Noble, Owens, Palmer, Parmenter, Paynter, Pennybacker, Pettkin, Phelps, Pickens, Prentiss, Rhett, Richardson, Sawyer, Shaffer, C. Shepard, Spencer, Stuart, Taylor, Titus, Towns, Turney, Vandever, Webster, Weeks, J. W. Williams, Worthington, Yell—70.

There not being two-thirds in the affirmative, the motion to suspend the rules was lost, and Mr. Everett's call for information was not allowed to be moved.

Mr. Lincoln moved that the house go into committee of the whole on the bill respecting the new treasury building; but the motion was objected to, and the house refused to suspend the rules for the purpose. So the motion was rejected.

The house then passed to the unfinished business of yesterday, and resumed the consideration of the Cumberland road bill.

Mr. Underwood, who had the floor at the adjournment, resumed and concluded his speech against the bill, and in favor of his amendment to recommit. Mr. Cushing, of Massachusetts, went into an extended argument in reply, and in defence of the bill. Mr. Rhett, of South Carolina, spoke with great ardor in opposition to the measure, and was followed by Mr. Calhoun, of Kentucky, as decidedly in its favor. Mr. Clowney obtained the floor, but yielded it, for the purpose of an explanation, to Mr. Underwood, who was proceeding to answer his colleague, (Mr. Calhoun,) when, alluding to an amendment proposed by himself to the constitution, and glancing at the subject of slavery—

He was arrested by the chair. He asked leave to proceed; but the chair still insisting on the rule of order, he appealed to the house. The yeas for his proceeding were 94. But, before the yeas were counted, the chair also appealed to the house to support its rules. Some confusion arose, when,

On motion of Mr. Clowney, the house adjourned.

MISCELLANEOUS.

From Mexico. The New Orleans Transcript of the 11th inst. says:

"Two French brigs of war visited Matamoras on the 24th ult. and sent a deputation up to the town to assure the French citizens of the protection of their government, and that if the Mexican government should not comply satisfactorily, by the 25th instant, with requisitions already made, the ports of the republic will be blockaded. One thousand of the Mexican troops, under Canaliz, were about to leave the place, —destination unknown.

Specie by wholesale. We learn that arrangements have been made by the Bank of England, in connection with Messrs. Baring, Brothers & co., and Mr. James G. King, of this city, to send out to the address of Messrs. Prime, Ward & King, one million sterling in specie. Two hundred thousand pounds have arrived by the Sheridan and Columbus, and the residue will be here by the packets in succession. £100,000 by each.

[Four Com.]

The whole amount of specie received at New York, in the last few days, is estimated at nearly two millions of dollars, viz: 303,822 sovereigns, 29,000 dollars, and 2,896,923 francs.

It is stated that this large sum is sent out to New York with a view to aid the banks in resuming. The American adds:

"It is estimated, by those who have good means of knowing, that ten millions of dollars will be imported before June 1st, and that, without reducing the amount of bullion in the Bank of England below ten million pounds sterling—as the tendency of gold was constant from the continent to England."

From the New York Express.

A notice was put up in front of Prime, Ward & King's office this morning, that arrangements had been made by the Bank of England and Baring, Brothers & co., through the agency of Messrs. Prime and their partner, Mr. James G. King, now in London, to import one million of pounds sterling in specie, to enable our banks to resume specie payments; of this sum, 500,000 dollars have arrived since Saturday. The notice has excited quite a sensation in the street. Enquiries are now made how this has been obtained; what banks are particularly interested; and how have funds been placed in London to pay; all these points are important, if the specie is really going into the vaults of the banks to enable them to resume.

The New York Gazette states that it is surmised that the object of the Bank of England in sending this large remittance of specie to this country, is for the purpose of establishing an agency in New York, as an offset to that of the United States Bank in London, and of which the Bank of England is particularly jealous.

In New York on Friday 13th inst., Philadelphia bank notes were selling at five per cent. discount. Bills on Baltimore six per cent. discount; on Mississippi thirty-five; on Alabama, twenty-five.

Canada. We learn from the Toronto Colonist of the 12th inst. that on that day at 8 o'clock, A. M. Samuel Lount and Peter Matthews were executed in pursuance of their sentence, for high treason.—They walked with a firm step to the scaffold, and after an impressive prayer by the Rev. Mr. Richardson, they were launched into eternity. An immense concourse of people were present, by whom the greatest order was observed. The square in rear of the goal, on which the scaffold was erected was surrounded by the volunteer corps of provincial militia, now stationed in Toronto.

A correspondent of the Albany Evening Journal says, that petitions had been sent to gov. Arthur for mercy, or even an extension, signed by some three thousand citizens of Toronto and its vicinity; the executive council had been called together, but naught availed to stay execution. The bodies, notwithstanding the earnest application of their wives and friends, were delivered up for dissection. The affair is said to have created much excitement.

It is stated that Theller, Montgomery, Anderson, and G. F. Warlen are to be executed on the 24th inst.

Sentence of death was pronounced at Hamilton in the Gore district, upon Horatio Hill, Stephen Smith, Charles P. Waldrath, Ephraim Cook, John Trufford, Nathan Town, and Peter Malcolm—day of execution the 20th instant.

Also, upon William Webb and John Hamill—execution to take place on the 22d instant.

The Toronto Guardian states that Theller founded his defence chiefly on the assertion that he was an American citizen, which was overruled on the ground that he was born a British subject, and could not divest himself of his allegiance.

The same paper says that the case of Sutherland remained undecided on the 11th; and intimates doubt of the rumors put forth about his extraordinary disclosures.

In passing sentence upon Peter Malcolm, the court informed him that for reasons assigned his case would be favorably represented to the executive.

¶ We have inadvertently copied from the "Globe" the report of the majority of the committee appointed to investigate the causes of the late duel, under an impression that we would have been able to have accompanied it with the reports presented by Messrs. Grennell and Elmore, and the final action of the house upon the subject. This not being the case, it becomes necessary, in order to avoid the imputation of concurrence with the majority, to say, that the report has not been adopted—that it has not even been printed by order of the house, and that the whole matter is still under consideration.

It is not often that, even through inadvertence, we have presented a one-sided view of a question, and would have avoided it in the present instance, if we could have done so without greatly delaying the appearance of the present sheet. We will, of course, publish the other reports as soon as they are directed to be published, and give such parts of the testimony and the debate as shall do full justice to all the parties concerned.

¶ Great rejoicing has taken place in New York in consequence of the arrival at that place of the steam packets Sirus and Great Western, from England, in very quick passages. Among other demonstrations of pleasure, was a splendid dinner to the commanders by the corporation; but we are so much pressed for room that we must postpone an account of all that occurred on the occasion until our next.

CONGRESSIONAL ELECTION. On Wednesday last an election was held in the congressional district composed of the cities of Baltimore and Annapolis, and Anne Arundel county, to fill the vacancy occasioned by the death of Mr. McKim, which resulted in favor of John P. BANKS, CURRENCY, &c. The New York Commercial Advertiser of Monday afternoon says—

"Some of the banks of this city commenced paying out their notes on Friday and Saturday last. This morning they are doing so very generally, and although the resolution for a resumption of specie payments is not yet formally in force, still specie can be obtained, if wanted, from any of them. The banks have all resolved to resume on the 9th of May, and we rather suspect that they intend to do so on Monday next, albeit not authorized thus to speak."

The same paper of Wednesday afternoon has the following:

New custom house order. We understand that instructions were received this morning, authorizing the collector of customs in this city to receive all the notes of the city banks, of those who do not issue paper of a less denomination than five dollars. The fifth section of a recent law prevents the receipt of such notes. The banks in this city which have not availed themselves of the late law of this state are the Manhattan, Bank of America, and the Bank of the State of New York.

The Express of Wednesday says—
The Mechanics', the Merchants', the New York, the Commercial and the State Banks, have come forward and pay out their notes freely for every check presented, and pay any demand on them for specie with great cheerfulness. We are told also, that they are liberal in their discounts. Several of the other banks do not pay out their bills, which is to be regretted, as the community are suffering beyond all reason for the want of a circulating medium. Many of the banks have not a dollar in circulation, or that can be got hold of. Thus for months and months the citizens of New York have not seen a dollar of our own bank notes. Every bill has been, as fast as it has reached the bank, clutched with eagerness, not again to be put in circulation. Many of the banks have not only hoarded up their own bills, but have in their possession large amounts of their neighbor's bank notes. But now the banks, if they have any real wish, as they must have to make money plenty, must come out at once, and not only issue their notes, but discount freely, so as to relieve the community. The instant money becomes plenty there will be but little call for specie.

The bills of all the city banks of New York are now received at that post office for postage.

The New York Journal of Commerce, of Monday, second edition, says, "The banks have all resumed specie payments in the broadest extent, bills, deposits and all; and more than that, they pay out their own notes only."

It is also stated in the Journal of Commerce that a loan of a million of dollars has been negotiated in New York for Tennessee, within a few days, and one of $600,000 for Ohio.

We find the following in the New York Courier and Enquirer in relation to the Boston banks.

"We learn by gentlemen, passengers in yesterday's boat, from Boston, that a meeting of the officers of the banks of that city, held on Friday evening, it was resolved to redeem all their notes of the denomination of five dollars and under, and that the resolution was carried into effect on Saturday, the banks on that day paying specie for all their paper presented. Virtually, the resumption is considered entire, as it is understood that the banks will furnish any amount of specie for ordinary business purposes, and no demand for any other can be anticipated, at present."

Major John S. Gooch, agent of the Mississippi Union Bank, left Washington on Wednesday with the engravings and materials necessary for the bank. On his arrival, the state bonds will be executed for $5,000,000 and disposed of at once, and when the ten millions, in addition to this are subscribed, the state will issue its bonds for ten millions more, to be likewise disposed of.

Nashville, April 20, 4 P. M. Money matters grow worse. Mexico. The editors of the New York "Journal of Commerce" have received Vera Cruz papers to the 31st March, brought by the Pastora.

The Diario del Gobierno of the 26th, published at the Mexican capital says,—"At a quarter past 10 o'clock, this morning, the supreme government received the ultimatum announced by the French minister, Baron Deffandis, and this evening it will be communicated to congress. We will speak to-morrow, and will continue to speak in all our numbers on a topic of so great national interest, and which the government has managed, and without doubt will continue to manage, in a manner which shall satisfy the desire and expectations of the Mexicans."

By mercantile letters we learn that the French ultimatum contained the following hard terms, viz: that the Mexicans should pay $600,000 for claims, and $55,000 to the families of five Frenchmen who had been shot by order of the authorities, and that the government should cashier two judges at Mexico, one at Puebla; and Gomez, commandant at Tampico. If these terms were not complied with by the 15th of April, hostilities were to commence.

It was very sickly in the Mexican capital. Fever was one of the most prevalent diseases.

Efforts were made to raise the brig of war Libertador, which, during the gale in December last, was driven against the castle of Uloa, and sunk.

EXAMINATION OF MIDSHIPMEN. Navy Department, April 25, 1838. A board for the examination of midshipmen whose warrants bear date prior to the 1st day of January, 1838, will be convened at Baltimore on Monday, the 28th of May next.

It is expected that all midshipmen who may be entitled to examination under the regulation of the department, will attend at the above mentioned time and place, and report to commodore James Biddle, president of the board.

THE CHEROKEES. The Nashville Whig states that in ordering gen. Scott to the Cherokee country, the secretary of war directed him to call upon the executive of the states of Tennessee, North Carolina, and Georgia, in the event that he should require an additional force in carrying out the treaty. The department has given notice to governor Cannon, of Tennessee, that such a call may be made, with a request that it may be responded to by his excellency. The governor has replied, by letter, with his accustomed promptness, that the state will be prepared to meet the requisitions.

GOVERNOR MARCY'S SPECIAL MESSAGE.

To the senate and assembly:

FELLOW-CITIZENS: The time is not far distant when the banks of this state will resume specie payments; and it can now be anticipated with tolerable certainty, what will be the situation of things when this event shall take place. The period of resumption has been looked for with much anxiety, and strong hopes have been indulged that it would be attended with a highly important improvement in the business concerns of the country.

Since the general suspension of specie payments in the month of May last, the banks which have furnished their monthly statements to the commissioners have made commendable efforts to put themselves in a condition to resume. On the first of June last, their liabilities amounted to about sixty-four millions of dollars, while the debt due to them for loans and discounts exceeded sixty-seven millions. From that period to the present time, a course of rapid curtailment has been steadily pursued, so that their liabilities on the first of the present month were but fifty-three millions, and their loans and discounts were less than fifty-six millions. By this process of reduction, the condition of our banks has been greatly improved, and their ability to meet and sustain specie payments, is now fully equal to what it has been at any former period. This remark is particularly applicable to the banks in the city of New York, where, amidst a general depression of business, the most rigorous and praiseworthy efforts have been put forth to prepare for an early and successful resumption. The institutions in that city have, during the suspension of specie payments, reduced their liabilities more than six and a half millions of dollars. Their specie during the same period has increased from about $1,800,000, to more than $3,500,000, to which, in estimating their ability to meet their engagements, should be added about one million and a half of dollars purchased and ordered from abroad, and expected to arrive early in the ensuing month. The banks throughout the state which have made reports to the commissioners, have reduced their liabilities more than eleven millions of dollars, their loans and discounts about the same amount, and their circulation from about nine millions of dollars to about four millions.

The banking institutions of this state are therefore in the best condition for a return to the payment of specie, and appear to be determined, as they certainly should be, that no effort on their part shall be wanting to place the state and its business interests in the most desirable position.

The reduction of discounts, the contraction of circulation, and the means employed to procure a supply of specie—all rendered necessary in preparing for resumption—have borne heavily upon almost all classes of our citizens, and been particularly injurious to those branches of business which required the use of large capitals, or depended upon credit for success.

Owing to causes alluded to in my message at the opening of the present session, our constituents in all parts of the state shared largely in the distresses which preceded and immediately followed the suspension of specie payments. Such was the case in an especial manner with the citizens of our great commercial emporium. The loss of about fifteen millions of capital by the fire of December, 1835—the interruption of business by the unparalleled commercial revulsion which soon followed that disastrous event—the sudden withdrawal from deposit, in the midst of all this depression, of ten millions of public money—all having occurred within the space of about twenty-seven months, co-operate with other considerations to induce the legislature to extend its aid in an efficient manner, if it should become necessary, to shield our institutions from threatened hostility, and thereby to protect and foster the general interests of the people. It is also proper to remark, that about three millions of the amount of deposits withdrawn from the banks in the city of New York, were apportioned to the several counties and towns in the state, and loaned to the citizens thereof under the law of the last session in relation to the surplus moneys belonging to the United States.

There is also another feature in the case presented by the depressed state of business in the city of New York, which should not pass without observation. A large portion of the trade of that city is transacted with distant sections of the union. The causes which have operated so extensively to derange the general currency of the country, have produced the most serious effects in the states south and west. There is reason to believe that the banks in that vast and important region, have not been influenced in an equal degree by the considerations which have controlled our institutions and brought them into a sound condition; but that, on the contrary, they have so far extended their issues of paper as materially to diminish its value and render it of little use as a medium for the collection of debts due to our citizens. The losses by the course of domestic exchanges, consequent upon the great depreciation in the value of southern and western bank paper, have added to the embarrassments of our merchants, and greatly impaired the resources.

Although the suspension, owing to various causes, has operated much more severely in some places than in others, it must be regarded as a common calamity, and its continuance cannot be otherwise than injurious to all sections of the country; it is therefore to be regretted that all sections have not felt an equal solicitude for the restoration of our currency to a sound condition, and adopted measures equally vigorous for producing so desirable a result. Such, however, has not been the course of proceeding on the part of all. Indeed, it is now no longer a matter of doubt that the movement here, in relation to resuming payments in specie, must be made without the co-operation of any other state.

I have not been able to discover any adequate reason why the banks in some of the other states, and particularly in the Atlantic cities, could not have been in as favorable a condition to resume as our own. The main causes which led to the suspension have for some time ceased to operate, and others of an opposite tendency are exerting a beneficial influence in restoring the currency to a healthy state. The commercial debt abroad, which was large at the period of suspension, and the pressing demand for which was one of the principal causes of that calamity, is now mostly paid off or arranged; foreign exchanges are decidedly in our favor; the precious metals instead of being in demand for exportation, are coming into the country in great abundance from every quarter.

In a state of things so favorable to a general resumption, it can scarcely be doubted that with proper preparatory measures the banks in most parts of the union, if they had been in concert, or with reference to the general prosperity of the country, might have been in a situation to resume specie payments as early as the period fixed on for that purpose by the banks of this state. It is not to be denied that these preparatory measures, whenever resorted to, must lead to a temporary increase of embarrassments in most branches of business. While one place or section of the country submits to the sacrifices which result from these unavoidable measures, for the purpose of removing the evils of a disordered currency, it was to be hoped that other parts of the union would not be so far misled by any narrow views of temporary and local interest, as to decline the like sacrifices and refuse a ready concurrence in a course of proceeding so essential to the general prosperity.

For the purposes of this communication, it is not important to determine the cause or the motive that has influenced the conduct of those institutions which have refused to co-operate with ours in the measure of resumption. It is now reduced to a moral certainty that there will be no general movement on this subject, and that the banks of this state will enter into that measure without the co-operation—and I wish I could say they would be permitted to maintain themselves in it without the open or covert hostility—of those which cannot or will not unite with them or immediately follow their example.

The suspension law of the last session expires on the 16th of May next, and the banks in the city of New York have determined to resume the payment of all demands against them in specie on the 10th of that month. The country banks of this state are prepared to take the same step at the same time, and all classes and interests, it is believed, are ready to aid those efforts by a generous confidence and approval. I do not doubt that our institutions will sustain themselves, whatever may be the course pursued by the banks in other states; but the effects of this measure upon the business concerns of the people of this state, will depend in a great degree upon the relation in which our banks will be placed in reference to those in other parts of the union; and in an especial manner to those in the neighboring Atlantic cities. If all, or nearly all the banks in the principal commercial places had resolved, as it was anticipated a short time since they would do, to resume at about the same period, and had entered upon that course earnestly, in good faith, and with kindly feelings towards each other, they would have met with few difficulties; they might probably have expected mutual forbearance in any emergency—and certainly would have had no cause to fear hostility from any source whatever. Vigorous and united efforts among themselves would have accelerated the return of public confidence, and with it they would have been at once in a condition to dispense those accommodations which a wholesome state of business requires.

Until very recently, it was generally expected that such would be the course of events. It was confidently believed that the period of general resumption, at least throughout the eastern, middle, and some of the western states, was at hand; that it would be the beginning of an auspicious change in our pecuniary affairs; that the gloom which had so long been gathering and thickening over the land would thereafter gradually disappear, and we should be cheered by a season of wondrous prosperity.

I regret that it becomes my duty to announce to you that these pleasing anticipations are not likely to be realized, and to exhibit to you a much less inviting prospect—a prospect in which our banks will not only have to commence without co-operation in the resumption of specie payments, but will, for some time at least, have to stand alone, and struggle not only with the inevitable difficulties of such a measure, but with others, perhaps, superadded to them, arising from the condition, and possibly from the hostility of non-specie paying banks in other states.

Surrounded on all sides, as we shall be, by banks emitting irredeemable paper, it is not perhaps uncharitable to indulge a fear that they may consult their own interest by making efforts to embarrass and circumscribe the operations of our institutions with a view of securing to themselves the benefits of an extensive circulation of their bills in this state. In this manner we may be deprived of a sufficient supply of a sound currency, and in our necessities be forced to use their depreciated paper and thereby minister to their interest while they are persisting, contrary to good policy and in violation of their own obligations, in holding themselves in an irredeemable state. But assuming, as it is proper perhaps that we should do, that the refusal of the banks of other states to unite with ours in resuming, is owing to a convention on their part that they are not in a condition to sustain themselves in that measure, they will undoubtedly avail themselves of the means which the resumption in this state will afford them, to recover from their weakness, and transfer to themselves the resources which our institutions have, at considerable expense, provided for their own security. Banks that persist in issuing an irredeemable currency will by the use of it be enabled to possess themselves of claims against such as have resumed, and by exacting specie and refusing to pay it in satisfaction of demands against themselves, they will be enabled to impair and eventually exhaust the resources of the latter institutions unless they circumscribe within narrow limits their accommodations to the public. Situated as our banks are in relation to those in the Atlantic cities which have announced their determination to continue the issue of an irredeemable currency—considering the amount of their capital and their immense resources and the probable consequences of a serious attempt by them confederated and co-operating in favor of the suspension policy, or even by the United States Bank of Pennsylvania alone, with a capital much larger than the aggregated capitals of all the banks in the city of New York—to withdraw the specie which has been collected by our institutions as a necessary preparatory step to resumption;—and looking to the deplorable effects which would result in the remote contingency of being obliged by the aggressions of the non-specie paying banks, or other untoward events, to suspend a second time; every consideration of prudence will induce our banks to proceed with the utmost circumspection and to confine their operations within perfectly safe limits.

If there were no other object to answer than the success of the attempt to resume, the subject would be presented to us in a much less imposing aspect, and interposition by the legislature might not be deemed necessary; but if the banks are to continue in their present contracted state after they have resumed, and particularly if the circumstances to which I have alluded, and others of an obvious character, are likely to require further contraction on their part, very few indeed of the benefits which have been anticipated from a return to specie payments will be realized. Though they discharge their obligations in the legal currency, if they continue to reduce their discounts, or if they do not gradually expand, the public will not be essentially relieved; the laboring classes will look in vain for their accustomed employment; most kinds of agricultural products will decline in price; our manufacturing establishments cannot be put in successful operation; various branches of mechanical business will be deprived of a wholesome degree of encouragement; trade will continue in its present depressed condition; the disorders of the currency will be but partially removed, and the immoral practices which spring from such disorders, will be but partially remedied.

It is confidently believed that the interposition of the credit of the state in case an emergency shall arise imperiously demanding a resort to such a measure, would give success to the efforts now making to correct the numerous evils which have arisen from the present deranged and vitiated state of our currency, and it appears to me that if such would be its effects, there should be no hesitation on the part of the legislature in applying the remedy. The benefits of such an interposition would be general, inasmuch as it would contribute in no inconsiderable degree to relieve almost all branches of business from depression, and all classes of our citizens from the inconveniences, inseparable from the use of an irredeemable and depreciated paper.

To avoid the creation of a new stock for the express purpose of being loaned to the banks for a long period, I recommend that the commissioners of the canal fund be authorized to issue stock, which it is now certain will become necessary within a few years, for the enlargement of the Erie canal, and the completion of the Black river and Genesee valley canals, and if the apprehended emergency should arise demanding its use, to loan it to the banks, requiring of them the most ample security for the punctual payment of the interest, and the reimbursement of the principal from time to time, as the money may be wanted in the progress of these works.

The amount necessary for the completion of these works, will exceed the sum which may be required, in any event to sustain our state institutions against hostile attacks from whatever quarter they may come, and to enable them to grant such assistance as will invigorate all branches of industry, call forth the energies of the state, and give an onward movement to its business concerns. Although intelligent merchants and bankers are of opinion that it will not probably be necessary to use the credit of the state, yet it may be otherwise, and the recent exposition of the views and policy of the Bank of the United States increases the apprehensions that a crisis will arise in which the credit of the state to some extent may be required. With a view of making ample provision for any such exigency, I respectfully recommend that authority should be given, in the manner suggested, to issue stock for the contemplated purpose to the amount of six or eight millions of dollars. This recommendation does not, it will be perceived, promise the creation of a stock, and eventually, if need be, the raising of money expressly for sustaining the banks in the measure of resumption and retrieving from their present depression the business concerns of the people, but it suggests for these highly important purposes, that the moneys which it is known will be required for the public works already authorized by law, should be raised a short time before they are wanted for expenditure. It is by no means certain that it will be necessary to use the power hereby recommended to be invested in the commissioners of the canal fund, but the consequences which would result to the state at large in case the contingency which might require its exercise should happen would be so extremely injurious, that I deem it expedient that the measure herein suggested, or some one of a similar character, should be adopted.

A new interest is, in my opinion, given to the subject I have presented, and much force is added to the considerations in favor of the measure I have recommended, by the course of conduct which it is the avowed intention of the United States Bank of Philadelphia to pursue in relation to the resumption. Had the determination to oppose a return to specie payments, and the bold avowal of the policy of maintaining irredeemable issues, come from any other quarter, they would have caused much less surprise and regret. This institution has a capital of thirty-five millions of dollars, and possesses by the terms of its charter, much more than ordinary banking powers and privileges—it has its agencies and long established business connexions in almost every state in the union—it enjoys an extensive credit, not only in this country, but in Europe; and its resources derived from this consideration alone, are immense, it most confidently relies, as appears by the language of its president, upon the subserenity of the banks of all the states except New York, in falling into its views and co-operating with it in carrying them into effect. When this formidable power,—I believe I am warranted in saying this formidable combination of powers,—is arrayed against the measure of resuming specie payments, and has become the open champion of the suspension policy, and the advocate of an irredeemable currency—when it is publicly announced by the president of the United States Bank—the central power, as it may be called, of a confederation of banking institutions—that the uncertain period of resumption must be delayed until the accomplishment of certain pecuniary operations and political objects which are distinctly shadowed forth in his letter,—there is very strong reason to fear that the banks of this state will not be permitted to pursue the course which they have resolved to take without encountering more than the intrinsic difficulties of the measure. I am confidently persuaded that a vast majority, if not almost the entire mass of our constituents, are opposed to, and will expect their representatives and public functionaries to resist, the policy put forth by the United States Bank, of continuing the issue of an irredeemable currency. In the division which will spring from the extraordinary position taken upon this subject, the people of this state, and its banking institutions will, I trust, be found among the friends and supporters of a sound currency—a currency equivalent in value, to the legal standard; and will be arrayed against the policy of continuing the issue of irredeemable paper. To carry out their views in relation to this subject, to sustain our institutions in the measure of resumption, and to put an end to the evils of a debased circulating medium, I cannot doubt that they will approve of the interposition by the legislature, in the manner I have suggested, or in any other more efficient manner that may be devised. Viewing this subject in reference to the present posture of our pecuniary affairs, to the embarrassment in which almost all branches of business are involved, and especially in reference to the attempt, by a formidable moneyed power, to prolong the suspension of specie payments beyond the period imposed by necessity, I believe the present crisis must be generally regarded as one in which it is “the duty of the state to stand forth in its strength, and by the use of its credit and the sanction of its name, to shield its institutions and its citizens from harm.” I am ready to co-operate with the other departments of the government in every proper effort that shall promise such a result.

EXECUTIVE CHAMBER,
Albany, April 12, 1838.

W. L. MARCY.

SYSTEM OF DEFENCE.

In the senate of the United States, April 10, 1838.

The resolution offered some time since by Mr. Davis, calling on the department for information to enable the senate to determine what fortifications might be diminished and dispensed with, and whether a system of defence, by the aid of steam batteries, would not be more economical and efficient than the present system, coming up for consideration.

Mr. Davis said he wished to offer a few words of explanation, though the resolutions spoke pretty distinctly for themselves. They looked to rather an important end, and he desired, therefore, to call to them, particularly, the attention of the senate and of the executive department of the government.

The government was now in want of funds, run around, as had been said by the senator from Missouri. It was too true that, notwithstanding there had lately been a great surplus, a treasury full to overflowing, at the last session a loan of $10,000,000 to the government had been provided for; and now, in the other house, a proposition had been brought forward for a loan of $10,000,000 more, which, in all, would make a loan to the government of $20,000,000 within the present year. This amount, a short time ago, would have been considered much more than enough for the annual uses of the government; but it seemed that it was now required in addition to the current revenue. Mr. D. however, alluded to these facts to show that the treasury and the revenue of the country were in an embarrassed condition, and that, too, when the country generally was at peace and free from a public debt. These resolutions were designed to call the attention of the executive department of the government to the defences of the Atlantic frontier, for the purpose of an examination, to ascertain what might be done in regard to them, in the way of economy as well as efficiency. When those fortifications were commenced, we had recently come out of a war with Great Britain, in which the Atlantic frontier had suffered much annoyance, commerce having been obstructed, and some small towns destroyed, and others menaced. It was, therefore, felt to be necessary to provide for the defence of that frontier; and it might be said that, feeling the evils of that war, they went rather to the opposite extreme in preparing for its defence, that it might not be found again in the same exposed condition. A board of engineers was appointed to examine the coast, and report to government an efficient system of defence, to be ready when another war should occur, which was not improbable. This board, with a distinguished French engineer at its head, reported a system of fortifications, extensive and sufficiently complete, though to say that it would afford entire protection would be untrue. The first class of fortifications were of stupendous dimensions, designed to protect the large towns and other important points that were most assailable. The subordinate classes were also on a scale proportionately large. Congress embraced this system, and proceeded to carry it into effect.

Mr. D. thought it was now important to look at it. Though it was doubtless best that the country should be well protected against invasion, he had at all times given his votes to sustain this system with some degree of reluctance, under the belief that it was an overgrown system. He had now before him the original estimate of the three classes of fortifications, and he found that the engineers estimated the whole cost at about $18,000,000. He had the curiosity also to look at the actual expenditures on those forts that were said to be completed, which were ten or twelve in number, and he found that their construction had cost just about twice as much as was originally estimated by the engineers. At that rate this system, when completed, would have cost at least $36,000,000; and then what followed? This would be the simple expense of construction alone; they must subsequently be armed, manned, and maintained.

Twenty years had now nearly elapsed since this process was commenced; and Mr. D. asked whether, during that time, there had not been changes in the country which demanded that we should look into the system, and see whether it ought not in justice to be modified. Mr. D. had now referred to steam as a means of defence. It was true that at the time when the system was adopted, steam, as a means of defence, was not unknown; it was experimented upon to some extent, but it was not so matured as to be very materially regarded in providing for the defence of this frontier. But inquiry into this subject, and the employment of steam in the civil marine, had now more fully developed its character, and shown that it could be employed as one of the most effective agents in the defence of the country. The question, therefore, arose, whether there ought not to be some modifications in the present system, and whether it might not be expedient to abandon some, and to diminish others of the existing and projected fortifications.

In saying this, Mr. D. by no means wished to lessen the efficiency of the defences of the country; but he desired that there should be no unnecessary expenditure of the public money; and, above all, he would not unnecessarily lay such foundations as would render it necessary or expedient to maintain a large standing army. The force necessary to man these fortifications was set down in these estimates at nearly 38,000 in time of war, and in time of peace at about 5,000; and it was well known that subjects of this sort were always presented to congress in the most favorable aspect; and therefore the 38,000 and 5,000 might be considered as the minimum numbers; and if the same rule should be applied as was found applicable to the expenditures, it would turn out that the numbers of men must be doubled. But at least, though Mr. D. did not pretend to accuracy in his own estimates on this subject, he knew full well that the 38,000 and 5,000 men were put down as the smallest numbers. He would not estimate the expense of maintaining these men, though he believed it was placed by the department at about $300 a year for each man. But it was not for that particularly that he objected to a standing army; and he meant in no way to disparage our troops in saying that a standing army was in its very nature uncongenial to our institutions. Its sympathies were of course with the government, and not with the people; it drew its support out of the treasury, and its sympathies would follow the power that directly maintained it. It would therefore be effectively in the hands of the government; and, whenever the government chose to turn it to its own purposes, it might turn it against the people themselves and the liberties of the country; and his having the power to do so made it a dangerous engine in the hands of the executive of a free government. The institution of the militia was of revolutionary origin; and, although it had been ridiculed, yet it must be regarded, by every cautious friend of republican principles, as the only safe force for a free people, because the citizen soldier was the only one that could be relied on for the support of liberty. On these accounts, especially, it was very desirable that the number of standing troops for the defence of the country should be as small as was possibly consistent with its safety.

Mr. D. had said in the outset that the treasury was embarrassed, and all admitted that it was so

There had been, long ago, a call for great economy, for limited expenditures, for a general reform; and yet had there been any sort of reform in the expenditures? And if there had been, where was it? The administration of Mr. Adams was denounced for its prodigality, for the great number of its officers, for its extravagant expenditures of money; and if all this could have been shown, Mr. D. would have gone into any company to correct the evil. But had the expenditures of the government been ever diminished, in any branch of public service? Had the number of its officers been ever reduced? Had a system of reform been carried out in any manner? If so, Mr. D. had never been aware of it. The blue book would show that the number of officers had, on the contrary, been greatly increased. Nor had their salaries been diminished. Mr. D. was not aware that the salary of one individual among them had been diminished for the last nine years; on the contrary, he knew, and every gentleman who heard him knew, that whenever the subject was touched at all in congress their salaries had been raised, and that in very many instances. There was, then, no great reform in all this. Mr. Adams's administration had expended about $12,000,000, annually, and in 1836-'7 the expenditure had risen to more than $30,000,000 a year.

Mr. D. was at an utter loss how to see where there had been any reform or retrenchment. He hoped for something from this matter, if such answers were made as he had reason to expect to the resolutions. He hoped for a saving in this branch of the expenditures, if the information came in season to be used when the appropriation bills should come under consideration.

Mr. D. proceeded to show, in detail, the great advantages that might be expected from the use of steam-batteries, especially in keeping the enemy's ships of war out of our bays and sounds, keeping our commerce open, and our towns and villages more free from danger and alarm. He urged, also, that Great Britain, by using them on her part, would ultimately compel us to use them, willing or not, which we might do with great comparative advantage, having the means and the materials at hand in all parts of the country, while their depots must be at Halifax and Bermuda. He insisted that it was high time for the government to enter into an inquiry on this subject with zeal and earnestness.

He said we all remembered how the population of Chesapeake bay were harassed, the shipping destroyed, the trade upon this great inland thoroughfare completely cut up, by British vessels that had possession of this highway, while we had no means of resisting their depredations. To obviate this, we had built two fortifications at an outlay of from three to four millions, to secure Hampton Roads, but these did not shut an enemy out of the bay. They only served as a place of refuge for our own vessels, and this was a great point gained. If we now added a small fleet of heavy armed steamers to the defence of this water, no vessel or vessels would dare enter it, whatever might be their force, for if they should be becalmed or come to anchor, or become incapable of being worked from any cause, they must be sacrificed to even a single battery, that choose its own position, and destroy them, while it would be little exposed to danger. The hazard, therefore, of entering bays and interior waters against such a force was so imminent that few would incur it, unless aided by steam. If, therefore, we relied more on this kind of defence and less on large fortifications, our internal trade would be left to its free, uninterrupted action, and we should enjoy all the vast benefits of it in time of war, and the inhabitants and their property would cease to be molested. This kind of force had at all times this great advantage; it could be suddenly concentrated and be brought to bear with all its power where emergencies called for it.

And in regard to Long Island sound, one end of it was closed in, with the exception of the narrow passage of East river, while the other was too wide open to be fortified; and what was the consequence? The British had entered the sound with their ships of war, and blockaded the whole adjacent coast, had confined the vessels in the ports, and stopped the intercourse, so that while flour could not be sold here and at Baltimore, in the east it brought $16, and could hardly be procured at all, because it had to be transported by land; whereas, if steam batteries had been used, the way would probably have been kept open. Mr. D. had little hesitation in saying that a few batteries of this sort would afford more effectual protection than any system of protection which could be employed. Fortifications were also necessary for the protection of these batteries themselves, and the defence of the important points of the country, but with the steam batteries they would be immensely more effective, so as to drive the enemy out of our waters, and force them to sea, where they could not live, except at a distance from the coast. This would be a great advantage, and give the greatest possible security to the country.

After some remarks from Mr. Benton the resolution was agreed to.

MR. WEBSTER'S SPEECH,

In answer to Mr. Calhoun—March 22, 1838.

On Thursday, the 22d of March, Mr. Calhoun delivered the speech which was published in our last, in answer to Mr. Webster's speech of March 12. When he had concluded, Mr. Webster immediately rose, and addressed the senate as follows:

MR. PRESIDENT: I came rather late to the senate this morning, and happening to meet a friend on the avenue, I was admonished by him to hasten my steps, as "the war was to be carried into Africa," and I was expected to be annihilated. I lost no time in following the advice, sir, since it would be awkward for one to be annihilated without knowing any thing about it.

Well, sir, the war has been brought into Africa. The honorable member has made an expedition into regions as distant from the subject of this debate as the orb of Jupiter is from that of our earth. He has spoken of the tariff, of slavery, and of the late war. Of all this I do not complain. On the contrary, if it be his pleasure to allude to all, or any of these topics, for any purpose whatever, I am ready at all times to hear him.

Sir, this carrying the war into Africa, which has become so common a phrase among us, is, indeed, imitating a great example; but it is an example which is not always followed by success. In the first place, sir, every man, though he be a man of talent and genius, is not a Scipio; and in the next place, as I recollect this part of Roman and Carthaginian history—the gentleman may be more accurate—but as I recollect it, when Scipio resolved upon carrying the war into Africa, Hannibal was not at home. Now, sir, I am very little like Hannibal, but I am at home; and when Scipio Africanus South Carolinensis brings the war into my territories, I shall not leave their defence to Asdrubal, nor Syphax, nor any body else. I meet him on the shore, at his landing, and propose but one contest,

"Concuritur;

"Aut cita mors, aut victoria laeta."

Mr. President, I had made up my mind that if the honorable gentleman should confine himself to a reply, in the ordinary way, I would not say another syllable. But he has done so. He has gone off into subjects quite remote from all connexion with revenue, commerce, finance, or sub-treasures, and invites to a discussion which, however uninteresting to the public at the present moment, is too personal to be declined by me.

He says, sir, that I had undertaken to compare my political character and conduct with his. Far from it. I attempted no such thing. I compared the gentleman's political opinions at different times, with one another, and expressed decided opposition to those which he now holds. And I did, certainly, advert to the general tone and drift of the gentleman's sentiments and expressions, for some years past, in their bearing on the union, with such remarks as I thought they deserved; but I instituted no comparison between him and myself. He may institute one, if he pleases, and when he pleases. Seeking nothing of this kind, I avoid nothing. Let it be remembered, that the gentleman began the debate by attempting to exhibit a contrast between the present opinions and conduct of my friends and myself, and our recent opinions and conduct. Here is the first charge of inconsistency; let the public judge whether he has made it good. He says, sir, that on several questions I have taken different sides, at different times; let him show it. If he shows any change of opinion, I shall be called on to give a reason, and to account for it. I leave it to the country to say whether, as yet, he has shown any such thing.

But, sir, before attempting that, he has something else to say. He had prepared, it seems, to draw comparisons himself. He had intended to say something, if time had allowed! Sir, time does allow—time must allow. A general remark of that kind ought not to be, cannot be, left to produce its effect, when that effect is obviously intended to be unfavorable. Why did the gentleman allude to my votes, or my opinions, respecting the war, at all, unless he had something to say? Does he wish to leave an undefined impression that something was done, or something said, by me, not now capable of defence or justification? something not reconcilable with true patriotism? He means that, or nothing. And now, sir, let him bring the matter forth; let him take the responsibility of the accusation: let him state his facts. I am here to answer: I am here, this day, to answer. Now is the time, and now the hour. I think we read, sir, that one of the good spirits would not bring against the arch-enemy of mankind a railing accusation; and what is railing, but general reproach—an imputation, without fact, time, or circumstance? Sir, I call for particulars. The gentleman knows my whole conduct well: indeed, the journals show it all, from the moment I came into congress till the peace. If I have done, then, sir, any thing unpatriotic—any thing which, as far as love to country goes, will not bear comparison with his, or any man's conduct—let it now be stated. Give me the fact, the time, the manner. He speaks of the war; that which we call the late war, though it is now twenty-five years since it terminated. He would leave an impression that I opposed it. How? I was not in congress when war was declared, nor in public life, anywhere, I was pursuing my profession, and keeping company with judges, sheriffs, and jurors, and plaintiffs and defendants. If I had been in congress, and had enjoyed the benefit of hearing the honorable gentleman's speeches, for all I can say, I might have concurred with him. But I was not in public life. I never had been, for a single hour; and was in no situation, therefore, to oppose or to support the declaration of war. I am speaking to the fact, sir; and if the gentleman, has any fact, let us know it.

Well, sir, I came into congress during the war, I found it waged, and raging. And what did I do here to oppose it? Look to the journals. Let the honorable gentleman tax his memory. Bring up any thing, if there be any thing to bring up—not showing error of opinion, but showing want of loyalty or fidelity to the country. I did not agree to all that was proposed, nor did the honorable gentleman. I did not approve of every measure, nor did he.

The war had been preceded by the restrictive system and the embargo. As a private individual, I certainly did not think well of these measures. It appeared to me the embargo annoyed us as much as our enemies, while it destroyed the business and cramped the spirits of the people.

In this opinion I may have been right or wrong, but the gentleman was himself of the same opinion. He told us, the other day, as a proof of his independence of party, on great questions, that he differed with his friends on the subject of the embargo. He was decidedly and unalterably opposed to it. It turns out, in his judgment, therefore, no imputation either on my patriotism, or the soundness of my political opinions, that I was opposed to it also. I mean opposed in opinion: for I was not in congress, and had nothing to do with the act creating the embargo. And as to opposition to measures for carrying on the war, after I came into congress, I again say, let the gentleman specify—let him lay his finger on any thing, calling for an answer, and he shall have an answer.

Mr. President, you were yourself in the house during a considerable part of this time. The honorable gentleman may make a witness of you. He may make a witness of any body else. He may be his own witness. Give us but some fact, some charge, something capable in itself either of being proved or disproved. Prove any thing, not consistent with honorable and patriotic conduct, and I am ready to answer it. Sir, I am glad this subject has been alluded to, in a manner which justifies me in taking public notice of it; because I am well aware that, for ten years past, infinite pains have been taken to find something, in the range of these topics, which might create prejudice against me in the country. The journals have all been pored over, and the reports ransacked, and scraps of paragraphs and half sentences have been collected, put together in the tamest manner, and then made to flare out, as if there had been some discovery. But all this failed. The next resort was to supposed correspondence. My letters were sought for, to learn if, in the confidence of private friendship, I had never said any thing which an enemy could make use of. With this view, the vicinity of my former residence has been searched, as with a lighted candle. New Hampshire has been explored, from the mouth of the Merrimack to the White Hills. In one instance a gentleman had left the state, gone five hundred miles off, and died. His papers were examined, a letter was found, and I have understood it was brought to Washington, a conclave was held to consider it, and the result was, that if there was not any else against Mr. Webster, the matter had better be kept alone. Sir, I hope to make every body of that opinion who brings against me a charge of want of patriotism. Errors of opinion can be found, doubtless, on many subjects; but as conduct flows from the feelings which animate the heart, I know that no act of my life has had its origin in the want of ardent love of country.

Sir, when I came to congress, I found the honorable gentleman a leading member of the house of representatives. Well, sir, in what did we differ? One of the first measures of magnitude, after I came here, was Mr. Dallas's proposition for a bank. It was a war measure. It was urged as being absolutely necessary to enable government to carry on the war. Government wanted revenue—such a bank it was hoped would furnish it and on that account it was warmly pressed and urged on congress. You remember all this, Mr. President. You remember how much some persons supposed the success of the war and the salvation of the country depended on carrying that measure. Yet the honorable member from South Carolina opposed this bill. He now takes to himself a good deal of merit—none too much, but still a good deal of merit, for having defeated it. Well, sir, I agreed with him. It was a mere paper bank—a mere machine for fabricating irredeemable paper. It was a new form for paper money; and, instead of benefiting the country, I thought it would plunge it deeper and deeper in difficulty. I made a speech on the subject; it has often been quoted. There it is; let whoever pleases read and examine it. I am not proud of it for any ability it exhibits; on the other hand, I am not ashamed of it, for the spirit which it manifests. But, sir, I say again, the gentleman himself took the lead against this measure—this darling measure of the administration. I followed him; if I was seduced into error, or into unjustifiable opposition, there sits my seducer.

What sir, were other leading sentiments, or leading measures of that day? On what other subjects did men differ? The gentleman has adverted to one, and that a most important one; I mean the navy. He says, and says truly, that at the commencement of the war the navy was unpopular. It was unpopular with his friends, who then controlled the politics of the country. But he says he differed with his friends; in this respect he resisted party influence and party connexion, and was the friend and advocate of the navy. Sir, I commend him for it. He showed his wisdom. That gallant little navy soon fought itself into favor, and showed that no man, who had placed reliance on it, had been disappointed.

Well, sir, in all this, I was exactly of the same opinion as the honorable gentleman.

Sir, I do not know when my opinion of the importance of a naval force to the United States had its origin. I can give no date to my sentiments on this subject, because I never entertained different sentiments. I remember, sir, that immediately after coming into my profession, at a period when the navy was most unpopular, when it was called by all sorts of hard names, and designated by many coarse epithets, on one of those occasions, on which young men address their neighbors, I ventured to put forth a boy's hand in defence of the navy. I insisted on its importance, its adaptation to our circumstances, and to our national character; and its indispensable necessity, if we intended to maintain and extend our commerce. These opinions and sentiments I brought into congress; and, so far as I remember, it was the first, or among the first times, in which I presumed to speak on the topics of the day, that I attempted to urge on the house a greater attention to the naval service. There were divers modes of prosecuting the war. On these modes, or on the degree of attention and expense which should be bestowed on each, different men held different opinions. I confess I looked with most hope to the results of naval warfare, and therefore I invoked government to invigorate and strengthen that arm of the national defence. I invoked it to seek its enemies upon the seas—to go where every auspicious indication pointed, and where the whole heart and soul of the country would go with it.

Sir, we were at war with the greatest maritime power on earth. England had gained an ascendancy on the seas over the whole combined powers of Europe. She had been at war twenty years. She had tried her fortunes on the continent, but generally with no success. At one time, the whole continent had been closed against her. A long line of armed exterior, an unbroken hostile array, frowned upon her from the gulf of Archangel, round the promontory of Spain and Portugal, to the foot of the boot of Italy. There was not a port which an English ship could enter. Every where on the land the genius of her great enemy had triumphed. He had defeated armies, crushed coalitions, and overturned thrones; but, like the fabled giant, he was unconquerable only while he touched the land. On the ocean, he was powerless. That field of fame was his adversary's, and her meteor flag was streaming in triumph all over it.

To her maritime ascendancy, England owed every thing, and we were now at war with her. One of the most charming of her poets has said of her, that "Her march is o'er the mountain wave,

"Her home is on the deep."

Now, sir, since we were at war with her, I was for intercepting this march; I was for calling upon her, and paying our respects to her at home; I was for giving her to know that we, too, had a right of way over the seas, and that our marine officers and our sailors were not entire strangers on the bosom of the deep; I was for doing something more with our navy, than to keep it on our shores, for the protection of our own coasts and our own harbors; I was for giving play to its gallant and burning spirit; for allowing it to go forth upon the seas, and to encounter, on an open and an equal field, whatever the proudest or the bravest of the enemy could bring against it. I knew the character of its officers, and the spirit of its seamen; and I knew that, in their hands, though the flag of the country might go down to the bottom, while they went with it, yet that it could never be disabed or disgraced.

Since she was our enemy—and a most powerful enemy—I was for touching her, if we could, in the very apple of her eye; for reaching the highest feather in her cap; for clutching at the very brightest jewel in her crown. There seemed to me to be a peculiar propriety in all this, as the war was undertaken for the redress of maritime injuries alone. It was a war declared for free trade and sailors' rights. The ocean, therefore, was the proper theatre for deciding this controversy with our enemy, and on that theatre my ardent wish was, that our own power should be concentrated to the utmost.

So much, sir, for the war, and for my conduct and opinions as connected with it. And, as I do not mean to recur to this subject often, nor ever, unless indispensably necessary, I repeat the demand for any charge, any accusation, any allegation whatever, that throws me behind the honorable gentleman, or behind any other man, in honor, in fidelity, in devoted love to that country in which I was born, which has honored me, and which I serve. I, who seldom deal in defiance, now, here, in my place, boldly defy the honorable member to put his insinuation in the form of a charge, and to support that charge by any proof whatever.

The gentleman has adverted to the subject of slavery. On this subject, he says, I have not proved myself a friend to the south. Why, sir, the only proof is, that I did not vote for his resolutions.

Sir, this is a very grave matter; it is a subject very exciting and inflammable. I take, of course, all the responsibility belonging to my opinions; but I desire these opinions to be understood, and fairly stated. If I am to be regarded as an enemy to the south, because I could not support the gentleman's resolutions, be it so. I cannot purchase favor from any quarter, by the sacrifice of clear and conscientious convictions. The principal resolution declared that congress had plighted its faith, not to interfere, either with slavery or the slave-trade, in the District of Columbia.

Now, sir, this is quite a new idea. I never heard it advanced until this session. I have heard gentlemen contend that no such power was in the constitution; but the notion, that though the constitution contained no prohibition, yet that congress had plighted its faith, not to exercise such a power, is an entire novelty, so far as I know. I must say, sir, it appeared to me little else than an attempt to put a prohibition into the constitution, because there was none there already. For this supposed plighting of the public faith, or the faith of congress, I saw no ground, either in the history of the government, or in any one fact, or in any argument. I therefore could not vote for the proposition.

Sir, it is now several years since I took care to make my opinion known, that this government has, constitutionally, nothing to do with slavery, as it exists in the states. That opinion is entirely unchanged. I stand steadily by the resolution of the house of representatives, adopted, after much consideration, at the commencement of the government—which was, that congress have no authority to interfere in the emancipation of slaves, or in the treatment of them, within any of the states; it remaining with the several states alone to provide any regulations therein, which humanity and true policy may require. This, in my opinion, is the constitution, and the law. I feel bound by it. I have quoted the resolution often. It expresses the judgment of men of all parts of the country, deliberately formed, in a cool time; and it expresses my judgment, and I shall adhere to it. But this has nothing to do with the other constitutional question; that is to say, the mere constitutional question, whether congress has the power to regulate slavery and the slave-trade in the District of Columbia.

On such a question, sir, when I am asked what the constitution is, or whether any power granted by it has been compromised away; or, indeed, could be compromised away—I must express my honest opinion; and always shall express it, if I say any thing, notwithstanding it may not meet concurrence either in the south, or the north, or the east, or the west. I cannot express, by my vote, what I do not believe.

He has chosen to bring that subject into this debate, with which it has no concern, but he may make the most of it, if he thinks he can produce unfavorable impressions on the south, from my negative to his fifth resolution. As to the rest of them, they were common-places, generally, or abstractions; in regard to which, one may well not feel himself called on to vote at all.

And now, sir, in regard to the tariff. That is a long chapter, but I am quite ready to go over it with the honorable member.

He charges me with inconsistency. That may depend on deciding what inconsistency is, in respect to such subjects, and now it is to be proved. I will state the facts, for I have them in my mind somewhat more fully than the honorable member has himself presented them. Let us begin at the beginning. In 1816, I voted against the tariff law, which then passed. In 1824, I again voted against the tariff law, which was then proposed, and which passed. A majority of New England votes, in 1824, was against the tariff system. The bill received but one vote from Massachusetts; but it passed. The policy was established; New England acquiesced in it; conformed her business and pursuits to it; embarked her capital, and employed her labor, in manufactures; and I certainly admit that, from that time, I have felt bound to support interests thus called into being, and into importance, by the settled policy of the government. I have stated this often here, and often elsewhere. The ground is defensible, and I maintain it.

As to the resolutions adopted in Boston, in 1820, and which resolutions he has caused to be read, and which he says he presumes I prepared, I have no recollection of having drawn the resolutions, and do not believe I did. But I was at the meeting, and addressed the meeting, and what I said on that occasion has been produced here, and read in the senate years ago.

The resolutions, sir, were opposed to the commencement of a high tariff policy. I was opposed to it, and spoke against it—the city of Boston was opposed to it—the commonwealth of Massachusetts was opposed to it. Remember, sir, that this was in 1820. This opposition continued till 1824. The votes all show this. But in 1824, the question was decided; the government entered upon the policy; it invited men to embark their property and their means of living in it. Individuals have done this to a great extent; and, therefore, I say, so long as the manufactures shall need reasonable and just protection from government, I shall be disposed to give it to them. What is there, sir, in all this, for the gentleman to complain of? Would he have us always oppose the policy, adopted by the country, on a great question? Would he have minorities never submit to the will of majorities?

I remember to have said, sir, at the meeting in Faneuil hall, that protection appeared to be regarded as incidental to revenue, and that the incident could not be carried fairly above the principal: in other words, that duties ought not to be laid for the mere object of protection. I believe that was substantially correct. I believe that if the power of protection be inferred only from the revenue power, the protection could only be incidental.

But, I have said in this place before, and I repeat now, that Mr. Madison's publication, after that period, and his declaration that the convention did intend to grant the power of protection, under the commercial clause, placed the subject in a new and clear light. I will add, sir, that a paper drawn up by Dr. Franklin, and read by him to a circle of friends in Philadelphia, on the eve of the assembling of the convention, respecting the powers which the proposed new government ought to possess, shows, perfectly plain, that, in regulating commerce, it was expected congress would adopt a course, which should, to some degree, protect the manufactures of the north. He certainly went into the convention himself under that conviction.

Well, sir, and now what does the gentleman make out against me in relation to the tariff? What laurels does he gather in this part of Africa? I opposed the policy of the tariff, until it had become the settled and established policy of the country. I have never questioned the constitutional power of congress to grant protection, except so far as the remark goes, made in Faneuil hall, which remark respects only the length to which protection might properly be carried, so far as the power is derived from the authority to lay duties on imports. But the policy being established, and a great part of the country having placed vast interests at stake in it, I have not disturbed it; on the contrary, I have insisted that it ought not to be disturbed. If there be inconsistency in all this, the gentleman is at liberty to blazon it forth; let him see what he can make of it.

Here, sir, I cease to speak of myself; and respectfully ask pardon of the senate for having so long detained it, upon any thing so unimportant as what relates merely to my own public conduct and opinions.

Sir, the honorable member is pleased to suppose that our spleen is excited, because he has interfered to snatch from us a victory over the administration. If he means by this any personal disappointment, I shall not think it worth while to make a remark upon it. If he means a disappointment at his quitting us while we were endeavoring to arrest the present policy of the administration, why, then, I admit, sir, that I, for one, felt that disappointment deeply. It is the policy of the administration, its principles, and its measures, which I oppose. It is not persons, but things; not men, but measures. I do wish, most fervently, to put an end to this anti-commercial policy; and if the overthrow of the policy shall be followed by the political defeat of its authors, why, sir, it is a result which I shall endeavor to meet with equanimity.

Sir, as to the honorable member's rescuing the victory from us, or as to his ability to sustain the administration in this policy, there may be a drachm of a scruple about that. I trust the citadel will yet be stormed, and carried, by the force of public opinion, and that no Hector will be able to defend its walls.

But now, sir, I must advert to a declaration of the honorable member, which, I confess, did surprise me. The honorable member says that, personally, he and myself have been on friendly terms, but that we always differed on great constitutional questions! Sir, this is astounding. And yet I was partly prepared for it; for I sat here the other day, and held my breath, while the honorable gentleman declared and repeated, that he always belonged to the state rights party! And he means, by what he has declared to-day, that he has always given to the constitution a construction more limited, better guarded, less favorable to the extension of the powers of this government, than that which I have given to it. He has always interpreted it according to the strict doctrine of the school of state rights! Sir, if the honorable member ever belonged, until very lately, to the state rights party, the connexion was very much like a secret marriage. And never was secret better kept. Not only were the espousals not acknowledged, but all suspicion was avoided. There was no known familiarity, or even kindness between them.—On the contrary, they acted like parties who were not at all fond of each other's company.

Sir, is there a man, in my hearing, among all the gentlemen now surrounding us, many of whom, of both houses, have been here many years, and know the gentleman and myself perfectly; is there one, who ever heard, supposed, or dreamed, that the honorable member belonged to the state rights party before the year 1825? Can any such connexion be proved upon him—can he prove it upon himself, before that time?

Sir, I will show you, before I resume my seat, that it was not until after the gentleman took his seat in the chair which you now occupy, that any public manifestation, or intimation, was ever given by him, of his having embraced the peculiar doctrines of the state rights party.

The truth is, sir, the honorable gentleman had acted a very important and useful part during the war. But the war terminated. Toward the close of the session of 1814-15, we received the news of peace. This closed the 13th congress. In the fall of 1815, the 14th congress assembled. It was full of ability, and the honorable gentleman stood high among its distinguished members. He remained in the house, sir, through the whole of that congress; and now, sir, it is easy to be shown, that, during those two years, the honorable gentleman took a decided lead, in all those great meaasures, which he has since so often denounced, as unconstitutional and oppressive—the bank, the tariff, and internal improvements. The war being terminated, the gentleman's mind turned itself toward internal administration and improvement. He surveyed the whole country, contemplated all its resources, saw what it was capable of becoming, and held a political faith, not so narrow and contracted as to restrain him from useful and efficient action. He was, therefore, at once, a full length ahead of all others, in measures, which were national, and which required a broad and liberal construction of the constitution. This is historic truth. Of his agency in the bank, and other measures connected with the currency, I have already spoken, and I do not understand him to deny any thing I have said, in that particular. Indeed, I have said nothing capable of denial.

Now allow me a few words upon the tariff. The tariff of 1816 was distinctly a South Carolina measure. Look at the votes, and you will see it. It was a tariff for the benefit of South Carolina interests, and carried through congress by South Carolina votes, and South Carolina influence. Even the minimum, sir, the so-much-reproached, the abominable minimum, that subject of so much angry indignation and wrathful rhetoric, is of southern origin, and has a South Carolina parentage.

Sir, the contest on that occasion, was chiefly between the cotton-growers at home, and the importers of cotton fabrics from India. These India fabrics were made from the cotton of that country. The people of this country were using cotton fabrics, not made of American cotton, and, so far, they were diminishing the demand for such cotton. The importation of India cottons was then very large, and this bill was designed to put an end to it, and, with the help of the minimum, it did put an end to it. The cotton manufactures of the north were then in their infancy. They had some friends in congress, but if I recollect, the majority of Massachusetts members and of New England members were against this cotton tariff of 1816. I remember well, that the main debate was, between the importers of India cottons in the north, and the cotton-growers of the south. The gentleman cannot deny the truth of this, or any part of it. Boston opposed this tariff, and Salem opposed it, warmly and vigorously. But the honorable member supported it, and the law passed. And now be it always remembered, sir, that that act passed on the professed ground of protection: that it had in it the minimum principle, and that the honorable member and other leading gentlemen from his own state supported it, voted for it, and carried it through congress.

And now, sir, we come to the doctrine of internal improvement—that other usurpation, that other oppression, which has come so near to justifying violent usurpation of the government, and scattering the fragments of the union to the four winds. Have the gentleman's state-rights opinions always kept him aloof from such unhalloved infringements of the constitution? He says he always differed with me on constitutional questions. How was it in this most important particular? Has he here stood on the ramparts, brandishing his glittering sword against assaults, and holding out a banner of defiance? Sir—sir—sir—it is an indisputable truth, that he is himself the man—the ipse that first brought forward, in congress, a scheme of general internal improvement, at the expense, and under the authority of this government. He, sir, is the very man, the ipsum ipse, who, considerably, and on a settled system, began these unconstitutional measures, if they be unconstitutional. And now for the proof.

The act incorporating the Bank of the United States, was passed in April, 1816. For the privileges of the charter, the proprietors of the bank were to pay to government a bonus, as it was called, of one million five hundred thousand dollars, in certain instalments. Government also took seven millions in the stock of the bank. Early in the next session of congress—that is, in December, 1816—the honorable member moved, in the house of representatives, that a committee be appointed to consider the propriety of setting apart this bonus, and also the dividends on the stock belonging to the United States, as a permanent fund for internal improvement. The committee was appointed, and the honorable member was made its chairman. He thus originated the plan, and took the lead in its execution. Shortly afterwards, he reported a bill carrying out the objects for which the committee had been appointed. This bill provided that the dividends on the seven millions of bank stock belonging to government, and also the whole of the bonus, should be permanently pledged, as a fund for constructing roads and canals; and that this fund should be subject to such specific appropriations as congress might thereafter make.

This was the bill; and this was the first project ever brought forward, in congress, for a system of internal improvements. The bill goes the whole doctrine, at a single jump. The Cumberland road, it is true, was already in progress; and for that the gentleman had also voted. But there were, and are now, peculiarities about that particular expenditure, which sometimes satisfy scrupulous consciences; but this bill of the gentleman's, without equivocation or saving clause—without if, or and, or but—occupied the whole ground at once, and announced internal improvement as one of the objects of this government, on a grand and systematic plan. This bill, sir, seemed indeed too strong. It was thought by persons not esteemed extremely jealous of state rights, to evince, nevertheless, too little regard to the will of the states. Several gentlemen opposed the measure, in that shape, on that account; and among them colonel Pickering, then one of the representatives from Massachusetts. Even Timothy Pickering could not quite sanction, nor concur in, the honorable gentleman's doctrines, to their full extent, although he favored the measure in its general character. He, therefore, prepared an amendment, as a substitute; and his substitute provided for two very important things, not embraced in the original bill:

First, that the proportion of the fund to be expended in each state, respectively, should be in proportion to the number of its inhabitants;

Second, that the money should be applied in constructing such roads, canals, &c. in the several states, as congress might direct, with the assent of the state.

This, sir, was Timothy Pickering's amendment of the honorable gentleman's bill. And now, sir, how did the honorable gentleman, who has always belonged to the state-rights party, how did he treat this amendment, or this substitute? Which way, do you think, his state-rights doctrine led him? Why, sir, I will tell you. He immediately rose, and moved to strike out the words "with the assent of the state." Here is the journal under my hand, sir; and here is the gentleman's motion. And certainly, sir, it will be admitted, that this motion was not of a nature to intimate that he had become wedded to state rights. But the words were not stricken out. The motion did not prevail. Mr. Pickering's substitute was adopted, and the bill passed the house in that form.

In committee of the whole on this bill, sir, the honorable member made a very able speech, both on the policy of internal improvements, and the power of congress over the subject. Those points were fully argued by him. He spoke of the importance of the system; the vast good it would produce, and its favorable effect on the union of the states. "Let us, then," said he, "bind the republic together, with a perfect system of roads and canals. Let us conquer space. It is thus the most distant parts of the republic will be brought within a few days' travel of the centre; it is thus that a citizen of the west will read the news of Boston still moist from the press."
